26. Your theological limb is not yet fully anatomized. As you have in a good measure ceased to reply to my objections, I shall have more time to descant upon the common sense and scriptural view of the question!

27. You believe in after death repentance, conversion, and sanctification in purgatory. Of what use is the proposition God is love, when you teach that the proposition "God is continually angry with the wicked," will in the demonstration of his wrath in the fires of purgatory sanctify and save all that die in their sins, which has yet been a majority of mankind. A few texts of Scripture and a little light upon your purgatorial punishment and its localities, with the length of its continuance, will be thankfully received at this office.

Benevolently and controversially yours,

A. CAMPBELL.

OPPOSITION TO UNIVERSALISM—A FACT.

In one of the Penitentiaries not fifty miles from Auburn, there is an aged man who has spent the most of his life in different imprisonments. This aged man has read his Bible through some sixty or seventy times in order, during the different times he has been in this one Penitentiary—how many times he has read it in other Penitentiaries, is uncertain. Among other things he has discovered a violent opposition to Universalism, and has so expressed himself in conversation. He was asked if he ever heard a Universalist preach, or if he had ever read a Universalist book?—the answer was prompt; "no, he never had." And in his answer, he manifested such satisfaction in being able to give the reply he did, that it plainly discovered his feelings to be, "in the midst of all my crimes, I never disgraced myself by hearing or reading Universalism." What a comment on the frequent declaration, "Universalism pleases the carnal mind"!

PUNISHMENT—NO. II.

I have said that if the public generally, and criminals especially, were enlightened on the subject of punishment—its certainty, and its object—much good would be thereby effected. Miss Martineau, in her late work, "Retrospect of Western Travel," furnishes us, indirectly perhaps, but therefore the more removed from suspicion of designedness, with a few anecdotes in illustration of this position, as well as in proof. She visited the Philadelphia prison, and was admitted to converse freely with the prisoners on their condition, the nature of punishment, etc. After relating some of the labors, she says—

Several incidents of this nature which occurred persuade me that almost any thing may be done with these sufferers by occasional intercourse and free sympathy. Each time that I went I was amazed at the effect of words that had passed, lightly enough, days or weeks before. I found them all expecting a pardon; and the most painful part of my duty to them was undeceiving them about this. It was dreadful to see the emotion of some; but I knew they would have no repose of mind, so necessary in their case, while racked with this hope; I therefore took pains to explain what punishment was for, and how rarely pardon could be justified. On my subsequent visits it was cheering to see how completely they had understood me, and how they had followed out the subject to their own entire conviction.

"Well, J.," said I to a young man who had been rather languid about his work, making only three shoes a week while expecting a pardon, "how have you been since I saw you?"

"Very fairly indeed, madam. I make seven shoes a week now."

"Ah! then you have left off fretting yourself about a pardon. You have made up your mind to your term, like a man."

"Yes, I have been thinking about that, and something more. I have been thinking that perhaps it is well that I am here now; for, madam, I got that that I took so easily, that I believe, if I had not been caught, I should have gone back to the same place and taken more, and so have come in for ten years instead of five."

Twenty months afterwards I heard of this man from the warden. He was in health, cheerful, and industrious. I have no doubt of his doing well when he comes out.

The hope of pardon—the hope of escaping punishment—the latter, the cause of nearly all crime—the first, the great cause why punishment fails to reform—why it seems vindictive.

The holding out my hand to them at parting brought every one of them to tears; yet there was nothing unmanly in their bearing; there was no lack of health, no feebleness of spirits, though a quietness of manner such as might be anticipated in men under punishment and subject to remorse. There was a degree of contentment (when the expectation of pardon was removed) which I did not look for. They spoke (such as were qualified) of other prisons with horror, and with approbation approaching to thankfulness of the treatment they met with in this, where they were not degraded as if they had done nothing but crime, as if they were not still men.

I believe that now there is little or no instruction on moral subjects presented to the prisoners in most of our State Penitentiaries, save through the medium of sermons by clergymen of Partialist denominations. It may seem uncharitable to say so, but I am solemnly impressed with the belief, that they are unfitted by their very education, mode of life, and devotion to a creed, for the task of instructing the criminals. Give the task of instruction to some one qualified by his knowledge of man, if not of God, for the task. For the present we will lay aside all religious predilections, and say, admit a man who, whatever may be his religious faith, will inculcate enlarged and cheering views of human nature and human ability to do good—correct views of the certainty, and beneficial tendency of punishment—and who will regard and treat the punished as a brother, afflicted for period with a moral insanity—and whose religious instructions, whatever they may be, will be given in a tone and spirit in accordance with these views—employ such a one with the funds of the State—pay him well and let him be faithful in his vocation, and it will be one of the most profitable investments ever made by the State. But I do now regard the money paid to "young sprigs of divinity" at Auburn, or expended on many of the Chaplains of our public prisons, as worse than thrown away, in many cases. Instead of inculcating those cheering truths of Christianity (developed and enforced in Combe's Constitution of Man, and in similar works) which particularly relate to the nature of man, and his connection with the worlds of matter and of thought—their themes are man's total depravity and worthlessness, God's infinite wrath, and the mysteries infinite accountability, and the placation of Deity by his creatures—the pleasures of sin, and the speediest mode of escaping its just punishment, etc. Independent of the pernicious tendency of the doctrines preached—for all must admit that such subjects are illy fitted to lead the sinner to respect himself, to love God, and to desire to lead a life of virtue and shun the path of vice—the persons who preach them, do so too often in a Pharisaical spirit, a contempt of the criminal and an assumption of superiority over him, which would mar the beneficial tendency of the best instructions ever given to man.

I can not enforce these views better, than by giving some anecdotes from the before named work of Miss Martineau's, together with the remarks by which she has preceded them. She is comparing the Auburn prison, with the new State prison at Philadelphia—or, rather, their several modes of treating the criminals.

The first principle in the management of the guilty seems to me to be to treat them as men and women; which they were before they were guilty, and will be when they are no longer so; and which they are in the midst of it all. Their humanity is the principal thing about them; their guilt is a temporary state. The insane are first men, and secondarily diseased men; and in a due consideration of this order of things lies the main secret of the successful treatment of such. The drunkard is first a man, and secondarily a man with a peculiar weakness. The convict is, in like manner, first a man, and then a sinner.—Now, there is something in the isolation of the convict which tends to keep this order of considerations right in the mind of his guardian. The warden and his prisoner converse like two men when they are face to face; but when the keeper watches a hundred men herded together in virtue of the one common characteristic of their being criminals, the guilt becomes the prominent circumstance, and there is an end of the brotherly faith in each, to which each must mainly owe his cure.

The wonderfully successful friend of criminals, Captain Pillsbury, of the Weathersfield prison, has worked on this principle, and owes his success to it. His moral power over the guilty is so remarkable, that prison-breakers who can be confined nowhere else are sent to him to be charmed into staying their term out. I was told of his treatment of two such. One was a gigantic personage, the terror of the country, who had plunged deeper and deeper in crime for seventeen years. Captain Pillsbury told him when he came, that he hoped he would not repeat the attempts to escape which he had made elsewhere. "It will be best," said he, "that you and I should treat each other as well as we can. I will make you as comfortable as I possibly can, and shall be anxious to be your friend; and I hope you will not get me into any difficulty on your account. There is a cell intended for solitary confinement, but we have never used it, and I should be sorry ever to have to turn the key upon anybody in it. You may range the place as freely as I do if you will trust me as I shall trust you." The man was sulky, and for weeks showed only very gradual symptoms of softening under the operation of Captain Pillsbury's cheerful confidence. At length information was given to the Captain of this man's intention to break prison. The Captain called him, and taxed him with it; the man preserved a gloomy silence. He was told that it was now necessary for him to be locked up in the solitary cell, and desired to follow the Captain, who went first, carrying a lamp in one hand and the key in the other. In the narrowest part of the passage the Captain (who is a small, slight man) turned round and looked in the face of the stout criminal. "Now," said he, "I ask you whether you have treated me as I deserve? I have done everything I could think of to make you comfortable; I have trusted you, and you have never given me the least confidence in return, and have even planned to get me into difficulty. Is this kind? And yet I can not bear to lock you up. If I had the least sign that you cared for me....." The man burst into tears. "Sir," said he, "I have been a very devil these seventeen years; but you treat me like a man." "Come, let us go back," said the Captain. The convict had the free range of the prison as before. From this hour he began to open his heart to the Captain, and cheerfully fulfilled his whole term of imprisonment, confiding to his friend, as they arose, all impulses to violate his trust, and all facilities for doing so which he imagined he saw.

The other case was of a criminal of the same character, who went so far as to make the actual attempt to escape. He fell, and hurt his ankle very much. The Captain had him brought in and laid on his bed, and the ankle attended to, every one being forbidden to speak a word of reproach to the sufferer. The man was sullen, and would not say whether the bandaging of his ankle gave him pain or not. This was in the night, and every one returned to bed when this was done. But the Captain could not sleep. He was distressed at the attempt, and thought he could not have fully done his duty by any man who would make it. He was afraid the man was in great pain. He rose, threw on his gown, and went with a lamp to the cell. The prisoner's face was turned to the wall, and his eyes were closed, but the traces of suffering were not to be mistaken. The Captain loosened and replaced the bandage, and went for his own pillow to rest the limb upon, the man neither speaking nor moving all the time. Just when he was shutting the door the prisoner started up and called him back. "Stop, Sir. Was it all to see after my ankle that you have got up?"

"Yes, it was. I could not sleep for thinking of you."

"And you have never said a word of the way I have used you."

"I do feel hurt with you, but I don't want to call you unkind while you are suffering as you are now."

The man was in an agony of shame and grief. All he asked was to be trusted again when he should have recovered. He was freely trusted and gave his generous friend no more anxiety on his behalf.

Captain Pillsbury is the gentleman who, on being told that a desperate prisoner had sworn to murder him speedily, sent for him to shave him, allowing no one to be present. He eyed the man, pointed to the razor, and desired him to shave him. The prisoner's hand trembled, but he went through it very well. When he had done the Captain said, "I have been told you meant to murder me, but I thought I might trust you." "God bless you, Sir! you may," replied the regenerated man. Such is the power of faith in man!

Surely Universalists can not dwell too much on the love of God, if even the love of man is so powerful in subduing the desperate and stubborn heart—nor need others after this, fear the licentious tendency of Universalism!

But I have been so copious in my extracts, that I must close for this week where we now are.

A. B. G.

THE CONSOLATIONS OF THE GOSPEL.

Were I a believer in that sentiment which dooms a part of the human family to ceaseless wo, I could hardly persuade myself to attempt an article upon this subject. The awful fate to which many of my fellow-beings must be inevitably doomed, would forever preclude the possibility of rejoicing in view of the record which presents to me, as a part of the Christian's faith, the dreadful idea of endless misery! Methinks I could not endure the thought, that I must become so callous to the welfare of those whom I am commanded to love as myself, as to look with indifference upon the prospect of their unending wo. It would be too great an assimilation to the character of the fabled arch-enemy of man, to meet with the approbation of reason, much less with the sanction of Supreme Perfection. But the assurance, that the Gospel is "good news," is, of itself, sufficient to give joy to the mind that duly appreciates the nature of its message. This, alone, should dispel the gloom and despondency which enshroud the heart of the bigot—enlist his whole soul in the cause of philanthropy and love, and impart to his mind the pure and exalted principles of Christian devotion.

There can not be a Christian in the wide world, who has not drawn rich streams of joy from the perusal of that sacred Charter of faith, and felt his heart drawn up to God in silent gratitude, for the invaluable promises which it contains. It is his delight to ponder upon its holy injunctions, to learn the will of his Father and Friend, to treasure up in his heart the instructions of a Saviour, and to learn resignation from the example of Him who "was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin."

When the heart is weighed down with sorrow, and the soul becomes sick with the follies and allurements of the world, it may be pleasant to meet with a friend who can smile away the lonely hours, and impart new vigor to the shrinking resolutions and exhausted energies of humanity: but even then, the hopes and consolations of the Gospel are of infinitely more value, than all the well meant sympathies of an earthly friend.

The message of our Saviour and his apostles, reveals to us a friend who is not only able, but also willing to save all who trust in his name. Do enemies array themselves against us, and bitterly slander us for our faith in the efficacy and universality of the atonement which Jesus has wrought out for the human family? We are assured in the Gospel, that "if ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye; for the spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you."

Brethren, we have much occasion for the exercise of moderation and charity towards our enemies; for we are unjustly stigmatized with every thing that is low and unworthy the Christian. But it is nothing new, nothing singular, in the history of events, that men should seek to put down the doctrine of God's impartial goodness, by slander and misrepresentation. It has been practised in all ages of the world, and will continue to be, as long as mankind adhere to sentiments which can not be supported by truth. The enemies of our Saviour were in the same predicament in which too many of the opposers of Universalism are now. They knew that they could not successfully oppose the progress of Christianity by reason and fair argument, and hence, they employed the only weapons they had the power of wielding—revilings and persecutions. Our Saviour knew that this would be the course which bigots would take in future ages, and therefore he has declared for our encouragement, "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad; for great is your reward in heaven; for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you."

But we are not to stop here. The Gospel is of incalculable value in the promotion of our happiness, by making known to us our duty to each other, and to God. It is an unerring law of right. Under whatever circumstances we may be placed, we are certain of finding there, advice and instruction, perfectly adapted to those circumstances, and calculated to lead us into the peaceful ways of wisdom. And then, the thought that God is the author of those instructions—that His unerring wisdom has planned, and His unchanging goodness revealed to us, the scheme of salvation therein contained—this is enough to give us the most unreserved confidence in its adaptation to our circumstances. We might observe the conduct of the most perfect man in the world, and unless it agreed with the rules laid down in the Gospel, we could not have that confidence as to the propriety of his course, which is necessary to prompt and energetic action. It might not apply to our circumstances—it might not answer the purpose we wish to promote—or, if it did, we might not be able to carry it into practice. But the duties of the Christian, are sure of producing the result for which they were intended—the happiness of the subject. So wisely is the law of God adapted to the wants of men, that whatsoever can not be performed in strict compliance with that law, had better be left undone.

Man is a frail and perishable creature; and as he passes on through the journey of life, friend after friend drops from the stage of mortal existence, and is consigned to the dark abode of death! Experience teaches us that it is the way of all the living, and that we all must soon follow them. Whither, oh, whither have they gone! Can it be that the eye which beamed with intelligence, is closed forever? Is it possible that the mind, which could regale itself upon the wonders of the universe, and almost grapple with impossibilities, now sleeps in eternal torpor? Were the hopes and joys which agitated that bosom, only given to tantalize the fleeting existence of a moment, and then to vanish forever? Shall we never meet those friends again? Yes—blessed be God, they shall live again in immortal felicity. Jesus Christ, the Mediator, "hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel;" and God, his and our Father, hath declared, "that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he would gather together in one, all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him."

UNIVERSALIST REGISTER AND ALMANAC, FOR 1839.

All information intended for the correction of this work, should be furnished to the subscribers, before the first of July next—or to either of the brethren named below, in time sufficient for them to prepare and forward it to us before that date.

In addition to the information now contained in the work, we wish a list of schools, Young Men's Institutes, etc., particularly connected with the denomination, and a list of Universalist books now in the market—their publishers, date, size, and general retail price. Publishers, in particular, will please give us information of any works to be published before August next.

When most convenient, information of every kind, and orders for quantities of the work, may be sent to Brs. W. A. Drew, Gospel Banner office, Augusta, Me.; Abel Tompkins, Ladies' Repository office, 40 Cornhill, Boston; P. Price, Universalist Union office, 130 Fulton-st., New-York; A. C. Thomas, 130 Walnut-st., Philadelphia; S. A. Davis, Glad Tidings office, Pittsburg, Pa.; J. A. Gurley, Star in the West office, Cincinnati; J. Whitney, Ohio City, Ohio. But in all other cases send it directly to us—especially if forwarded late in the season. It is hoped, also, that all persons, (except the above named agents, and those other brethren who have been specially written to for corrections,) will furnish their corrections free of cost and postage; as the expenses incurred in the purchase and correction of the work, as well as the reduction in its prices, forbid us to incur many small or any large expenses.

Early orders are respectfully solicited, as the work will be ready early in August, if possible, and we wish to know what number of copies to print. Our prices are—$30.00 per thousand—3.50 per hundred—50 cents per dozen, and 6 cents single. GROSH and HUTCHINSON.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

In announcing the commencement of the Summer term of this institution, (which commenced on the 23d inst.,) I inadvertantly committed an error in the name of the worthy and excellent new Principal—it should have been Timothy Clowes, L. L. D., instead of Simon Clowes, etc. There is a gentleman of the latter name, I believe, somewhere at the East, and I innocently got them confounded in my mind.

Permit me further to remark, while correcting this error, that the friends of the Clinton Liberal Institute may reasonably look forward to a course of prosperity, based on its past excellent reputation, and aided onward by the diligence and abilities of its worthy and capable teachers. Messrs. Perkins and Ellis are well known to the friends of the institution, by past services; and the reputation obtained by Dr. Clowes in a similar employment for about twenty years past, gives us good grounds for believing that his accession will add materially to the reputation of the Institute and the number of its pupils. May it flourish a thousand years, and its shadow never be less.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

LINES TO—— ——.

"Oh! think not of me in the lighted hall,
Where beauty and music lend grace to all"—
When light feet are treading the mazy dance,
And bright eyes are meeting thine, perchance—
Then think not of me.

When proud dreams of glory throng to thy view,
More radiant than moonlight that glitters on dew—
When the rosebuds of hope are all opening fast,
And thy heart fondly thinks joy forever will last,
Then think not of me.

But when the rude winds of adversity blow,
And earth's blossoms of hope are forever laid low—
When thou art surrounded with darkness and storm,
And thou lookest in vain for the coming of morn,
Then think thou of me.

When thy visions of glory are fainter by far,
Than the last fading ray of the morning's dim star,
And thy soul turns away from the meteor light
To the love of that "Being divinely bright,"
Then think thou of me.

When thou bowest before the eternal throne
Of the purely spotless and Holy One—
When thy incense of prayer ascendeth on high
And the angel of mercy is hovering nigh,
Wilt thou then think of me?

WRONG IDEAS OF SALVATION.

Men's ignorance of the great truth stated in this discourse, is seen in the low ideas attached by multitudes to the word, salvation. Ask multitudes, what is the chief evil from which Christ came to save them, and they will tell you, "from hell, from penal fires, from future punishment." Accordingly they think, that salvation is something which another may achieve for them, very much as a neighbor may quench a conflagration that menaces their dwellings and lives. That word hell, which is used so seldom in the sacred pages, which, in a faithful translation, would not once occur in the writings of Paul, and Peter, and John, which we meet only in four or five discourses of Jesus, and which all persons, acquainted with Jewish geography, know to be a metaphor, a figure of speech, and not a literal expression, this word, by a perverse and exaggerated use, has done unspeakable injury to Christianity. It has possessed and diseased men's imaginations with outward tortures, shrieks, and flames; given them the idea of an outward ruin as what they have chiefly to dread; turned their thoughts to Jesus, as an outward deliverer; and thus blinded them to his true glory, which consists in his setting free and exalting the soul. Men are flying from an outward hell, when in truth they carry within them the hell which they should chiefly dread. The salvation which man chiefly needs, and that which brings with it all other deliverance, is salvation from the evil of his own mind. There is something far worse than outward punishment. It is sin; it is the state of a soul, which has revolted from God, and cast off its allegiance to conscience and the divine word; which renounces its Father, and hardens itself against Infinite Love; which, endued with divine powers, enthrals itself to animal lusts; which makes gain its god; which has capacities of boundless and ever growing love, and shuts itself up in the dungeon of private interests; which, gifted with a self-directing power, consents to be a slave, and is passively formed by custom, opinion, and changing events; which, living under God's eye, dreads man's frown or scorn, and prefers human praise to its own calm consciousness of virtue; which tamely yields to temptation, shrinks with a coward's baseness from the perils of duty, and sacrifices its glory and peace in parting with self-control. No ruin can be compared to this. This we can not too strongly fear. To save, in the highest sense of that word, is to lift the fallen spirit from this depth, to heal the diseased mind, to restore it to energy and freedom of thought, conscience and love. This was chiefly the salvation for which Christ shed his blood. For this the holy spirit is given; and to this all the truths of Christianity conspire.

Another illustration of the error which I am laboring to expose, and which places the glory and importance of Christianity in something besides its quickening influence on the soul, is afforded in the common apprehensions formed of heaven, and of the methods by which it may be obtained. Not a few, I suspect, conceive of heaven as a foreign good. It is a distant country, to which we are to be conveyed by an outward agency.—How slowly do men learn, that heaven is the perfection of the mind, and that Christ gives it now just as far as he raises the mind to celestial truth and virtue. It is true that this word is often used to express a future felicity; but the blessedness of the future world is only a continuance of what is begun here. There is but one true happiness, that of a mind unfolding its best powers, and attaching itself to great objects; and Christ gives heaven only in proportion as he gives this elevation of character. The disinterestedness, and moral strength, and filial piety of the Christian, are not mere means of heaven, but heaven, itself, and heaven now.

The most exalted idea we can form of the future state, is, that it brings and joins us to God. But is not approach to this great being begun on earth? Another delightful view of heaven, is, that it unites us with the good and great of our own race, and even with higher orders of beings. But this union is one of spirit, not of mere place; it is accordance of thought and feeling, not an outward relation; and does not this harmony begin even now? and is not virtuous friendship on earth essentially the pleasure which we hope hereafter? What place would be drearier than the future mansions of Christ, to one who should want sympathy with their inhabitants, who could not understand their language, who would feel himself a foreigner there, who would be taught, by the joys which he could not partake, his own loneliness and desolation? These views, I know, are often given with greater or less distinctness; but they seem to me not to have brought home to men the truth, that the fountain of happiness must be in our own souls. Gross ideas of futurity still prevail. I should not be surprised if to some among us the chief idea of heaven were that of a splendor, a radiance, like that which Christ wore on the Mount of Transfiguration. Let us all consider, and it is a great truth, that heaven has no lustre surpassing that of intellectual and moral worth; and that, were the effulgence of the sun and stars concentrated in the Christian, even this would be darkness, compared with the pure beamings of wisdom, love and power from his mind. Think not then that Christ has come to give heaven as something distinct from virtue. Heaven is the freed and sanctified mind, enjoying God through accordance with his attributes, multiplying its bonds and sympathies with excellent beings, putting forth noble powers, and ministering, in union with the enlightened and holy, to the happiness and virtue of the universe.—Channing.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 10th inst., by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. John Armstrong, to Miss Sarah Tyler, both of New-Hartford.

In Winfield, Herkimer county, April 22d, by Rev. Lucius Rogers, Henry Cole, Esq., to Miss Lucy Young, both of Winfield.

In Columbia, same county, April 25th, by Rev. B. Wightman, Mr. Allegence Cole, to Miss Dorothy Eaton, all of Columbia.

DEATHS.

In Central Square, April 27th, Caroline Sarah, youngest child of John and Caroline Harden, aged 20 months. Funeral on the 29th—sermon by S. B.

In Salina, April 28th, of consumption, Miss Juliet Rice, aged 17 years on the day of her death. This is the third member of the family removed by death within one year—two sisters in the spring time of life, and their Father, J. J. Rice. Miss Rice was fully sensible of her situation, and constantly expressed her willingness to depart when God called her home. Kind, affectionate and amiable, she was respected by all who knew her. She lived and died in the belief of a world's salvation. May her bereaved relatives and friends find needed consolation in the same Gospel. Sermon on the following Sunday by S. B.

In Ellisburg, May 3d, Mr. Daniel Fobs, in the 90th year of his age—a soldier of our Revolutionary war.—He performed well the duties of life, and has gone where "the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest." Sermon by Br. Sias.

In Munnsville, Madison county, May 7th, Mrs. Lucy Barber, consort of B. F. Barber, in the 33d year of her her age. She sustained her lingering illness with the calm and holy dignity of the Christian, and fell asleep in the full assurance of a blissful immortality. Sermon on the 9th by Br. J. G. McAdam.

In Boonville, May 5th, of consumption, Mrs. Sarah A. Traffarn, wife of Thomas Traffarn, aged 28 years. Amiable in life, she was respected by all, and her death is deeply lamented by those who best knew her. Funeral on the 6th—sermon by J. A. A.

In Plymouth, Chenango county, April 29th, Col. William Monroe, a soldier of the Revolution, aged 77 years. Col. Monroe emigrated from Connecticut, in the earliest settlement of Chenango county, and for a number of years filled some of the most important offices in the county, and in the town in which he resided, with honor to himself and benefit to the community.—In the relations of husband, father, friend and neighbor, he was equally faithful and excellent. And as a consistent and active believer in "the restitution of all things," he was extensively known, useful, and respected. His faith was an anchor to his soul, sure and stedfast to the close of life—his last words were, "All will be reconciled in due season."

He declined rapidly for a year past, latterly in much pain, which he endured with Christian resignation. Thus after a life of usefulness and honor, prolonged beyond the usual period allotted to man's mortal existence, the Christian breathed his last in pious confidence, and has gone to his everlasting rest.

A large concourse of friends and acquaintances assembled on the 31st ult., to evince their respect for his memory, and pay the last honors to his remains, to whom a discourse was delivered, from Rom. xiv: 8, by Br. Doolittle. May the consolation of the Gospel support his widow and children in this bereavement, and enable them truly to realize the goodness of God even in our afflictions.

In Webster, Washtenaw county, Mich., November 1st, 1837, Mrs. Eliza A. Scaddin, in the 28th year of her age. Mrs. S. had been for some years, a member of the Presbyterian church, from which she had never been expelled. But within a short season past she had been, like Peter, divinely taught to call nothing unclean which God had cleansed, and died rejoicing in the full assurance of faith in the final "restitution of all things," selecting a text for her own funeral occasion (Rev. xiv: 13,) and a preacher to attend the solemnities.

In Ann Arbor, March 6th, Mrs. Asenath Thomas, consort of Mr. John Thomas, formerly from West Rutland, Vermont. She lived a devoted Christian, and died rejoicing in the full assurance of a happy and glorious immortality. "Let me die the death of the righteous; and let my last end be like his."

In Adrian, Lenawee county, Mich., April 6th, Mrs. Eliza Bond, consort of Rev. Ammi Bond, aged 39 years.

Mrs. B. received her early education in the bosom of the Roman Catholic church; but for some eight years past, she has been enabled to rejoice with a full heart, in the liberty of the Gospel of universal grace. She bore a protracted sickness, (pulmonary consumption) with Christian fortitude, patience and resignation. She had repeatedly expressed her confidence and her hope while the power of utterance remained; and her reasoning powers continuing bright, while the taper of life glimmered in its socket, thrice was the question put to her after the power of speech failed—(all within a very few minutes,) once by her husband, and twice by a kind friend, but an orthodox professor, whether her confidence and her hope remained unshaken, to all which she answered in the affirmative by a very low inclination of the head; and immediately fell asleep in the arms of Jesus.

By this dispensation, her husband is deprived of a most affectionate companion and faithful help-meet,—three helpless children of the tenderest earthly friend, a conscientious guide and provident mother, and society of a most brilliant ornament. The language of Prov. xxxi: 11, 12, 28–29, might safely have been said of her.

Our excellent Br., though bereaved and afflicted, bears the heavy stroke with Christian resignation and fortitude; for mercy has mingled with his cup of sorrow, the "oil and wine" of holy consolation.

The above noticed funerals were attended by the writer. N. Stacy.

ORIGINAL SERMON,

Delivered in the Universalist meeting-house, in Lakeville, N. Y., on the 17th of December, 1837, on opening the house for the regular observance of Christian worship, and the inculcation of truth.

BY REV. O. ROBERTS.

"I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the Lord."—PSALM CXXII: 1.

The blessed and pious Psalmist had drunk copiously from the river of God's goodness, and tasted the broad streams of salvation, as they issued from the throne of the Most High. He experienced the all-subduing and redeeming influence of Heaven's impartial love, and above all, the exquisite joys of an unwavering trust in, and worship of, the only true God. Devotion's humiliating power, was felt in all its charms. It sweetened the toils of life, and poured a healing balm into adversity's bitter cup. With it, while in the house of God, where is the worshipping soul's richest feast, he could hold sweet communion with his Maker. Therefore, when there came up a voice in earnestness and humility from those who were once his bitter enemies, saying, "Let us go into the house of the Lord," well might David respond at this saying, in the holy triumph of soul, "I WAS GLAD." He was not only glad, because their enmity had ceased to rage, and they had given evidence of a sincere desire to worship the Lord, but because, by living pious and devotional lives, and serving God in his sanctuary, they would experience joys far transcending even the highest hopes and joys, to which the habitual transgressor is a stranger. These considerations are enough to make the heart of the righteous glad. And these will now fill us with gladness, if our moral character bears an assimilation to that of David. What produced gladness in him, will also produce gladness in us. Therefore we state,

1. That it will produce gladness in us to see enmity subdued, and Christian love prevail. When we look around among our fellow-beings, and see what enmity exists, what cries, and wretchedness, and carnage, and cruelty have thereby been caused, what gladness will swell our bosoms on seeing this enmity subdued, and hearing those who had cherished it saying, in penitential tears, "Come, let us go into the house of the Lord," and there "we will pay our vows to the Most High." Such a change we most devoutly wish for.

> Contending sectarists, who differ in their creed,
> Are here, in this broad wish, most happily agreed.

It is an end which benevolence, or the law of love, sanctions, and which gives every well-wisher gladness of heart. And if so, what must be the degree of gladness resulting from this prospective view of a universal change from this state of enmity to ceaseless love—a change in all the rebellious children of humanity, from rebellion to obedience! Gladness unspeakable—gladness which can not otherwise than be felt by those who view, with steadfast confidence, this happy, this desirable end. So, by parity of reasoning, one might say how unspeakably wretched and forlorn must those be who do not view this end believing, but view enmity as existing immortally, or as long as God exists, and increasing in malignity while eternity's undying ages roll on. This latter view must cause as much dissatisfaction and sadness, as the former does satisfaction and gladness. Therefore,

2. We state that those who hear the truth taught in the house of the Lord, may go therein with gladness. Hence, on opening this house for the regular ministration of the word of life and salvation, and the worship of God, we might, while viewing people coming up hither, adopt the language and sentiment of the text, "I was glad when they said unto me, we will go into the house of the Lord." But evidently we could not be glad to see them coming up hither, unless they were to hear the truth of God spoken to them. For the truth of God is valuable; it is weighty, powerful, comforting, and liberating to the enslaved mind. Therefore we say it gives us gladness to see our friends and neighbors coming into the house of the Lord, to hear what we conscientiously teach as truth. But as people differ in sentiment, and are not all agreed as to what is the truth, it may be necessary for us to state those things which we consider true, and which are the best calculated to give those who hear, gladness of heart.

Correct views of God, and of man's duty and destiny, alone can give the heart peace. A congregation of worshippers will be glad to hear that Being whom they are invited to serve and adore, represented as a kind and loving father, who is ever ready to do the utmost good to his children. For then they will be powerfully constrained to serve him, believing that he imposes upon them no duties but such as are pleasing, and requires no work at their hands, but that which is reasonable and just. To them, the name of FATHER is the most endearing of all. Around it clusters every thing lovely and attractive. With it is associated every thing in character, kind; every thing in purpose, wise; every thing in action, good; every thing in promise, faithful and true. So that while assembled in the house of the Lord, to worship God, if the conviction that God is their father, sinks deep into their hearts, they have every thing to completely satisfy their inquiring minds concerning him, and to render their worship of him unspeakably pleasing. But let the same be taught, yea, let them be really convinced, that the object of their worship is not their father, and that there is not that tender regard, that readiness to provide, that kindness and parental affection for his children, that attachment to them and relationship which are implied and included in the word FATHER, and with what apathy, coldness, indifference, or reluctance, will they attempt to perform the religious service of worshipping him! There could be no filial or heartfelt love to warm and cheer their spirits, or draw out their devotions, and cause them constantly to ascend to God, pure and acceptable. Where this love is wanting, true service is wanting. In view of these facts, can it be said we are glad to hear them say, "Let us go into the house of the Lord," while in possession of such views and feelings? We can not be glad, because we believe they can not be, with such views against God's sustaining the relationship of father, and with such feelings towards him consequent upon those views. But it will give us a thrill of joy to hear them pronounce "Let us go into the house of the Lord," if they go to mingle their devotion with the spirit of God as their father, believing that he cherishes towards them a parental affection which no circumstance can avert, or consideration weaken. With what delight may we view the moving towards the earthly temple of our Father and our God. For methinks I can hear them saying, with emphasis, while possessed of such views, "We will enter into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise; we will be thankful unto him, and bless his name." For with such views of his character, and such alone, they will feel the spirit of thanksgiving and praise rising and filling their hearts, and be constrained to bless his holy name. Therefore we may individually say, in the language of the text, "I was glad when they said unto me, let us go into the house of the Lord." Again: if they were to be taught in the house of the Lord, and believe, that notwithstanding God is their father, yet he is sometimes indescribably malignant, and sometimes affectionately kind towards them, how, I ask, can we be glad to hear them say, "Let us go into the house of the Lord?" Will gladness arise from an expectation that such teaching and belief will make them better and happier—more devoted to the service of God, and more benevolent towards their fellow-men? No—gladness can never arise from such a source as this. As well might a fountain send forth both sweet water and bitter.

Look to the case of the miserable and filthy prodigal; and ask yourselves whether he would have said, "I will arise and go to my father," if he believed his father was an inexorable tyrant, foaming and raving with madness because he had been vicious and prodigal? No—he would have contemned the idea of returning to such a father, if father he might be called. He would have chosen rather to have died in the deepest degradation, in filth and in rags—and so would I, especially if I believed he had determined, in his own malignity, to place me in an infinitely worse state than that which I already occupied. I could have no inducement to return to him, or call upon him as my father. I could feel no encouragement to do so, only from the consideration that his affection for me as his child, remains unchanged, and that he possesses a disposition, a power, and a full determination to make better, instead of worse, my condition. From the well known character of his father, the prodigal knew that he should be received with affection. He had nourished and protected him in his infantile weakness; he had fed and clothed him; he had sheltered him under his paternal roof, and watched over him with a father's care; in fine, he had been invariably kind to him, and done every thing in his power for him, according to the strict promptings of a father's tenderest affection; and now, the unhappy prodigal recalls these things fresh to mind, and as a natural and necessary consequence, feels the solemn resolve agitating his anxious breast, "I will arise, and go to my father." What powerful motive was here held up to mind! What persuasive influence was here felt! What communion of spirit with the facts in view! Had this son, during his absence from home, been earnestly told by certain messengers, whose veracity and sincerity he had no reason to dispute, that his father had, since his absence, become dreadfully incensed against him, on account of his prodigality and disobedience; that he was constantly pouting in rigid sullenness, uttering the most astounding imprecations, and horrid denunciations against him, threatening to make him as much more wretched than his poverty and disobedience had made him, as lay in his power—I ask, in all earnestness of soul, whether the son would have said to the messengers, "I will arise and go to my father"? All hearts would respond, emphatically, "No!" The message delivered to him, would have alienated his affection from his father, and hardened him in his rebellion. These facts are self-evident, and will be admitted by all.

Now we wish to make an application of these facts. Let the prodigal be the representative of this congregation, and me the representative of the messengers, teaching the same things to you concerning our heavenly Father, that we have supposed were taught the prodigal about his father; and will such instruction give gladness?—will it cause you to go into our Father's house with willingness and joyfulness, or enter into his presence with thankfulness? And would you be glad to hear your neighbor's say, "Let us go into the house of the Lord," if such instruction is therein given? Would it not rather cause sadness? We believe it would. Therefore, if I would persuade you, as wanderers from God and aliens from the path of virtue, to return to your heavenly Father, and come into his house with gladness, let me not publish from this desk, that he has, on account of your disobedience and vicious practices, become angry with you, and in his own spirit of revenge, threatens to pour upon you the vials of his wrath in an eternal storm of wo. God forbid that I should thus freeze up the current of your affection towards him, and drive you further, and further still, from the enjoyment of his presence—forbid that I thus rob him of every attractive and lovely feature that attaches itself to the character of a father.

I would fain represent the character of God to you, his children, in such a light that you can not help loving it—and in such a light, too, that while viewing it, and hearing me entreating you by his loving kindness to return to your Father, you will feel to say, affectionately, "I will arise and go"—yea, I will go into his courts and inquire early after him;—and this expression of your heart-felt resolution, will make others glad, as the like did David. Nothing, therefore, but the true and lovely character of God as our Father, can make the house of God the house of feasting, and cause gladness to spring up before all the people. Would to God that I could make all that hear me this day, feel this fact in all its strength—that I could imbue their minds deeply with a sense of its absolute importance, to the securing of the highest happiness and well-being of all. It was with a proper sense of this fact, that the sweet Psalmist of Israel exclaimed, "O taste, and see that the Lord is good." And furthermore, it was in view of this fact that he said, "I was glad when they said unto me, let us go into the house of the Lord," because therein his goodness, in all its broadness, height, depth, and length, was set forth and enjoyed. It was there that the paternal, boundless, and unchangeable love of God was acknowledged, and where the worshipping children might find peace, and hold sweet communion with "the Father of spirits." It was where might be enjoyed the pure and peace-giving spirit of devotion and gratitude, arising from a realizing sense of the indissoluble relationship existing between God as the universal Father, and men universally as his children. Oh, how truly, then, might David say, "I was glad when they said unto me, let us go into the house of the Lord." Would that these things might be felt, and these views of God might be set forth, in every house dedicated to the Lord. Then, indeed, we might delight to see people repairing there in multitudes, and delight to hear them express their desire to enter the house of the Lord, where God has said his glory shall rest. With these views, and in possession of these feelings, with what peculiar emotions and sensations of joy may we enter into this neat and commodious temple of the Lord! What streams of inexpressible joy flow in upon the soul while we, for the first time, enter for the regular observance of religious worship, where God, the Father of the spirits of all flesh, may be worshipped in spirit and in truth, and in the love of the truth—where God's impartial and unbounded grace is taught to the worshipping assembly—where Heaven's undying, immutable, and immortal love is taught with all the pathos and earnestness that becometh the exaltedness of the throne—where the tear of repentance, of joy, and of gratitude, shall moisten the eye, and trickle down the cheek of those who hear—where the spirit may hold sweet communion with God, and by faith taste of the joys of the upper world—where the parent mourning for the loss of kindred may be comforted, and the rich balm of hope may be poured into the wounded heart—where the despairing and distrustful may find confidence in God, and rest to their souls—where the vicious may be reclaimed; evil habits corrected; the wo-worn comforted; the bereaved consoled; the benighted enlightened; the ignorant instructed—where the Gospel in its purity may be taught; correct views of God's character inculcated; pure and undefiled religion described and encouraged; the kingdom of the Redeemer advanced; and where the streams of salvation and spiritual knowledge may flow freely and uninterruptedly to refresh many a thirsty heart, and cause joy and righteousness to spring up before the Lord.

With what gladness, then, will we hear our friends devoutly say, Come, let us enter into the house of our God! And with what gladness, also, will we hear our enemies say the same, because they may hear such instruction given, and given in such a manner that their prejudice will be weakened or entirely removed, and they retire with better views, better feelings, and with a more enlarged charity. The securing of this object is fraught with importance enough to encourage us in every laudable undertaking to improve the state of society, and make contending parties more charitable toward each other. Believing, as we do, that the services of the sanctuary are calculated to give us gladness, and also to encourage acts of moral goodness, why should we not be glad to hear even a general expression of willingness to go into the house of the Lord? We, of all people in the world, have the greatest reason to be glad, not only because our faith is best calculated to give gladness, but also because it is adapted to the moral wants of men, and calculated, when understandingly received, to work some change for good. We are glad to have those who differ with us in sentiment, come and hear instruction publicly given; for, thereby, they may become acquainted with our doctrine. For they can not become properly acquainted with it, only from those who teach it. Therefore we are glad to have them make use of some means to become acquainted with it in its true character, believing that the barriers to its progress will thereby be removed. When public opinion shall have so changed, and attachment to creeds, because they are popular, shall be so broken, that the majority shall not fear nor hesitate to go into the house of the Lord, where this doctrine is taught, then prosperity shall be within our borders, and victory ours. Then shall they unitedly say, in the language of Isaiah, "Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths."

Will it not give us gladness to hear all those use this language, who are now our bitter enemies, heaping persecution upon us, and pointing the finger of scorn and derision at us? And if we would have this most desirable end accomplished, we must be active and diligent in the work of the Lord, faint not, nor be weary in well-doing. For simply the erection of this house, without any further efforts to promote the cause that lies near our hearts, will not accomplish the object. People may utter the desire of their hearts by saying, "Let us go into the house of the Lord," but if in the house of the Lord there be no service performed, and no instruction given, this saying would give us no gladness under such circumstances.

This saying in our text, recognizes the fact, that in the house of the Lord, some religious improvement and impressions would be made by the devotional exercises and instruction there given. And this was the reason why this saying made David glad. And this is the only reason why the saying can make us glad. If I believed that no improvement or good impressions would be made by the devotional exercises and instruction here given, I would sanction and encourage the efforts of our opponents to prevent people from attending here. But we know, whether others do or not, that some good has been done, and therefore believe that more good may be done. And this is the reason why we are glad to have people adopt the language of our text, and see them flocking to the house of the Lord, where the ignorant, bigoted, and prejudiced may learn for themselves, that we are not utterly void of religious feelings, and that our doctrine is not without some truth. They may also learn, that if any people on earth have reason to be glad, and reason to erect houses of public worship, in which to pay their thanks to the Most High, it is the Universalists, who have no angry and implacable Deity before whom to bow in servile fear; no revengeful and cruel judge to adore; no changeable and partial king to serve, and no cruelty of him to fear; no service to perform required by him, which is unpleasant; but we have a God to worship, in whose character there is every thing to inspire us with confidence, every thing lovely and praiseworthy. No countenance need be sad in the house of the Lord, where his praise is wont to be given. Hence we may be glad to go into the house of the Lord, and be glad to hear others express their willingness to go, believing that they shall at last, when purified from all their sins, worship in a house not made with hands, where "all nations whom the Lord has made, shall come and worship before him, and glorify his name," as David testifies. Then shall our hearts be made unceasingly glad, with the praises of our God, and the universe own the triumphs of his kingdom and the glory of his name. Amen.

CHRIST "DESPISED AND REJECTED OF MEN."

BY REV. T. D. COOK.

We might assign many reasons why this is the case—why our Lord is practically "despised and rejected of men"—but we shall here give only one: they do not know the value of his religion. They have never felt its soothing power in affliction. They are strangers to that spiritual life which it imparts to the soul. The exalted pleasures of devotion, have never found way to their hearts. Its happifying influence has never been properly exerted upon their minds.

In describing the Laodiceans, the Revelator thus speaks: "Thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked." And we think he has, in these few words, written the biography of many people of the present day. The language of their actions, seems to be, "If we can only get rich—if we can accumulate a great amount of property—we shall then 'have need of nothing.'" Thus they make "a golden image," in whose service they seek for peace and joy. But they seek in vain. Those who unwisely worship the idol god, mammon, and never suffer their minds to soar so high as to dwell in contemplation, upon the perfections of God, and the Gospel of his Son, are justly chargeable with the most consummate folly.

Wealth may be conducive to happiness, if properly employed, and if its possessor thinks less of it than he does of its Giver. But when he allows it to become the object of his supreme affections—when he falls down to, and worships it—he is "wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked."

He is "wretched," because there is no substantial comfort to be derived from his possessions. Let the palsying hand of disease touch the foundation of his physical constitution, and stretch him on a bed of languishing, and how vain are all his possessions! A competency is all that is required now! His mind, unused to contemplate the glorious and ever adorable perfections of God, is weighed down with sorrow and distress. He is miserable. His riches may have charmed him in health, but now that health is gone; disease is creeping over his vitals, and the dismal shades of death are approaching; in the very moment when, of all other times, he most needs comfort, his wealth, for which he has so long toiled, loses its charms, and instead of affording him consolation, it becomes, in many instances, a source of misery to him.

He is "poor!" His earthly possessions, for him, have lost their value, and he has no treasure laid up in heaven—no interest in the Redeemer whom he has "despised and rejected."

He is "blind!" Death draws a dark curtain over his mental vision. No brilliant star of immortality does he, by faith, see beaming on "the night of the grave!" All before him is one dark and starless night! He descends the gloomy vale, with no rays of light from the "Sun of Righteousness," to illuminate his benighted pathway. Fearfulness and doubt plant a thorn in his dying pillow; while the thought of having despised and rejected the Saviour, goads his anguished bosom with ten thousand daggers.

He is "naked!" The love of mammon has robbed him of the garments of righteousness and peace, and now, a comfortless and cheerless wanderer, he gropes his way through the lonely valley, subject to the chill blasts of death.

Then, O man! whoever thou art, that makest a "god of this world," and dost despise and reject the sinner's friend, be entreated to stay thy sinful course, and with full purpose of heart, turn unto him who alone can save—save from the thraldom of sin—save from doubt, darkness, error, and superstition, and who can enable you to exclaim in the last moments of expiring nature, "O death, where is thy sting! O grave, where is thy victory!"

ANECDOTE.

At the last celebration of Christmas Eve, in Perry, the following circumstance took place:—Our friends had inscribed over the desk in large characters, the following passage of Scripture—"Fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people."—Luke ii: 10. The house, at an early hour, was filled to overflowing. There was not a place to stand or sit, in the body of the house, above or below. A large number were also in the porch; and many went away without attempting to gain admittance.

A few individuals, however, who came after the house was filled, were seen attempting to gain admittance by pressing through the crowd that thronged the door. This they did, not with violence, by any means, but by gradually displacing those that stood before them. Among these was one who, by his energy and perseverance, attracted particular attention. He was a tall and well proportioned man, and evidently possessed strong muscular powers. By placing his elbows, first one and then the other, forward of those who stood in advance of him, he seemed to find no difficulty in making a passage. At length he reached the interior of the house, so as to have a distinct view of the congregation, and after taking a general survey of the audience, he directed his eye to the passage of Scripture over the desk, and began to read slowly, and distinctly, and audibly to those who were near him, "Fear—not—for—behold," etc., till the whole was completed. And then turning himself about in the crowd, "Ah!" said he, "I don't believe that doctrine"—and made his way out of the house. The conclusion was, that he believed in endless misery!

CAUSES OF MISERY.

BY J. M. ELWOOD.

A glance at the various conditions of human life, is sufficient to show that misery and unhappiness prevail. Although many are the causes which have conspired to mingle sorrow in the cup of human existence, yet two, ignorance and immorality, more than all others, have engendered the evils that beset mankind. To establish the position that ignorance is one of the most prolific sources of misery, only a reference to those nations where the genial rays of science and civilization have never shed their renovating and vivifying influence, is necessary. Go, mark the infatuated Hindoo, who prostrates himself beneath Juggernaut's idolatrous car, confident in the belief that this, and this only, can placate the wrath of his tutelary deity, and avert impending curses from his sacrilegious head. Witness the heathen mother, who in violation of every parental tie, devotes her child to glut the crocodile's voracity.—Behold the pyre whose destructive flames are fed with human victims—the altar that reeks with the blood of beauty and innocence. Observe the thousand nameless rites that ignorance imposes, the performance of which involves in deep and undistinguished misery the nations that observe them. Superstition (the offspring of ignorance) throws its spell around these barbarous rites, and dignifies the most unparalleled enormities with the appellation of duty. Every man's observation, however superficial, must furnish ample testimony to the position that immorality is the cause of wretchedness. The case of the intemperate man, upon whose haggard features is portrayed the index of his career, bears evidence indubitable to its truth. Not only does his guilty soul vibrate with anguish at the touch of conscience—but, the disgrace of friends—the alien from morality—he sinks the rankling shaft of sorrow deep in the bosom of conscious innocence. Yes, his immorality extends its influence to the plighted partner of his bosom—to his ragged, suffering children—to the whole circle of relatives and friends.

It is so with every species of immorality. Mark well the votaries of vice wherever they may be found, and you will discover that in the most secluded recesses of their infamy, misery with its indigenous train, imbitters the joys of humanity and casts its sombre veil over those unfading, quenchless enjoyments, which virtue only can originate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

JOHN XVII: 1-26.

We are now approaching the termination of Christ's labors in the communication of heavenly wisdom, as well as the termination of his life on earth. He is now done comforting and supporting his disciples, and it now only remains that he should pray to his Father for himself, his disciples, his followers, and his cause, before he goes forth to that spot where he had oft retired, and where a false friend is, before morning, to betray him into the hands of those that hated him. The circumstances, then, alone, in which this prayer was addressed to Heaven, were enough to give it the most intense and absorbing interest. But there is more to give it interest, as an attentive student will readily discover.

"O Heavenly Father," thus spake in an hour of profound emotion, our much to be loved Master, "the hour is at length arrived—the hour which is to finish my work on earth—the hour in which I am to suffer and to die. In this trying hour let me not fail; support and strengthen me, so that I may make even this severe trial contribute to the great object for which Thou hast raised me up, and given me dominion over all flesh, even the giving unto them an inward, divine, and ever-during life. And in order that men may attain to this highest good which Thou hast prepared for them, and appointed me to dispense, they must have proof that Thou art the only and the true Supreme, and that Jesus thy messenger is indeed commissioned by Thee. Thou hast supported me for the accomplishment of this object hitherto; I have, so far, failed not in the accomplishment of the work thou gavest me to do. And, now, O Father, fail me not, forsake me not now, when my work is so nearly accomplished, but let my career be so gloriously consummated, as it was thy determination it should be, ere the world was. Father, thus let it be, for this is thy will.

"I have now revealed thy character, purposes and will to those whom Thou selected for my disciples out of the mass of the world; and, now, to a considerable extent, they are in possession of what Thou gavest me to deliver unto them. And now are they well persuaded that whatever I have revealed to them as from Thee, did really come from Thee, for faithfully have I delivered the message which I received. They are persuaded, also, that Thou hast appointed me thy messenger to this world. For these I make my request—for these whom I am now about to leave in the world—for these who are to carry forward the work I have begun, when I am no more in the world, but with Thee. Preserve them, Holy Father, in and through the knowledge of thy character, that they may still continue united in affection and in sentiment with us, and with one another, and that they may prosecute thy work as cordially as I have done. Whilst I was in the world with them, I preserved them through the knowledge of thy character, and not one is gone astray save the son of mischief: whereby the Scripture is fulfilled. But now am I coming to Thee; and these things do I say while I am yet in the world, that my disciples may have their joy in me completed. Thy message to them, I have faithfully and fully delivered unto them; and towards them does the world bear the same malice that it has done to me: This I have taught them to expect. I do not ask Thee, therefore, O Father, to take them out of the world, but to preserve and deliver from the dominion of the evil spirit that is prevalent in the world. They are not slaves of that evil spirit of the world, even as I have not been under its influence. Complete the work of deliverance from this spirit in them, O Father, and prepare them, more and more, for the propagation of thy truth. Thy doctrine which I have taught them, is truth. As Thou sentest me into the world, so send I them, and for the same object, into the world; and for their sakes, that they may be fortified for their work, do I devote myself a sacrifice and a martyr to the truth, that they may be prepared to bear all things for the sake of propagating thy cause.

"Hear me also, O Father, while I plead not only for these my disciples but also for those who may, in time coming, believe on me through their testimony. May one spirit characterize them all as Thou art in me and I in Thee, so that they may be all one in us. May no trivial difference separate them: but may they continue united by a supreme devotion of themselves, to the cause for which thou hast raised me up, and for which I have labored, and am now about to suffer. May a common cause unite them all. I in them, and Thou in me.

"Father, as to them whom Thou hast given me, my desire is that they also may be with me, where I am to be, that they may behold the distinguished favor with which Thou regardest me, having loved me before the foundation of the world. Righteous Father, grant me this petition, for they have appreciated my character as the world has not done; they have acknowledged my divine mission. O Father, grant them, in one word, a consciousness of their being the objects of Thy love, and of their communion in spirit with me. For this object have I declared to them Thy character; and will continue, by the power and authority thou hast committed to me, still farther to manifest it, even when I am removed from them. This is my last, my best wish for these my brethren, deny me not, O! Gracious Father."

Thus prayed Jesus. "He poured out," says Professor Ware, "his earnest and affectionate desires, in a strain of supplication unspeakably pathetic and sublime. His beloved disciple has put his prayer on record. In reading it we gain admittance into the soul of his Master: we feel how powerful and elevating is his truth. We are overcome with admiration, that one about to perish by a violent and ignominious death, should exhibit this consciousness of an intimate union with the supreme Father; should display this calm assurance, that the grandest purposes of the divine government were connected with his own fate; should thus lift himself above the present time and present scenes, and speak of the invisible and eternal, as if familiar with their glories. We know that no one before him had thus spoken; and as we listen to his words, we exclaim, 'Truly this was the Son of God.'"

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

No. 25.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.

Richmond, Va., May 9, 1838.

DEAR SIR—I write this letter without waiting for your reply to my last, and shall probably write yet one or two more before I return, to notice what you may say on the negative. I shall, however, in due time, attend to whatever arguments your replies may contain. In numbering, I shall take the odd, leaving to you the intermediate even numbers, whatever their date may be. I proceed with the argument founded on the attributes of God.

2. GOD IS HOLY.—"Ye shall be holy, for I the Lord your God, am holy." "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts." Lev. xix: 2, xxi: 8; Isa. vi: 3. Because God is holy and happy, he requires mankind to be holy that they also may be happy. He will therefore employ all necessary means to make them holy. He will never place them in a condition where holiness must necessarily and forever be excluded from them; or where they will eternally be debarred the privilege of becoming holy. Sin is the opposite of holiness. It is not a property or attribute of God. It can never, as such, be approved by him. It could never have been admitted into the universe for its own sake, nor for any other reason than that it might be overruled for the bringing about of a greater good than would otherwise have been attained. Hence "the wrath of man shall praise God, and the remainder of wrath he will restrain." Numerous are the instances in which we see this accomplished; as, for example, in the case of Joseph's being sold into Egypt, and that of Christ's being betrayed and crucified by the Jews. And when all God's benevolent purposes are accomplished through the instrumentality of sin, or whatever other means he may see fit to employ, sin itself, which is opposed to his nature and government, shall be destroyed, and all men of course will then be happy. Sin and holiness being opposites, the one must destroy the other. Which is the strongest? Which shall get the victory? Let the Bible decide. See Dan. ix: 24; John i: 29; Heb. ii: 14, 15; 1 John iii: 8. Thus sin shall yield to holiness, and misery to happiness, and "God shall be all in all." All flesh shall see the salvation of God; and as without holiness no man can see God, holiness shall at length abound wherever his dominion extends.

3. GOD IS MERCIFUL.—"His tender mercies are over all his works." He is "a God full of compassion and gracious; long suffering and plenteous in mercy and truth." "He will have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies; for he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men." Ps. cxlv: 9, lxxxvi: 15; Lam. iii: 32, 33. The mercy of God being infinite, universal and changeless, extends now, and eternally will extend, to every creature he has made. It is often made the burden of the songs and praises of the inspired writers. The royal singer of Israel ends every verse in one of his psalms with the declaration, "For his mercy endureth forever." His anger, (or what seems like it,) on the contrary, is said to endure "but a moment." Ps. xxx: 5; Jer. iii: 12. There is no assignable or imaginable reason for limiting his mercy, either in extent or duration. As it exists now towards all, both the just and the unjust, both the evil and the good, no cause aside from himself—and HE is immutable—can ever operate to cut off any from the exercise of its benignity. The reader need not be informed that there is no mercy in endless misery. He well knows that such a destiny forever precludes the possibility of mercy to the wretched sufferer thereof. To allow that doctrine, therefore, is either to deny the infinity of the divine mercy, or to allow that God will hereafter change from a merciful to an unmerciful being to a part of his offspring: and either of them would be a denial of the Bible.

4. God has given to all mankind the love of happiness, a strong and irrepressible desire for the immortal joys of his heavenly kingdom. And the question occurs, could he have imparted to all our race this strong and ardent desire, with the determination or intention never to gratify, but eternally to thwart it? And when he has it in his power to bestow the much desired boon, will he forever mock his children in their wants, and withhold what all desire? When they ask bread, will he give them a stone? When they ask a fish, will he give them a serpent? When they ask an egg, will he give them a scorpion? Impossible. "For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved." Yea, the Son of God "came to seek and to save that which was lost." "After that the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward man, appeared, not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his MERCY he saved us by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the holy spirit, which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour." As he is "a God full of compassion and gracious, long suffering and plenteous in mercy and truth;" "he will fulfil the desire of them that fear him; he also will hear their cry and will save them." The desires of all righteous and good people, are, that God would have mercy upon a sinful world, and save it from darkness, sin, and death: and the desire of the righteous shall be given them: God will not be less merciful to any, than they are to each other. Therefore, the infinite and changeless mercy of God furnishes a strong and incontrovertible argument in favor of universal salvation.

5. GOD IS JUST. "A God without iniquity, just and right is he"—"a just God and a Saviour."—Deut. xxxii: 4; Isa. xlv: 21. Man had no agency or volition in the production of his own existence. It was the act of God alone, performed without consulting man as to the conditions on which he would receive it. Was it, or could it be just in God to bestow existence on a being, or race of beings, without their consent, or the possibility of their avoiding it, on such terms as would render them liable to be infinite losers and endless sufferers by that existence? Suppose a king bestows a large patrimony on one of his subjects. The subject comes into the royal presence to thank him for the gift, and is then, for the first time, informed that the condition on which the patrimony is bestowed, is, that he shall, like William Tell, the noble Swiss, shoot an apple from the head of an only son, with his bow and arrow, at a great distance, on pain of death if he refuses. The subject at once says he can not receive the patrimony on such terms. The king replies that he has already received it—that there is no alternative—no backing out—he must run the risk and shoot off the apple, or die! Who is there that would not exclaim against such an ex post facto condition—against the injustice of the king, and the cruelty of the terms?

6. Well, Sir, does not the doctrine of endless misery ascribe similar conduct and injustice to God in imposing existence on man, without his consent, under conditions rendering him liable to endless torment? Is there a human being that would voluntarily receive it on such terms, or that, having received it, and being informed of the terms, would not throw it back to the giver, saying he could not thus accept it? Well, Sir, what was the life of Tell's boy, or the life of the subject of this king, compared to the stake of endless weal or wo, with an immortal soul? Nothing, and less than nothing, in the comparison. Infinite consequences are made to depend on the cast of a die. We must run the risk, whether we will or no, of not only suffering endless damnation ourselves, but, if we become parents, of bringing into the world our tender offspring as candidates for that immortal wo!

7. If the doctrine of endless damnation be true, and the views of its advocates generally be correct, that this short life affords the only chance of avoiding that awful doom, or of securing endless bliss, then the chances of damnation to mankind generally, compared to the chances of salvation, are certainly as great as ten to one against the latter; especially when we consider the millions on millions of heathen that live and die without ever hearing mentioned that only name given under heaven among men, whereby we may be saved; the millions on millions that live and die in Mahommedan superstition or Jewish unbelief, and the millions on millions that live in nominally Christian countries and communities, under any and all influences except those favorable to truth and virtue; and when we think, too, of the thousand different roads that different religious teachers point out as right, and the impossibility of knowing with certainty whether either of them is right! Can it be possible that God has created a world of intelligences, and suspended their endless weal or wo on such contingences—nay, on such very unfavorable terms to human salvation? Surely not, if he be a just being.

8. I am aware that the advocates of your doctrine profess to believe the attribute of justice favors endless punishment; but I know of no attribute in the Divine character farther from giving countenance to so dreadful a theory. The ground commonly assumed by them, is, that sin, being committed against an infinite and holy God, is an infinite evil, and therefore justly deserves an infinite and endless penalty. But this ground is entirely false and untenable, for the following reasons: 1. Man is a finite being, limited both in knowledge and power, whether for good or evil, and can therefore never commit an infinite act—a finite cause can not produce an infinite effect—a stream can not rise higher than its fountain. 2. If sin be infinite, it is equal to God, (he being no more than infinite,) and would be as likely to destroy him as he would be to destroy sin. 3. If sin be infinite for the reason assigned, then all sins are infinite, and there are, instead of being but one strict infinity in the universe, an infinite number of infinites, each of which is equal to God. 4. Then all distinction between crimes is destroyed; all are of equal magnitude—a child, for stealing an apple, is equally guilty with the blasphemers against the Holy Ghost, and murderous Jews who crucified the Lord of life and glory; whereas the Scriptures clearly point out different degrees of guilt and punishment for those that knew and disobeyed, and those that knew not and disobeyed their Lord's will.—Luke xii: 47, 48. 5. If sin be infinite and justly deserve endless punishment, then justice requires what it can never receive—or it can be satisfied with nothing short of endless dissatisfaction, (which is a solecism,) for what is always doing, is never done; and the time can never come when it can be said justice is satisfied, (or if it should, it would prove that justice did not require endless punishment.) Moreover, if every sin justly deserve endless punishment, then every sinner deserves to suffer as many eternities of wo as he has ever committed sins; and as he can never suffer but one eternity of misery, (and that he never will have fully suffered,) all his other sins must forever remain unpunished, and justice, of course, can never be satisfied.

9. These arguments against the infinity of sin being incontrovertible, and the Bible declaring repeatedly that God is just, and that he will render to every man according to his works, at the same time declaring, that all have sinned and come short of the glory of God—that he is both a just God and a Saviour—it follows, necessarily, that endless punishment can not be just. No number of finite sins can ever make an infinite sin; nor can any number of finite penalties ever amount to an infinite one. No number of limited or finite periods of duration can ever amount to eternity. Allow punishment, if you please, to endure an age, or ages of ages, or as many ages as there are sands on the sea shore, and drops of water in the ocean, and that number multiplied thrice ten thousand times into itself, still it is not eternity, nor any part or portion thereof. But, as is already proved, all sins are finite, so all just punishment must be finite or limited also.

10. Justice, it is true, requires the infliction of a righteous retribution on the transgressor; but not the infliction of an injury or infinite evil. It never did nor can require the infliction of an unmerciful punishment, nor does mercy ever forbid the infliction of a just punishment. These are not opposing but harmonious attributes—God is not divided against himself. The very rod that justice raises, is guided by the hand of mercy. "Justice and judgment are the habitation of God's throne; mercy and truth go before his face." The foregoing arguments, founded on the justice of God, all go directly against the doctrine of endless punishment, and indirectly in favor of universal salvation; nay, so far as you and I are concerned, I may say, directly. For with us there are but two alternatives, viz., endless misery on the one hand, and universal salvation on the other, both of us rejecting annihilation. But there is another argument still more direct and conclusive in favor of the doctrine of universal salvation, founded on the justice of God.

11. The argument is this—not that man can justly claim, on the score of merit, or as the reward of good works, endless beatitude—for salvation is of grace, not of works, and after we have done all we are commanded to do, we are still unprofitable servants, having done no more than mere duty—but for the same reason that God requires all men to be holy because he is holy, he also requires all to be just because he is just: and as he requires all to be just, he will most assuredly seek and employ means of rendering them so. His justice can never be satisfied with the endless injustice of man: nor will any thing short of the entire conformation of man—of man universally—to its righteous principles, ever fully satisfy the claims of divine justice, or the demands of the righteous law of the Most High. His law is the law of eternal justice: and that demands of all, the exercise of love supreme to God and universal to man. And respecting the accomplishment of the grand design of this righteous law of God, we are expressly assured by the Saviour, that one jot or tittle of the law shall in no wise fail, but all shall be fulfilled. Now love, and love only, is the fulfilling of the law; and when we consider what the requirement of the divine law is, and that every jot and tittle of it shall be fulfilled, it is evident that all mankind will be just and righteous, yielding strict obedience thereto, and thereby fulfilling the law; than which it is evident nothing else can fully satisfy the divine justice.

12. God is true.—"A God of truth, without iniquity"—"just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints." His "truth and mercy meet together."—Deut. xxxii: 4; Ps. lxxxv: 10; Rev. xv: 3. God "hath spoken of the restitution of all things, by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began."—Acts iii: 21. For the accomplishment of this testimony, he hath also pledged his irrevocable oath.—Isa. xlv: 23, 24. Nor will he "alter the thing that is gone out of his mouth."—Ps. lxxxix: 28–35. "That by two immutable things in which it is impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before us, which hope we have as an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast, [no uncertainty about it,] and which entereth into that within the vail."—See and compare Gen. xii: 3; xxii: 16–18; Acts iii: 20–26; Heb. vi: 13–20. Now "God is not a man that he should lie, nor the son of man that he should repent: hath he said, and shall he not do it? or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good?"—Numb. xxiii: 19. So far from this, he says, "My word that goeth forth out of my mouth, shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it."—Compare Isa. xlv: 22–25, with Isa. lv: 11. God "hath given us eternal life, [whether we believe it or not,] and this life is in his Son." The burden of his Gospel is "eternal life, which God, that can not lie, promised before the world began." 1 John v: 10, 11; Tit. i: 2. And his promises are "not yea and nay; for all the promises of God in him are yea, and in him Amen, unto the the glory of God by us."—2 Cor. i: 19, 20. "For what if some did not believe? shall their unbelief make the faith [or faithfulness] of God without effect? God forbid; yea, let God be true, but every man a liar."—Rom. iii: 3, 4. "If we believe not, yet he abideth faithful; he can not deny himself."—2 Tim. ii: 13. Faith can never make truth, nor unbelief destroy it. Truth is truth, whether we believe it or not. Our unbelief deprives us, for the time being, of the enjoyment of the truth; but can never change truth into falsehood, nor disannul the irrevocable oath of the immutable Jehovah, who is declared to be "the Saviour of all men."—1 Tim. iv: 10. Thus the truth of God clearly sustains the doctrine of universal salvation. But this will be exhibited more at length hereafter.

13. God is the universal Parent or Father of all mankind. "Have we not all one Father? Hath not one God created us?" "God created man in his own image." "Know ye that the Lord, he is God; it is he that hath made us, and not we ourselves." "God.....hath made of one blood all nations of men." He is, therefore, "the Father of spirits"—yea, "the God of the spirits of all flesh." "All ye are brethren." "One is your Father which is in heaven."—Gen. i: 27; Numb. xxvii: 16; Ps. c: 3; Mal. ii: 10; Acts xvii: 24–26; Heb. xii: 9; Matt. xxiii: 8, 9. Though all mankind are the offspring of God, and he stands in the relation of Father to them, yet all do not know the fact, all are not yet characteristically his children—some of them "having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them," Eph. iv: 18, and others are "alienated and enemies in their minds by wicked works."—Col. i: 21. Yet this does not destroy the relationship between the parent and the child. God requires every sinner on earth to pray, saying, "Our Father which art in heaven.....forgive us our sins." Christ calls him the "Father" of those whose characters were "evil."—Matt. vii: 11. Though many of the children, heirs of promise, may, during their minority—their ignorance and unbelief—be "under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the Father"—may differ nothing from servants, being "in bondage under the elements of the world," yet when the fulness of time is come, because they are sons, God will send forth the spirit of his Son into their hearts, crying, Abba, Father. Wherefore they are no more servants, but sons; and if sons, then heirs of God through Christ, who hath tasted death for every man.—See Gal. iv: 1–8; Heb. ii: 9.

14. How cheering the thought, that God is our Father—the Father of all mankind—and will eternally stand in this endearing relationship, and love us as a father! If there were one soul in the universe to whom God's parental affection did not extend, that soul would be forever absolved from all obligations of love, gratitude, and obedience to him. But as God had no coadjutor in becoming the parent of mankind—as no cause operated on him but his own eternal nature, will, and purpose—being self-moved, alone, and knowing exactly what all men would be—he voluntarily became the parent of our race—no cause, aside from himself, can ever destroy this relationship, or divert his parental regard from the children he has created.—See Isa. xlix: 15; Matt. vii: 11; Rom. viii: 38, 39. These positions being incontrovertibly established, both by revelation and reason, no other legitimate conclusion can follow than this, that God will eternally seek the final and best good of his children universally, and of course, will render all men ultimately holy and happy.

15. God is immutable.—"He is in one mind and who can turn him?" "I am the Lord, I change not, therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed." He is "the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning."—Job xxiii: 13; Mal. iii: 6; James i: 17. God is necessarily immutable, because of his self-existence and absolute perfections. No cause can ever operate to produce a change in him who is uncaused, independent, and infinite in all his attributes. Is God now omniscient? he will eternally remain omniscient? Is he now infinite in benevolence? he will endlessly remain the same to every being he has ever created. Is he now omnipotent, omnipresent, infinitely holy, merciful, just, true, and paternal? he will endlessly and immutably continue the same. Did we suppose God were liable to change, however lovely, amiable, and perfect his character might now appear, we could have no ground of rational and lasting confidence in him. Did we think him capable of loving to-day and hating to-morrow, or turning to be the enemy hereafter of those he is now friendly to, we should sink in despair, and tremble at the very thought of God. But now we know that, whatever changes man may experience, either in feelings or condition, God can never experience the slightest change either in affections, will, or purpose. No vicissitudes, no events of time or eternity, can ever affect him. As all his perfections are now in favor of the ultimate holiness and happiness of all mankind, so they eternally and unalterably will remain in favor of it. As he now wills the salvation of all, and is in one mind, and none can turn him, his will can never be changed. "Not one of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken—for the Lord is our Judge, the Lord is our Lawgiver, the Lord is our King; he will save us."—Isa. xxxiii: 20, 22.

Yours in faithfulness,

A REQUEST,

IN A LETTER TO ONE OF THE EDITORS.

You are doubtless aware, that one of the forms in which the "enmity of the world" against the religion of Jesus, is shown, is that which consists in what may be called pride of intellect. So many puny exhibitions of intellect and of passion, may be observed in those who call themselves the followers of Jesus, and it is so easy to shut one's eyes to any exhibition of masculine intellect and pure devotion, that with many there is cherished an impression that the subject of Christianity is beneath the notice of cultivated and energetic minds. When to those who are thus minded, are quoted such instances of intellectual giants as Newton, Milton, Locke—all of whom found in the revelations of God to man, enough to interest, occupy, and I may add, improve and ennoble their super-eminent powers—they are ingenious to find a mode of retreat, no matter how unphilosopher-like the loop-hole by which they escape. For example, Newton, they say, was superannuated and partially insane when he devoted his time to religious studies; and to substantiate this, they misstate facts and dates. Sir D. Brewster, in his Life of Sir Isaac Newton, has triumphantly repelled this insinuation of the French philosophers, and very ably advocated the claims of Christianity to a paramount rank above all secular studies. I think, if you would quote the 16th chapter of that work, or such portions of it as more directly tend to nullify this not uncommon prejudice against the system of the greatest Philosopher, you would contribute to the cause of Christianity, and beside your own comments, there will be others, I doubt not, elicited among your many readers. To many, at least, the subject will be interesting.

We will endeavor to comply with the request of our correspondent, on the last page of some future number of our paper. E. H. C.

QUERIES.

If "death shall be destroyed, and him that had the power of death, that is the devil," (Heb. ii: 14,) who will reign king of the fiery pit to all eternity? And if the time ever arrives when "there shall be no more pain," (Rev. xxi: 4,) who will be his subjects? John.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JUNE 1, 1838.

PUNISHMENT.—NO. III.

I did intend, when I first wrote the heading of the first number, to furnish a few brief, well arranged numbers on this important subject. But such has been the hurry and confusion of mind induced by a variety of cares and employments, that I have been barely able to go on in a very careless and desultory manner—writing each article under the necessity of furnishing it immediately for the compositor, and unable to stop to refer to an author, or even to consider whether what I was writing would chime in with what went before, or was to follow after. However, I have filled a budget, and emptied it before the reader—he can select what best pleases him, and arrange it to suit himself. And as I desire to conclude the articles in hand as soon as possible, with the intention of resuming the subject before many years, I may as well conclude with an extract from one of my own sermons—which, if any have heard it, they will not remember. And though it presents no new ideas, yet they are such as, in my humble opinion, can not be too deeply impressed upon the public mind. The day, I hope is not far distant when they will be acted upon in this land of Christianity and humanity; and when it comes, it will usher in a glorious period for man—for saint and sinner.

One great error of mental philosophy and false theology, which has been incorporated into our penal codes, is that which considers every criminal to be governed by the same motives, and influenced by the same principles and temptations. This error, which teaches the sameness of all minds, has done much mischief in our codes of education as well as logislation. Instead of considering the human mind as a blank sheet of paper, on which you can write what you please—or, according to Partialism, as a lump of total depravity, wholly inclined to evil, and needing the same degree of miraculous regeneration—we must learn to regard it as composed of a great number of faculties, and as infinitely varied as the different degrees of power and capacity of each, and developed, not only by internal impulses, but by external favorable or unfavorable circumstances. Then, instead of finding the miser and the spendthrift—the rich man and the poor one, with the same pecuniary tax, for the same crime, we will endeavor to apportion the punishment that it may be equally felt by all. Instead of prescribing the same remedy for all criminals, we will endeavor to vary them according to their respective characters and dispositions, so as most speedily to reform each one.

The man who naturally loves solitude, will not suffer as severely in solitary confinement, as he who lives only in the social circle—nor will he who loves bodily labor, suffer as much in undergoing his daily drudgery, as he who loves most of all a sedentary employment and study—and so of the rest. It follows, that if we would punish merely to reform, and render our prisons and penitentiaries GREAT MORAL HOSPITALS—as Christianity and humanity, nature and self-interest require us to do—we will observe differences of character and disposition, and place each in the proper condition, and surround each with the proper motives and circumstances, and give to each the proper instruction suited thereto, and best calculated speedily and permanently to reform the criminal and benefit mankind. This is now done in insane asylums with great success, and surely it can be done with similar success in our moral asylums, or prisons and penitentiaries.

But, it is said there are some who can not be reformed. They are so wholly animal, that nothing but severity and pain will restrain them—what shall be done with these? When punishment can not awaken the intellect to perceive the nature of vice, and the moral powers to govern the propensities, I would say, they are incurables, and the preservation of community demands their perpetual restraint and confinement, as in the case of the incurably insane. But such cases are fewer than we now suppose, if a right treatment is but pursued in regard to them. And when they do occur, we may say, in the words of the prophet—"Why should they be stricken any more? they will but revolt more and more." They are men, whose minds, by some causes, have degenerated into a species of moral idiocy, and lost their freedom of action—but they still are men for whom Christ died—whom God loves, and whom we are bound to compassionate the more, because they are unable to help themselves.—Confine them for life—treat them humanely and kindly—make them as happy and useful as their condition and your safety will permit, and thus do your duty, though they are unable to do theirs.

Capital punishment—or killing a man because he can not be reformed, (or to save community from his evil practices,) can not be allowed until every other means fail to secure him. Unless God will ultimately cast off his criminals forever, we can not be justified in cutting ours off from existence.

But it may be said that to consider vice as a disease of the soul, and to turn our penitentiaries into moral hospitals, is to take away the accountability of the criminal. Not so—no more than he whose illness has been caused by a reckless violation of the laws of health, is absolved from accountability by being treated as a patient. The Bible speaks of sin as a moral malady, and of the Saviour of sinners as a great Physician of souls, and I would go no further than the record of God's word authorizes and requires. God's views of sin and sinners can not be wrong—and we are not departing from duty in acting on them.

Some may fear that it will lead the sinner into crime, if he is treated with compassion and kindness, and only punished for his good. The insane and the sick are treated thus; yet who ever knew a man neglect the laws of his physical nature, or brood over an evil until he became insane, merely that bitter medicines might be crammed down his throat to cure him—that he might be confined in an asylum or a hospital, and treated as an insane or a sick man? Of all absurdities, this objection to emendatory punishments is the most ridiculous—yet how frequently is it gravely urged?

Let us, of all sects, unite to try the experiment of treating the sinner as Jesus treated him—as a man and a brother—and endeavor to reclaim him by the laws of love and kindness. It will be time enough to fear evil, when our efforts fail of success. A. B. G.

"BE NOT OVERCOME OF EVIL."

Evil exists every where in this world, and all of us are more or less subject to its influences. There are physical, mental and moral evils—there are social and political evils—evils external and internal—all of which, to a greater or lesser extent, lie in every pathway, beset every avenue, and surround every station in life.—Happy is the man or woman who can so confidently rely on the support of divine Providence, and repose in the calm of a satisfied and approving conscience, as not to be overcome of any of the evils that fall to their lot in life.

Evils are most frequently of our own creation—that is, all that are truly annoying and grievous evils—for all others are easily endured, or can be avoided or overcome, by the calm and satisfied mind. But when the soul turns traitor to itself—when the evils of the inner man war in union with the propensities of the carnal mind, oh, how fatal the strife—how terrific the combat—how great the desolation of their victory! Nothing but a steady, patient, careful cultivation of the moral, religious and intellectual faculties of man, can secure us from being overcome by our own evils.

Let the poor, tempest beaten and sin wearied soul, flee to the Gospel of him who was tempted in all points as we are and yet without sin, and who, having suffered temptation, is able to succor those that are tempted, and he will there find a port of rest and peace—a haven of joy and purity. There are motives presented in the Christian religion, great as earth can contain or heaven yield, perfectly adapted to every nature and suited to every want of the soul, which, if carefully sought out and diligently practiced, will cultivate all that is good and holy in man's nature—all that can yield to purity and virtue—and will thus give to his spiritual nature the government and absolute control of his animal powers, and bring his entire body in subjection to the law of Christ.

Are you a mourner? The evils you suffer can not overcome a soldier of the cross—the hope that lights the tomb turns all its gloom to glory, and shows you

> What you "now deplore > Raised to full immortal prime,"
> Blooming to fade no more.

Do you rejoice amid your friends, and the bounties of Providence? Be not overcome of the hidden dangers and lurking evils that lie under the strewed roses that cover your path; but using this world as not abusing it, and your possessions as a gift committed to your stewardship, employ them as you think their Giver would have you employ them, that day by day your conscience may freely whisper the applauding commendation—"Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Are you in the vale of lowly life, and possessed of but few of this world's goods? See that you contrast what you want with the incomparable riches of the Gospel of Christ, and your longings for more will be weakened. There you have your share of the great, immortal, endless legacy which God has bequeathed to each of his children—there you have the assurance that you are as rich as the richest of earth's children—and that assurance will, even now, atone for all the petty wants and cares of your lowly and destitute station. Be not overcome of evil, then, but endeavor really to enjoy what you have, and humbly hope, while you honestly endeavor to increase your store. Give not way to fears and distrust—let not envy of the rich corrode your soul—suffer not repining to cloud the light of your faith and gratitude—"be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with" a thankful heart, a trusting spirit, a hope of better things, and a feeling of benevolence towards your richer, and more exalted neighbors, who, lacking your means of happiness, are poor indeed.

Does the sun of prosperity rise on your darkened fortunes, and gild your pathway with the lustre of wealth? Be not overcome of its evils—be not lifted up with the pride it is apt to inspire—be not led astray by its glitter, from your true foundation on the Rock of Ages, and your only real joys, the happiness of a heart filled with love to God and man. But your meekness and humility increasing with your elevation in life, and your benevolence and sympathy for human suffering becoming deeper and more extended as you find the means of doing good, you will be able to make your increase of wealth an increase of purest happiness, and to cause others to rejoice in, and wish for your increased and increasing prosperity.

Have you found acceptance, favor and peace with God and man?—"Watch and pray, lest you be led into temptation." "Be not overcome of evil"—for these happy gifts are too apt to render careless the soul of man—to induce the feeling that all is gained that is worth admiring, and that it is so securely gained, that nothing of it can be lost. The favor of God long enjoyed, is sometimes—ah, indeed, too often!—apt to beget a lurking feeling that it is our merit that induced God to bestow it—or, our merit that we retain it—and then, alas, the Saint becomes a Pharisee—a despiser of publicans and sinners, instead of a lover of the whole human family. Oh, when you find these feelings beginning to pervade your souls—go to your retirements—pray humbly to God to be merciful to you, a sinner—falling—falling—if not already fallen from heavenly places in Christ

Jesus, into an abyss of spiritual pride and hypocrisy—into sin greater than any sin you can despise in those who never knew, never possessed the glorious privileges you enjoyed.

Well said an acient pious writer—"God, be kind to sinners—for the saints I ask nothing, God has done every thing for them, in causing them to love Him."—But when the love of God becomes mere love of self, the saint becomes the great sinner, and most truly needs this prayer. "Keep me from still waters," says the old proverb; "from that which is rough I will keep myself." The calm is often more dangerous than the storm—the hour of unsuspected enjoyment, than that of watchful privation and want. "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome" every "evil with good."

"Be not overcome of the evils" of your fellow-beings—and not only so, "but overcome their evil with good—this is the positive, concluding and complete injunction of the text. The first part obeyed, leaves man only innocent of guilt; but the whole text obeyed makes him godlike in character—holy in action. I say godlike; for the whole force, obligation and merit of the injunction consists in the fact that God overcomes evil—that by manifesting his love to those who hate him, he causes them to love him in return—that by forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin, he leads us to forgive those who trespass against us. Oh, then let us not be overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good! A. B. G.

CORRECTIONS.

So long as the wisest of our race are acknowledged liable to make mistakes, no one need be surprised to find himself wrong once in a while, nor ashamed to be under the necessity of recalling what he has stated amiss. It is with pleasure that I correct the following, though I regret that they ever occurred.

1. I supposed I had fully explained to Br. T. P. Abell all important circumstances connected with his visit to Virginia, in a letter I wrote him at the request of Br. Skinner. But when we met, it appeared that a particular which appeared unimportant to me, but was really important to him, had escaped my notice in writing. This, together with a reasonable belief that the climate might be injurious to his health in the latter part of the Summer, and a prospect of locating himself more permanently in his native State, induced him to decline going, after he reached this city. And though his not going may be regretted, and may be a disappointment to some, yet no blame can be attached to any one, least of all to him.—His announced removal is therefore only a removal from Perry, but not to Richmond, Va. Br. Chapin went on alone.

2. In our religious notices last week, we sent Br. O. Roberts to Dunkirk, and to remain in Chautauque county in June, instead of Br. H. Roberts. As it may not be as easy for them to exchange purposes as it was for us, (or the writer of the notice,) to put an O instead of an H, we hereby correct our error. There is a great deal of trouble in having so many Smiths, Browns, Ballous, and Roberts in the field, unless care be taken to give each one his proper initials.

3. As we changed a gentleman's name, and with it his wife's, without their consent, or due form of law, we hereby restore it, by saying, that in the hymenial notice of Br. Cook, in No. 19, the name of Ransom Turmicliffe, should have been Ransom Tunnicliffe.

WESTERN ASSOCIATIONS.

I purpose being present at the Association in Lewiston, next Wednesday and Thursday—spending the next Sunday somewhere in that vicinity, the third Sunday in June in Fredonia, and lecturing in the evening in Dunkirk, and attending the Genesee Association in Morganville on the third Wednesday and Thursday in June.—It is doubtful whether I will be able to be at Centreville, Allegany county on the last week in June. I will be ready to transact business concerning the paper, and hope our agents will be able to make our prospects a little brighter than they have been for some time past. When it is considered how many are directly or indirectly interested in this notice, I trust to be excused for thus giving it in a separate article—and when it is considered how sadly we have been situated for a year past, I trust this allusion to my hopes and business in this long intended but often delayed visit to the western part of this State, may be forgiven. We will see.

THE RECORD.

It is possible—yea, even probable, that some omissions may occur in this department of the paper, during the time of extra duty imposed upon me, in the necessity of attending the Convention and Associations during the present month, as Br. Bartlett is not yet fully initiated into all the "art and mystery" of Editorship.—Indeed, trifling as the Record may seem to most readers, I find in it a difficulty greater than in any other department of the paper—obituary, hymenial, and religious notices excepted. To some, the record appears unimportant, and some there are who have advised its discontinuance. But it is important to all who wish correct statistical information, or whose correspondence in the order may be extensive; and the mode I have adopted, gives, certainly, the greatest amount of information, in the least room.

The Hartford county (Conn.) Association met at Broad Brook, May 9th, Br. B. Kinsley, Moderator; Br. A. Moore, Clerk. Br. James B. Carpenter was appointed Standing Clerk, vice Br. R. O. Williams, resigned—Br. Moore to preach the next occasional sermon—delegates were appointed to the State Convention in August next.

Sermons were delivered by Brs. Williams and Moore, assisted by Br. Chaffee. Adjourned to meet on the second Wednesday and Thursday in May, 1839, at place to be designated by the Standing Clerk.

Removals.—Ill health has induced Br. A. Case to request his dismission from the society in Plymouth, Mass. Br. A. C. Barray has removed from Victor. Br. T. J. Whitcomb has removed from Schenectady to Victor.

New Meetinghouses.—The Universalists in Danby, Vt., are erecting a house 38 by 54 feet, with a basement story. Another is being erected in Albion, Me.

A VOICE TO YOUTH.

This excellent work, so well known to our readers of the last and present volumes, is now in the hands of the binder, and will be in this and the Eastern market in a few weeks. This, in reply to some questions on the subject. A. B. G.

THE REGISTER FOR 1839.

Thanks to Br. Whittemore for his notice of the transfer of the Universalist Register and Almanac, and his friendly hint for the improvement thereof in point of correctness. It was followed before received, by sending letters to brethren in various sections, requesting their early attention to corrections, additions, etc. But we were unable to furnish them with copies for 1837 in time—they will please do the best they can, without, and we will rectify on receiving their returns.

May I urge on each one whom I addressed, the necessity of our having their returns as early before July 1st, as they can furnish them. A. B. G.

THE KNICKERBOCKER.

For a few months past, I have not paid that notice and tribute of praise to this Prince of Monthlies, which are its due. I therefore the more readily call the attention of our able and literary readers to it, as its twelfth volume is soon to commence a career of increasing merit and excellence. Very seldom, indeed, have I been able to find any fault in the work—every number is one of excellence—and although my taste might not relish equally each number, or even the articles in any one number, I always feel satisfied after a perusal of its pages, that there are those of good taste and judgment, who will highly relish what to me seems but common-place. Though in justice I must say, that there are few that I would deem common-place articles in the work, and for volumes past, the merit of the work has been on the increase.

The past year has been one of great difficulty for all publishers, (as we of the Magazine and Advocate verily believe from our own experience,) and it would be a wonder if they of the Knickerbocker had not felt it, among the rest. But from the following notice, it will be seen that they are refitting after the storm, and will soon do away all the injury sustained. Success to them.

A. B. G.

"The New Volume.—Our stores for the 12th volume, which will commence on the first of July, are accumulating. We have a secret pride in the belief that we shall not a little SURPRISE our readers by the extent and character of the literary resources which will be exhibited in that volume. We indulge the more confidently in this belief, because we are even now enabled to contrast what has been done, of which the reader can judge, with what may be done, of which we can judge. We may mention here, by way of explanation—having before alluded, in a 'promissory note,' to the subject—that 'The Atlantines, a Romance of America,' by John Galt, Esq., author of 'Annals of the Parish,' 'Laurie Todd,' etc., dedicated to Philip Hone, Esq., will be reserved for continuous publication in the numbers of the new series."

RURAL REPOSITORY.

The publisher of this paper has issued his prospectus for the fifteenth volume. Remarkably neat in its typographical appearance, interesting and instructive in its matter, and coming to us from an old friend, we sincerely recommend it to the public. Those who wish to take a literary journal and who do not feel able to subscribe for one of our larger periodicals, and even those who do, we think will be pleased with this agreeable and cheap little semi-monthly.

The first number of the next volume, will be issued on the 23d of June. Terms—one dollar per annum in advance, or one dollar and fifty cents at the expiration of three months from the time of subscribing. William B. Stoddard, publisher, Hudson, N. Y. E. H. C.

Br. Hayward is informed that the remittance for A. Bates and J. Packard was received.

Br. Price—Transfer H. L. Hayward's paper from Hermon to Russell, St. Lawrence county. Credit him $2, and charge G. and H.

Br. Rogers—Send Pro and Con to Daniel M. Green. and Wm. Shipman, Middlefield, Otsego county, N. Y Credit each $1, and charge G. and H.

BACK NUMBERS.

Those who order the paper for new subscribers will please inform us whether they wish for the back numbers. We can supply back numbers, but shall not after this, unless so directed. G. and H.

A CARD.

Br. T. P. Abell takes this opportunity of expressing his sincere gratitude to James H. Bolton, of Leicester, and Sanford Armstrong, of Perry, for the substantial tokens of friendship which he has received at their hands.

Br. S. R. Smith has removed to No. 89 Herkimer street, corner of Franklin street, Albany.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in June, by Br. Aspinwall, at Eatonville—Br. Barnes in Springwater—Br. Queal, in Salina—Br. Bullard, in Truxton.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. Barnes, in Bristol—Br. Queal, in Salina—Br. Waggoner, in Collinsville—Br. Aspinwall, in Watertown—Br. W. Martin, in Fulton.

CHILD OF THE MIST.

BY MISS S. C. ELGARTON.

Child of the mist, come with me to the sun!
Thy brow is dark and heavy with despair;
Come where the rays of hope, the Holy One
Sheds on the creatures of his sleepless care.
How sad thine eyes, poor child of gloomy doubt!
How downcast on the clouded earth they rest!
Come from the vale of misty shadows out,
And dwell within the vineyard of the blest.

Thou art but finite—why then ask to know
The hidden wanderings of the God of Heaven?
Thy ways are thine, and his are his to go—
But where, is knowledge not to mortals given!
Then why, because upon thy tender eye,
He pours not all his dazzling floods of light,
Wilt thou reject his radiant love, and lie
Buried in shadows of a starless night?

What though He wraps himself in clouds of wrath,
And makes the everlasting mountains bow?
Lo! in the sky, along his vaulted path
Glows the bright signet of his ancient vow!
What though he scatters the perpetual hills,
And drives asunder nations with his sword?
One gentle look the raging tempest stills,
And the whole earth reposes at his word!

Child of the mist, come with me to the sun!
Cast off the veil that dumps thy cheek with tears,
Come where the eye of the Eternal One,
With beams of love the stricken spirit cheers.
This is the New Jerusalem on earth!
A city radiant with balmy light;
Where smiling children of the second birth
Walk with their God in robes of stainless white.

RITES OF BURIAL IN TURKEY.

The interment of a corpse according to the ritual of the English church had always, to my mind, a striking solemnity in Turkey. On passing through the streets to the place of burial, innumerable eyes of strangers, of a diversity of nations, gaze fixedly upon the scene. All is still. The pursuits of business are suspended; a lucid interval appears to be imparted to the delirium of folly and sin: and, when the muffled drum, and martial step, which accompany to the dust the body of an English sailor, add their interest to the procession, the feelings of spectators are wrought up to no common pitch of excitement. During the reading of the burial service, more especially at Constantinople, where the English burial ground is in a place exceedingly public, a solemn attention arrests all present, even though to few the language is intelligible. Turks, Greeks, Armenians, Jews, and Christians, appear to have forgotten their animosities, and, at the grave of death, to have recollected that a common fate awaits them all. However distinct they may be from each other in the enjoyments and attainments of life, and, however they may differ in what is much more momentous—the prospect of immortality—still is there an awful uniformity, which unites in one inseparable communion the men of all ranks, of all ages, and of all religions:—dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return.

Very frequently, whilst you are silently engaged in your apartment, the stillness of a Turkish town, where no rumbling of wheels is ever heard, is interrupted by the distant sound of the funeral chant of the Greek priests. As the voices grow more loud, you hasten to the window to behold the procession. The priests move first, bearing their burning tapers, and, by their dark and flowing robes, give an idea of mourning in harmony with the occasion. The corpse is always exhibited to full view. It is placed upon a bier, which is borne aloft upon the shoulders, and is dressed in the best and gayest garments possessed by the deceased. I have sometimes seen a young female, who had departed in the bloom of life and beauty, adorned rather as a bride to meet the bridegroom, than as one who was to be the tenant of the chamber of corruption. The young man at Nain, who was restored to life by the command of our Saviour, was doubtless carried on a bier of this kind.—When our Lord intimated the design of interposing in his favor, they that bare him stood still. And when the miraculous energy was exerted, he that was dead sat up, and began to speak. I believe it is unusual for any of the Orientals to be buried in coffins.

The closing part of the Greek burial service, commencing with the words, "Come and impart the last embrace," is very affecting. The friends of the departed press forward from every part of the church, and kiss his cold and pallid lips, and weep over him. It is considered a very peculiar mark of disrespect to neglect this last office of affection.—Hartley.

A GOOD RULE IN READING THE BIBLE.

It would be a good rule to observe in reading the Bible, to disregard as much as possible the division into chapters and verses. This division is entirely arbitrary and often injurious, separating what should remain in close connexion, and rendering obscure what if left in its original state would have been plain. This remark is true of the chapters, but is still more important in its application to the verses, as these not only occur more frequently, but seem to have been introduced in most cases without any regard to the sense or connexion of the passage. In the Epistles this evil is felt more than in any other part of the Bible, because, from the nature of the composition and particularly from the character of the apostolic letters, any division not founded on an understanding of the writer's purpose and plan, must only disfigure and darken his work. The Epistles contain elaborate argument, the force of which is lost by a distribution into independent propositions; they abound in the language of strong feeling, which should not be weakened by an artificial arrangement.

Our sacred books were originally written even without a division into sentences or words, but in a continuous succession of letters. This was one inconvenience. We have gone to the opposite extreme. In reading we should if possible overlook these interruptions of the sense, and should make those divisions both into larger and into smaller paragraphs which appear to us to be demanded by the sense.

A copy of the Bible, in which the chapters and verses were noted in the margin but not separated from one another in the text, would be preferable to those in common use. Two editions of the New Testament printed in this manner, have been lately published in Boston.—One is the common version reprinted exactly according to the usual text, but not broken up into these hurtful divisions. It was first printed in octavo, but a cheaper edition that cost little more than a common Testament, was published the last Summer. The other edition is "the common version, conformed to Griesbach's standard Greek text;" i. e. the common translation is altered only in those places in which Griesbach, who published a more accurate Greek Testament than any one before him, amended the errors of the copies from which the version which we use was made. This book has, therefore, a double claim for preference over the common editions of the English New Testament—that it was prepared from a more correct Greek text, and that it is not injured by a servile regard to the chapters and verses. It has been printed both in octavo and in a smaller and less expensive form.

In using our common Bibles we may by a little effort, learn to disregard a division, which is useful only for the purposes of reference. We can read "right on" or pause in the midst of one of these sections, as shall seem to us most accordant with the meaning of the writer; and when we have learned thus to read the Bible, we shall find it a yet more pleasant and instructive book than it is now.—Scriptural Interpreter for September—1831.

There is a most admirable lesson contained in the following extract from Miss Hannah Moore's "Strictures on the Modern System of Female Education."

"Since then, there is a season when the youthful must cease to be young, and the beautiful to excite admiration; to learn to grow old gracefully is, perhaps, one of the rarest and most valuable acts that can be taught to woman. And it must be confessed, it is a most severe trial for those women to lay down their beauty, who have nothing else to take up. It is for this sober season of life, that education should lay up its rich resources. However disregarded they may have been, they will be wanted now. When admirers fall away, and flatterers become irksome, the mind will be driven to retire within itself, and if it finds no entertainment at home, it will be driven back again upon the world with increased force. Yet forgetting this, do we not seem to educate our daughters exclusively for the transient period of youth, when it is to maturer life we ought to advert? Do we not educate for a crowd, forgetting that they are to live at home?—for a crowd, and not for themselves?—for show, and not for use?—for time, and not for eternity?"

ADVERSITY.

Adversity resembles the black mountain of Bember, on the confines of the burning kingdom of Lahor; while you are ascending, you perceive nothing before you but barren rocks, but when you have gained the summit, you see the heavens over your head, and at your feet the delicious plains of Cashmere.—St. Pierre.

CHILDREN.

How easy, and artless, and beautiful, are all the motions of a child. Every thing that he does is graceful. All his little ways are endearing; and they are the arms which nature has given him for his protection, because they make every body feel an attachment for him.

INTEMPERANCE.—Take heed, therefore, that such a cureless canker does pass not thy youth, nor such a beastly infection thy old age; for then shall all thy life be but as the life of a beast, and after thy death thou shalt only leave a shameful infamy to thy posterity, who shall study to forget that such an one was their father.—Sir Walter Releigh.

When your reason and judgment gain an ascendancy over one evil propensity, consider the victory as worthy of perpetual commemoration.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 3d ult., by Rev. Mr. Savage, Mr. SIMON BUEL, of the firm of Williams and Buel, to Miss JULIA ANN ROGERS, all of this city.

DEATHS.

In Perry, Genesee county, May 3d, Mrs. ELIZA KINGSLEY, wife of Josiah Kingsley, aged 45 years.—She died of consumption, after a few months illness, which she bore with resignation and composure. She was an amiable and excellent woman, faithful in the discharge of the duties devolving upon her, and testified by her life and her death, that Universalism will do to live by and to die by. A large concourse of relatives and friends attended her funeral, to whom the consolations of the Gospel were tendered by Br. Abell. May Heaven's blessing rest upon the survivors, and lead them to say with resigned and believing hearts, "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord."

In Batavia, May 9th, Mrs. HOYT, aged 61 years.—She lingered long with consumption, which she bore with Christian fortitude and resignation. In her life and in her death were exemplified the graces and virtues inspired, and the consolations afforded, by a firm belief in God's universal benevolence. She was beloved as extensively as she was known, and will be most deeply mourned by those who knew her best. Funeral on the 11th—sermon by Br. Potter.

In the same place, on the 15th of May, JEFFERSON HOYT, son of the above named, aged 25 years. During the Winter he had resided at the South for his health, but to little effect, and had returned home just in season to behold his mother once more in time. She survived his return but a few days, and ere one week had elapsed, he was laid beside her in the tomb!—Thus has this worthy family been deprived of a beloved mother and brother—a wife mourns an affectionate and indulgent husband and society has lost two of its brightest ornaments.

He died reconciled to the will of God, firmly believing that he would be ransomed from the power of the grave, and redeemed from death, and join with the society of the blessed above in the song of salvation.

His funeral was attended on the following Thursday, by a numerous congregation, to whom the consolations of the Gospel were presented by the writer. May the richest of Heaven's blessings rest upon the afflicted, and reconcile them to these mournful events, in the assurance that he who afflicts, does so only for wise and benevolent purposes. R. UNIVERSALISM THE ONLY PERFECT SYSTEM OF MORALITY:

OR, FATHER B—— AND THE ORPHANS.

BY REV. T. J. SMITH.

In the Autumn of 183–, I was called from home in the State of C., to settle the estate of a deceased brother, in one of the western counties of the Empire State. In early boyhood I had heard much of that section of country, and the tales of the western wilds, together with the business I wished to accomplish, conspired to my leaving the scenes of early life with less reluctance. The preliminary arrangements for a journey being completed; the time of my departure at length arrived. A faithful horse alone, was to be my companion on the tedious journey of nearly four hundred miles.

There is a peculiar sensation in leaving a long loved home. Every endearing circumstance of days long gone by, seems to start anew into life, and plead with eloquence for our longer stay. We anticipate the vacant seat at the cheerful fireside—the joys of the social circle in which we often have participated—these we must forego for a season; and then there arises a fear that those scenes of enjoyment may not witness our return, or we again behold them in the same state in which we bid them "good bye." We trow there is not one heart filled with kindred love, but what has felt a touch of similar sensations,

> When duty called, and seemed to say,
> "Start on thy course—away, away."

The hour had arrived, and with a heavy heart I left, for the first time, the place of my nativity. While I journeyed on, my thoughts were still behind. But as I proceeded, these thoughts of loneliness gradually gave way to the various objects on every hand, that claimed at least a passing notice. Thus gazing on the ever varying scenes along the way, my mind sometimes feasted on the novelty of their appearance, then scorning, as it were, its humble habitation, would steal unconsciously away in retrospection, or stretch forward and hover around the place of my destination and the object of my toil. Thus busied, the three first days glided away, and I found myself nearly one hundred and fifty miles from home. With the dawning light of the next day, I began again my course toward the blue ridge of the western hills. The hoar frost was scattered in profusion over the lap of nature, so lately green with a luxuriant vegetation, and now adorned in a robe of snowy whiteness the grass of the fields and the leafy slumbering trees. The sun soon rolled up his golden face, and dispelled the icy appearance of midnight's labor. The wind seemed retired to its caves of rest, and loth to venture forth to disturb the pensive silence of the forests, now mourning their early fate in the dark habiliments of wo. In short, it was one of those still autumnal days, so congenial to the musings of the poet, or the sympathising temperament when grief has made deep inroads upon the feeling heart. The scenes it presented, were capable of touching the bosom of all who ponder on the works and revelations of nature; and from the visible things of creation, the mind is led to contemplate the being and essence of great nature's God. Suffice it to say, my thoughts were alternately employed between the two, and reflection on reflection filled my bosom.

Passing one of those high ridges of land so common to the interior of the State of New-York, and winding down its western side, I espied at some distance, the glittering spires of two churches, rising from the little village on the limited valley below. Some eighty or one hundred rods ahead, a mass of people were collected, and appeared to be erecting the frame of some building. I was obliged to pass a frail bridge, erected over a gulf, where apparently a mountain stream occasionally found a channel in its way to the ocean. At best, it was but a feeble thing, without a proper width, and having no side railings whatever. It was with a timorous spirit and trembling step, that my beast was induced, by much urging, to advance upon the tottering mass of wood stretched across a channel of some fifteen or twenty feet in depth. I did not take the precaution to alight, (as prudence dictated,) but pressed my horse along, and had nearly passed over, when some half dozen sheep that loved the shade, suddenly darted from beneath; my beast whirled with a bound, and stumbled—and here my senses forsook me!

When I came to myself, I was lost to all the circumstances that had brought me thus insensibly to a strange couch, in a strange place. Like one awakened from a mysterious dream, I cast my eyes around the room and attempted to rise, but found myself unequal to the task, or even to turn over upon the couch whereon I lay. Thus situated, I surveyed with more attention the place of my confinement, and found the room simply but tastefully furnished. On one side of the apartment stood a large casement of books, and near by hung two portraits, as large as life, while several smaller ones appeared on each side, as if to show in contrast man himself and his miniature, at the same view. Amusing myself in viewing the room and its furniture, I heard, indistinctly at first, from another apartment, the soft breathing of some musical air. The sound became more audible, as the feelings of the singer were more strongly imbued in the spirit of the theme. There was a peculiar sweetness in the sound, which reached the ear with such soothing melody, that every feeling of my bosom strove to utter a willing response to the enrapturing strain. It was a female's voice, and the words were now distinctly heard.

> "Oh, when will man his duty know,
> And kindness to his brethren show—
> Do unto all, as he would fain
> Receive of them in turn again—
> Wipe off the tear from sorrow's eye,
> Nor pass the bruised and wounded by—
> Bid every ill foreboding cease,
> And give the troubled bosom peace?
> The orphan's wants and woes relieve,
> Nor let the lonely widows grieve—
> Pass not the poor, the strangers, by,
> But ever all their wants supply?
> Religion pure this shall impress,
> That all are blest, who seek to bless;
> Let each alike our bounty share—
> None are beneath their Maker's care,
> Then learn this truth, and think and feel
> Of others' wo, of others' weal,
> And wisely act on Nature's plan,
> Man's duty to his fellow man."

The sound died away in echo. The sweetness of the voice seemed well adapted to the sentiment expressed, and awakened new emotions in my bosom. The strain ceased—but memory, still playful with the notes of harmony, combining the sound and sense, still lingered near, to delight my soul. My feelings were raised so high, that I involuntarily gave myself a turn on my couch, and to my astonishment, I beheld, in the farther part of the room a human form bending over a table, with one hand upon his forehead, while his elbow rested on the table. Evident signs of his long pilgrimage on earth, were visible in his snowy locks, and showed that the frosts of many a winter had been there. His forehead, deeply marked with the furrows of time rather than care, evidenced the tranquil peace of the soul within. His form was above the ordinary size, and though the muscular power seemed somewhat diminished, still there remained the visible marks of a once strong and vigorous man. Near him lay a large volume, which he did not attempt to peruse, but appeared to be pondering on its contents. Thus leaning over the sacred book, the words of which were unnoticed, yet all the powers of his soul were fixed on its truth, as well agreeing with his feelings, and amply able to gratify the ardent desires of every benevolent heart.

While I was thus contemplating the venerable form before me, he closed the book, and suddenly rising, cast his eyes toward me, then turned and left the room. Though he spake not, yet his countenance beamed with kindness at his departure. Being left again to myself, my reflective powers did not lack a subject to dwell upon.

A short period only elapsed before the door again opened, and a female made her appearance. She looked toward me a moment, then turned away without uttering a word. My eyes followed her around the apartment, as she adjusted the furniture, and busied herself in putting the room in order. By the mildness of her appearance, I fancied she was the same one who had charmed me so with her music. Her form was beautiful—apparently in the morning of life. No ornaments of art were necessary to set forth her charms, for nature's plastic hand had done it to perfection. My ears were soon saluted by the footsteps of some one advancing toward the place of my confinement; and presently a middle-aged man entered, bearing the almost constant "accompanies" of the men of "faculty," and having deposited his hat and nostrums on the table, approached and took my hand Having stood a moment, he turned from me and spoke to the fair attendant: "His fever has nearly left, and he appears like another man." After preparing a wash, he returned, when in a whisper, I asked the cause of my confinement and prospects of recovery. He replied, that the prospects were fair of my regaining speedily my health, and that I was confined in consequence of a severe bruise on the head.

"The two first nights," he continued, "the greater part of which I remained with you, the symptoms were very bad, and I had little or no faith of your being able again to speak. You are reduced very low, for I have taken a large quantity of blood, to prevent fatal effects from the wound on your head."

Having dressed the wound, he said, "Now, Sir, content yourself; you are in good hands, and doubtless, in a few days, will be able to attend to your business." Then telling the maiden that a little nourishment would be beneficial, and giving sundry directions, he took his leave,

The aliment was soon brought, when I asked the time I had been there. She told me it was then the fifth day since my arrival, and that I had not been left alone till that morning, in that time. I inquired the name of my benefactor, and where he was. She answered, "His name is B——; he is called in the neighborhood, 'father B.' He is now from home on a short journey, which he was ready to undertake when you were discovered in a senseless condition near the bridge from which both you and your horse had fallen. Your horse was fatally injured by the fall. Several persons had gathered round, but knew not what to do, until Father B—— arrived, and had you removed to his own house. Since that time he has been your constant attendant till this morning, when he left, and will not return short of several days."

"You are his daughter, I conclude, madam?"

"I am an adopted daughter, Sir. But I am fearful you may injure yourself by too much exertion. Wait until you have more strength, and you shall hear more about Father B—— and myself."

Being thus admonished to keep silence, I contented myself in the best manner possible, the two succeeding days, in which nothing occurred save the regular calls of the doctor, and the best of attention from the inmates. My strength increased rapidly, so much so, that toward night on the third day after a return of sensation, I was able to sit up in bed. Till this period, not feeling at liberty to be very loquacious, I had only ventured to speak of what related to myself; but now, being so much recovered, and my nurse, with the mistress of the house, being seated in my room, I ventured to ask a fulfilment of her promise in relating a brief history of Father B—— and herself. The reader may well suppose that I had a strong desire to become acquainted with those who, by their kind attention, had succeeded in warmly prepossessing me in their favor. After premising that she wished me to pardon the frequent mention of herself, since much in her life was closely interwoven with the character of Father B——, and hinting at the prerogative of the fair sex, (viz., of talking of what they please, and that in their own way, too,) she proceeded:

"My name is Harriet M——. An adjoining town is the place of my nativity. My parents were poor but respectable, and both members of a Calvinistic Baptist church. In my sixteenth year, there was an awakening, or revival of religion, in the neighborhood, and many were joined to the congregation worshipping in the Baptist church. I was one of the number, supposing, as I did, that I had experienced a radical change—being born again—and resting in the assurance that my calling and election were sure, and that my feet were placed in the path of Christian duty. In short, I entered the church with the best of intentions, with the warmest feelings and expectations of happiness. But, alas, how seldom are the hopes of mortals realized! The object is grasped, but it soon loses its novelty and its charms!

"A few months only rolled away, before the excitement had fully subsided, and the peculiar sensations attending my conversion, no longer yielded satisfaction. But such things are so common, and have been so frequently told, that it is needless for me to describe them.

"My father, who had ever been of a feeble constitution, was now confined to his room. For two or three years previous, he had been able to labor only a small share of the time, and having something of a family, (three children beside myself,) we were of course reduced to the very shadow of a living. Although I was able to earn a livelihood, as I had done for some time before, by the use of the needle, yet, as after his confinement my mother was unable to take proper care of him and the rest of the family alone, it was necessary for me to return home. The last of November I returned, and by my return, all hopes of obtaining any thing for myself or those connected with me by the tenderest ties, were cut off. It was with reluctance that I gave over my business, which brought me a comfortable living, and enabled me to spare an occasional trifle to relieve and comfort my parents. Yet how could I remain away, while a mother needed my assistance, and a father's suffering called aloud for my attendance? His disease was consumption, and on my arrival had nearly completed its work.

"Winter 'with his cold and chilling breath,' was approaching with hasty steps, and something more than thin shredded garments were requisite to shield our family from the inclemencies of the season. But necessary clothing was past our power to obtain. My father continued to linger on, the sands of his life being already nearly numbered. Imagine to yourself, three helpless children, destitute of necessary food and clothing, actually pining daily away on their scanty pittance, and that every day diminishing, without the most distant hope of being replenished; and then a sick father on the very verge of existence, not only weighed down with constant physical pain, but the sufferings of a dependent family before his eyes, to harass his mind with gloomy forebodings; and when you have pondered on all the features of this scene, you may have some idea of my situation. As yet, however, I had seen but a little part of the misery that I was doomed to witness; these were but a few drops toward filling my cup with wo.

"As the hours of mortality allotted to my father, approximated to a close, our anxiety, if possible, increased to render his last moments calm and tranquil, by every attention and kindness in our power to bestow. As I have hinted before, we possessed no means to replenish, or rather, furnish our needed daily bread. When the last morsel had been sacrificed to the cravings of nature, and stern necessity, pale and haggard, stood before us, with a fainting spirit I started forth to ask of charity what fortune had denied us. Toward those in easy circumstances, and members of the same church, I bent my course—lowly, depressed in feelings at the idea of divulging our extreme poverty—with only a feeble ray of hope occasionally beaming on my mind, as I thought of their willingness to follow their Master, 'by doing good.' Partially encouraged by such momentary reflections, I pressed forward, and called upon two or three persons of the same faith, and received a few trifles, with the advice of each, to call on Deacon F., whose means were abundant, and they were sure that with a liberal hand he would relieve our wants. This news strengthened my hopes, as I hastened on toward the splendid mansion of Deacon F., one of the most wealthy and prominent members of the Baptist church.

"The Deacon stood next to the Elder in the estimation of the brethren, frequently officiating in his stead, (when Elder C. was called away,) and breaking to them the 'bread of life.' On such occasions, he manifested the purest devotion and warmest zeal. The precepts of his Master seemed to have found an abiding place within his bosom, and he manifested in all his public actions, a love of the practice as well as the theory. Although but little acquainted with him in the walks of private life, yet in public his feelings were warm and affectionate toward all who worshipped at the same altar—so much so, that there appeared not much reason to fear, but, on the contrary, every reasonable ground to hope.

"When I entered, the Deacon was comfortably seated in his easy arm-chair, with the last religious journal before him. He arose with a smile, and bade me a hearty welcome, and kindly inquired if I had heard of the great awakening in the north part of the town. I replied that I had not. He then informed me, that there was a powerful revival in that neighborhood—scores were seeking the Lord, and striving to flee the wrath to come. 'They have continued the meeting, several days,' said he, 'and yesterday I had the pleasure of being present and witnessing the mighty work of the Lord. His spirit seemed to pervade the whole assembly; the preacher depicted, in glowing colors, the horrid doom of the unregenerate, at the judgment day, when the Lord shall be revealed from heaven in flaming fire, taking vengeance on all that know him not. His eyes flashed—every muscle was in motion—his hands extended—his voice to the highest note—and the spirit upon him—reached with power to many a heart—tears, and groans, and convulsive sobs, filled the house. Oh, the awful work of the spirit!—many a stout and wicked heart fell before its sway, and sunk in deep despair. Oh, it was a glorious, glorious scene! Long may the work continue, until the whole neighborhood is converted and have their sins washed away in the blood of the Lamb.'

"'The times,' added he, 'are indeed ominous of a reformation throughout the world; the reign of Prince Immanuel hastruly begun; his enemies are bowing to his sceptre, obeying his voice, and shouting the name of their Deliverer. Oh, roll on the happy period when all shall know the Lord—be moulded in his likeness—follow him in word and deed—and find refuge from impending wo, under the wide spread banner of the Gospel of Peace.'

"Having come to a final pause, I ventured to speak of the cause nearest my heart. I frankly told him my business—where I had been—the ill success of my journey, and that I now made bold to state our necessities to him, (gently hinting at his wealth,) and crave his assistance. As I finished the relation, a heavy sigh escaped him, and he broke silence by saying, 'How numerous and complicated are the miseries that flesh is heir to—yet, I believe, the greater and more trials of affliction we are called to pass through on earth, the greater will be our enjoyment, and the brighter our crowns of glory in the world to come. Your father is a worthy man, and had he thought as much of himself as others have of him, he never would have been in this situation. It is necessary that we all should think at least as much of ourselves as we do of others, if we wish to avoid suffering in poverty. It is very true that I have a large property in my possession, but then it may all be lost without proper attention, and who should I look to then for assistance? No longer ago than yesterday, I received the sad intelligence that one of my tenants had failed, indebted to me one thousand dollars. A few more such losses will reduce me to beggary. Besides, we ought to help those who help us.

"'I am sorry, exceedingly sorry for your father, but he has owed me a small amount for several years, and I think he should look to those he has assisted, for relief.' Then stepping to the bookcase, he returned and presented me with some 'tracts,' requesting at the same time, that I would peruse them, and trust to Heaven for every needed blessing.

"You may imagine my feelings as I left the house, but language would fail me to describe them. Ah! willing indeed, thought I, to help those who need no help—to give by fifties and hundreds, to the numberless institutions of the day, that the donor's name in 'capitals may be blazoned round the world'—while the poor and needy are passed by, and left to die.

"With the most gloomy reflections, I bent my course toward our wretched habitation. Exhausted somewhat by the length of my walk, but overcome much more by the pain of hope deferred, I called, on the way, at the house of one who had the name of being an infidel; believing, as I did, that I could not be treated worse than I had been by a member of the church, and a deacon, too. I knew they were in moderate circumstances, and did not stop to solicit their aid, but rather to rest myself after a day of toil. My bosom was too full to keep silence. I told my tale—where I had been, and what success I had met with. I knew that common report gave my auditor no very good name; yet, when I had finished my story, I saw she had a heart still alive to the sufferings of humanity. She was not sparing in her rebukes of nominal Christians, but uttered many a sober truth in rather a harsh, unceremonious manner. Having been made welcome to some refreshment, I took my leave, and soon found myself once more at home.

"The evening had scarcely closed in, before this same lady, accompanied by her husband, made her appearance at our miserable abode. They had not only come to see, but had brought some articles of food—feeling, no doubt, that something more is requisite than saying, 'Be ye warmed, and be ye fed.' These were the first visitors who had thought that more is requisite than bare attendance, to cheer the habitation of poverty and distress. And these were such as had the name of despising the Christian religion, in the popular profession of the same—broke the Sabbath by not attending the places of public worship—and, withal, were charged as openly denying the Saviour, and disbelieving in a God. This was a mystery which I could not then explain—how people with such principles, should be induced to deeds of charity and good will to their fellowmen. For we verily were ready to ask, like the ancient Jews, 'Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?' Nor was this the only instance of kind and benevolent actions; for during the remainder of my father's stay in this vale of tears, nearly all our necessary food was received from those out of the pale of the church, and therefore considered as infidels.

"While the lamp of life waned and waxed dim that lighted the path of a once doating father, the cares and troubles of a fond mother, were evidently making inroads upon her health. With all this wretchedness before me, the time rolled on, and the hour at last arrived for the silver cord to be loosened. The frail materials of this earthly tabernacle, were to be dissolved, and the dust to return to the dust, as it was, but the spirit unto God who gave it. We were all summoned around the bed, to gaze, for the last time, on a much loved father, and receive his parting benediction. Oh, who that has not been there, can tell the feelings of such an hour! What imagination can paint the scene true to reality! We look, we know not why, on the feeble remains of mortality, and see the sun of earthly existence about to set, to rise here no more forever. Every endearing circumstance of time gone by, augments our desires for their tarrying yet a little longer, that we may repay their cares and toils, and be able to watch over them as they have watched over us. We mingled our tears in profusion, while in a faultering voice the kindest admonitions fell from the lips of a dying father. By the little he had said, he was so much exhausted, that the closing 'God bless you,' was scarcely audible. For a few moments, it seemed as if his spirit had already winged its flight, but again reviving, as it were, to gather new strength, and keep us still in hope and fear. It was but a momentary glow—his breath grew short—the pulse only fluttered—a moment more, and the heavenly tenant left its clay-made tabernacle, and sought the source from whence it sprung.

"The scene had now closed; and however much I grieved the loss of one ever tenderly loved, yet there was joy mingled with grief in the reflection, that he was past the trials, cares, and troubles of life—beyond the neglect of friends, and the bitter revilings of enemies—'where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest.' The funeral rites were performed in due solemnity, and the body deposited in the cold and silent grave.

"My mother's health continued very poor, and we knew not when or where light again would dawn, and the cloud of accumulated sorrow be dispelled. The scene of our pilgrimage was truly dark in prospective—no star of hope beamed from afar, to scatter abroad the gloomy shades that gathered thick around us.

"A few days only elapsed, before Deacon F. paid us a visit. He informed us, that he brought good news—that the church had taken into consideration our wretched condition, and by his influence, had united to assist us. And speaking to my mother, said, 'Sister, I have had many hours of anxiety and sorrow on your account, and for your dear, departed husband. Many are the prayers I have made—the tears I have shed for you. I have ever been a friend to your husband—assisted him time and again, when no other man would do it, out of pure love, and now hold his note for quite an amount. I do not mention this to trouble you, for I feel for you, and pray for your happiness.' Then kneeling beside her bed, he addressed the throne of Grace, long, loud, and ardently, and bid us 'good morning.' This was what we did not expect; despondency now gave way to hope; the prospect brightened around, and we no longer felt as though we were unworthy the good wishes and kind attention of our fellows. Yet it was but a delusive hope, to raise our spirits up that they might sink to deeper despair. Four days only were allowed us to enjoy the anticipation of being assisted to the 'staff of life,' before a carriage drove up to the door, accompanied by two men; expectation told us they brought the promised aid. But judge our surprise, when they inquired if Widow M. resided there, and informed us they had come to remove us to the County Poor House—said that Deacon F. had made a complaint, and requested them to remove us thither immediately. It was a trying time—mother scarcely able to sit up—to be carried some twenty miles, and there supported at the expense of the public—humiliating thought! It seemed too much—too much to bear. Our bosoms, already deeply furrowed with grief, and bleeding at the wound that death had made, were stung anew, and made to bleed afresh. But what could we do? To remain was to perish, and to go could be no more. We therefore soon made ready, and were on our way. I thought my mother unable to ride even two miles without resting; but excitement gave her strength, and we rode one-half the distance before stopping for that purpose. My feelings had no solace. I felt for my mother—yea, felt that soon, very soon, she too would sleep the sleep of death, and I and my brothers be left to wander on the 'world's wide stage,' friendless and alone. There was no balm for my mind—my cup of wo seemed filled to the brim. But how little do we know of what awaits us. The sparkling brightness of a vernal morning may be followed by gathering clouds of gloom; and the dense vapors that span the sky at early dawn, give way to the golden splendors of the king of day. With us, even so it was.

"We came to a public house and alighted. My mother was overcome—yes, exhausted. A room and bed were resorted to, and she was soon in a fair way to obtain repose. Thus situated, two gentlemen entered our apartment. The one was Mr. K., a brother in the church, and an acquaintance of mine. The other was a stranger, past the meridian of life, and venerable with years. Mr. K., we were aware, called in friendship—but we thought idle curiosity induced the stranger to visit the momentary abode of a few miserable paupers. He eyed us closely, but spoke not. I entered into conversation with Mr. K. on our situation, and freely told the history of our sufferings for a few months past, and concluded by saying, that were it not for my mother and brothers, I could wish my eyes were closed on all terrestrial things. 'But for them,' said I—'for them I wish to live. To be near and dear to the sainted mother that bore me—to console her in all her afflictions—pouring the oil and the wine into her troubled bosom, and kindly close her eyes in death—to counsel, assist, and guide my brothers to usefulness, virtue, and happiness—for these things I wish to live—for these alone my bosom beats; while for myself, there is no charm in life—no tie that binds me to this cold and cruel world—the past is full of pain and wo—the future, I know not what 'twill bring.'

"'Young lady,' interrupted the stranger, 'your mind appears to be bordering on despair. I am moved by your words, and feel disposed (with your mother's consent) to change the place of your destination. I propose, then, to take your family to my house, about four miles distant.' My mother readily gave her consent, and in a short time we arrived at his dwelling, and his dwelling we now occupy—that stranger was Father B——.

"The remainder of my tale is brief. A change of circumstances and proper attention, soon restored my mother to comfortable health; the cloud of melancholy gradually dispersed, and her mind recovered its native serenity and peace. My brothers were placed in honorable occupations, under the guardian care of Father B——. His advice and instruction placed their feet in the paths of rectitude and duty, and early in life were they found in the way of pure religion, walking in the paths of wisdom, which are full of peace. Two of them are engaged in tilling the soil, and my youngest brother is in a store with the son of Father B——. Our condition and prospects are truly pleasing. Our troubles and sorrows of the past, are only seen in the dimness of distance, for the unchanging kindness of our benefactor, has caused us to forget the past, enjoy the present, and hope for happiness in years to come. Nor are we alone the subjects of his care, the partakers of his benevolence, and the recipients of his kindness and love. Throughout the neighborhood, the marks of his goodness are left, and live to speak his praise. Where want made his approach, there he placed the needed aid. Where sickness laid a heavy hand, there he bore the healing balm. Where misery, destroying and to destroy, took up her abode, there, there he hasted with the oil of consolation, and filled the wounded bosom, and in the spirit of love bound up the broken heart. He has lived to do good, and acted but to bless. His deeds are embalmed in the hearts of his neighbors, and all who know him speak his praise.

"To conclude—we have resided several years with this same man—shared his hospitality and love, and there has been no cause, on our part, of regret. We gradually imbibed his peculiar views of the Christian religion—found the same faith—and 'rejoiced with joy unspeakable and full of glory,' in the same hope. And we still, as ever, pray that length of days, full of joy and peace, may be added unto him, and that hope, triumphant and immortal hope, may sustain his spirits in the hour of death, and we, like him, be enabled to follow the Saviour in word and deed—rejoice with such as rejoice, and weep with those who weep—and at last be gathered home to our Father, into that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

"Such is a brief and imperfect sketch—a broken history of myself and Father B——. To such as it is, you are heartily welcome."

Here my fair speaker came to a close, and after saying, "You will now please excuse me," she arose and left the apartment.

AION.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

Why is it that believers in endless misery will so constantly and confidently urge the literal meaning (as they suppose) of the above word, to prove their favorite doctrine, when the duration expressed by it, is so often mentioned as having an end? Can it be that they are blind? or are they dishonest? What if the word does literally mean endless existence!—are we to be guided by its literal meaning, or by its usage? By its usage, undoubtedly. Its literal meaning hath nothing to do with determining its duration. Its usage, and that alone, is to be our guide. Now, this word is positively used in a limited sense. It is not only placed in such constructions as absolutely require this sense, but in the following passages the duration contained in it, is expressly said to have an end: Matt. xiii: 39, 40, 49; xxiv: 3; xxviii: 20.

But the term does not literally signify endless existence. Aie means always, and is used with reference to the present as well as the future, and principally the former. On merely denotes being or simple existence, without reference to duration. Hence, when these two words are put together, they express continuous being, or in other words, they denote duration, without reference to the time or length of its continuance. How long the thing is to continue, to which it is applied, must be determined by other circumstances aside from the term aion. Why can not, I ask again professedly learned Limitarians see these facts?

The foundation of domestic happiness is a faith in the virtue of woman; the foundation of all political happiness, a confidence in the integrity of man; the foundation of all happiness, temporal and eternal, reliance on the goodness of God."

THE SUNDAY MAIL;
FOR SUNDAY, JUNE 10, 1838.

LUKE XXII: 54-62.

Last week, we had under consideration the prayer which Jesus offered up at his last interview with his disciples, just before setting out from the guest-chamber to that garden where he had frequently retired before, and where he was to be sought and found by his perfidious betrayer.—Between the time of presenting that prayer, and the moment at which Peter for the third time denied any connexion with, or knowledge of his Master, there probably intervened only a few hours. The prayer was offered in the evening; the trial of Jesus (if trial it could be called) was hurried through in the course of the same night. As a trial of what real, available information a young friend was receiving at Sunday school, we once requested him, after the last chapter of Luke had been under review at his school, to give an outline of what happened from the time of Christ's leaving the house where he had eaten the paschal supper, to the time when he was condemned by the Sanhedrin. Although an intelligent youth, and able probably, to answer all the questions in the "Union Questions," or such as his teacher might put to him in addition, I found that he had a very confused idea of the series and connexion of the events of that ever memorable night. Astonished at this want of a distinct and vivid impression in one who had the events quite recently under consideration, we made similar experiments upon others, and found, that even in those who might be presumed the most intimately acquainted with the evangelical narratives, the events of that night, of which we now speak, were far more indistinctly and vaguely remembered, and conceived of, than we had supposed at all possible in any intelligent and interested reader. We have, on account of this pretty prevalent indistinctness of impression, thought it no improper employment, to connect the passage last week considered with that now before us, by making a brief recapitulation of the intervening events. If our readers will require of themselves the same task that we required of the Sunday school scholar, before they proceed to read this summary, perhaps they will be astonished to find in themselves a greater degree of the same confusion in their memory of these events than they were, without this trial, prepared to suppose possible. Make the trial; you may derive some useful lesson from it.

When Jesus attended the festivals at Jerusalem he usually left the city at night—probably for security—and reposed in safety at the hospitable mansion of Lazarus, or some other friendly person. On the present, as on previous occasions, Jesus repaired to a garden, which probably belonged to a friend, at the foot of the Mount of Olives, about half a mile from the brook Kedron, which runs in the valley between Jerusalem and that mountain. In this garden, he took Peter, James and John to a more retired spot aside from the rest, asking them to keep him company as his soul was "exceeding sorrowful." But even in the agony of feeling which then possessed him, and made the sweat pour from him "like drops of blood," his three favorite disciples gave way to their own wearied feelings, and indulged themselves in sleep; shutting up their sympathies for him who, in the previous part of the evening, had forgotten his own distress in his anxiety to comfort his disciples and enable them to bear their bereavement. (Jesus! compared with thine what are human sympathies!) His Father, however, sympathised with him and sent an angel to strengthen him. Jesus reproached the three for their want of sympathy; yet notwithstanding, they fell asleep again and again when he retired to pray. When he had roused them the third time, lights were seen approaching and Judas with his band entered the garden. The disciples seem to have been unable or unwilling to offer any resistance, except Peter, who drew a sword and struck one of the band, cutting off his ear. This violence Jesus rebuked. Jesus was now bound and led away to the city, while his disciples, who only a few hours before had promised to abide by him to the last, left him to his fate, and fled. Peter and John followed at a distance, and obtained admittance into the house of the high-priest through John's acquaintance there. At this house—the house of Caiaphas—it would appear, the members of the Council of Seventy were waiting the result of the expedition under Judas; for in the middle of the night there they were, ready to proceed to the trial and condemnation of Jesus. Here amid insult, derision and outrage—being buffeted and spit upon—he had the mockery of a trial, and on false and insufficient testimony was declared guilty of blasphemy. After pronouncing the sentence of death, the high-priest dissolved the Council, and they appear to have spent the rest of the night, until day-break, in consulting what it were best to do with Jesus: whether to stone him to death according to the law of Moses, or bring him up before the Roman governor on a charge of sedition and treason, and thus, have the odium of his death removed from themselves, and the chance of the people's interfering in his behalf effectually prevented. During this recess of the Council, it is probable that the events, recorded in our paragraph of this week, took place.

The details of what is usually called Peter's fall, are familiar to all readers of the New Testament. The details of Luke may be advantageously compared with those of Matthew xxvi: 69–75; of Mark xiv: 66–72; and of John xviii: 24–27. After reading these somewhat diverse accounts, the reader will, doubtless, make his own reflections, and endeavor to turn the incident to some good account. We would suggest the following. 1. When we see in others, and find in ourselves, that we are weak when we thought ourselves strong—that temptations prevail which we thought we could resist; it should be our earnest endeavor to be better prepared in future, and we should also have more ready compassion for those who have gone out of the way. 2. Would it not deepen our sorrow for past offences, and strengthen us for future trials, to "look unto Jesus" and picture to ourselves his looks towards us—encouraging in tempation, pitying and forgiving when our falls are sincerely repented of? 3. The Rev. Thomas Adam in his Exposition of Matthew, makes the following remark: "Let us think how soon Peter's repentance followed his sin, and how long ours has been deferred—how bitterly he wept, and what cause we have for so doing—how graciously he was received to favor again, and what a Saviour we have to wipe away our tears."

SCRAPS.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

HOPE.—This word has been defined anticipation, or, "simply a presentiment." This definition may be correct if it be confined to mere human hope—a hope which wings not its flight beyond the region of mortality. But it can not apply to the hope of the Gospel of Christ. This leads us not only to desire "an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled," but, by reason of exceeding great and precious promises, to expect, when death shall have dissolved these corruptible bodies, to enter in upon such inheritance, and taste of those joys which flow from God's right hand. Our earthly hopes or desires may be disappointed, but the hope that the Christian religion imparts to man, is founded upon the Rock of eternal Truth and can never fail—like the infinite Source from whence it sprang, it can never mock or disappoint us. 'Tis an angel of peace, sent by the great Fountain of benevolence, to point the wayworn and sorrowing pilgrim of time, away beyond the mists and clouds of mortality, to those regions of light and glory,

"Where discord, wrath, and strife are lost,
And seas of bliss ecstatic roll."

BEAUTY.—When viewed with the eye of wisdom and sound sense, it is not outward appearance that renders a person truly beautiful. True beauty does not consist alone in "a cherry lip and laughing eye" not in raven locks, or auburn tresses—not in eloquent contour of figure and outward embellishment—there is something still wanting to render a person truly beautiful. True beauty consists in having a mind well stored with useful knowledge—filled with exalted religious motives, inciting the outward man to deeds of generosity and benevolence, and swaying the baser passions and inclinations of the soul. The graces of the mind are those which constitute a person truly beautiful and comely—especially do they render the female so—giving her a beauty that can never fade, but will last when the bloom and freshness of youth has faded—when care has furrowed the cheek, and wrinkled the brow, and "age has silvered o'er the head."

SIN.—I have wondered a thousand times, that the nature and effects of sin were not more generally understood, seeing there is so much light in the world. We have those among us, who will discourse long and eloquently upon the pleasures of sin! just as though there was happiness to be found in the halting places of iniquity, and joy on highway of crime and blood! Can not men see? When they behold the vicious groaning under the death-dealing consequences of sin, do they yet need to be told, that "The wages of sin is death?" We must expect to see transgression abound, so long as mankind are told there is no bitter in the cup of sin. We can not reform the sinner in this way. He must be told that if he wishes for the happiness of a mind at ease, he must shun the way of the transgressor, as he would the very jaws of destruction. He must be told, that if he would have the "testimony of a good conscience"—if he would escape that hell which the sinner carries in his bosom, he must beware of a sinful and vicious course of conduct, for the punishment of sin is sure, and with what an awful weight does it fall upon the heads of the guilty!

MUSIC.

The power of tone over the feelings and affections, is indeed wonderful. That the vibrations of thin, elastic air, should enkindle that spark of the Deity, which distinguishes man from animals, expand and elevate it to lofty sublimity, or depress it to gloomy melancholy, seems at first but a vagary of idle fancy. So mysterious and delicate is the connection between that invisible something which feels and thinks, and its perishable tenement, that the slightest external causes, operate upon and influence it, and give it an ever varying temperament. No effort of reason can always ward off the influences of airy vibrations over the sympathies of the soul. The orator arises before a cold, phlegmatic multitude. His voice at first falls passive on the heavy ear—the tones begin to swell with volume and meaning, and the ear gives marks of attention; they still swell, and the speaker's soul is poured forth in rich progressive harmony, and countenances around glow with admiration—a step farther and ecstacy fills every bosom—the attention is rivited, and the multitude are chained to their seats. The voice mellows down to a whisper—every lisp is heard—the electric spark of sympathy has gone its circuit—feelings assimilate and emotions enkindle with the speaker—the crystal drops simultaneously glisten—their bosoms beat together in raptures, or fierce indignation burns alike on their brow. When the voice would fascinate, 'tis vain for the judgment to resist. The rough and cragged fields of error look smooth and flowery, and the most glaring absurdities seem as plausible and real as the inverted skies in the bosom of a glassy lake, where the skilful rhetorician stretches forth his wand. Reason is dethroned; judgment lost in enthusiasm, and turbulent passions nerve the arm to avenge a fancied insult, by this play of sounds on the passive sensorium. This power may be as dangerous as useful, and the fate of a nation has oft hung on so slender a thread as the orator's breath. The power of the human voice can be felt but not described. The touch of the torpedo may palsy the fibrous muscles, but the human voice, even though it be but a whisper, may conquer the stubborn heart and lead the lords of creation as passive lambs.—The sacred choir—O, what devotion the swelling notes enkindle! A congregated host joining in vocal praise! Adamantine must be that heart and seared those affections, that move not as the full swelling chorus ascends in grateful anthems of praise, to the throne of him whose very attributes are Love!

But not the voice alone is thus potent. The harp lulled the angry monarch of old, and restored reason to its mediating throne. Even animals oft show the most remarkable attachment or aversion to different kinds of music. When sad melancholy weigh down the soul and cold despair would freeze every kind affection, the gentle notes of a flute or harpsichord, like messengers of peace, chase away those gloomy forebodings and sickening sighs, and light the countenance with cheerfulness and content. Then cares and sorrows are forgotten, and sweet repose or sweeter reflections restore the feelings to their wonted buoyancy, and every department of the mind moves in unison. When hilarity and glee intoxicate and "the boisterous laugh speaks loud the vacant mind," some plaintive note, borne on the listless breeze, will soothe the rude feelings, and mellow down to sadness the joyous scene. Music renders the pangs of grief less poignant, the gloom of solitude less dreary—assimilates the feelings and affections of associates, and refines those delicate sensibilities that ever beautify life.—Callous indeed must be that heart, which neither the voice of love, the pathos of eloquence, the chant of the song or the melodies of music can move!—With an eye insensible to nature's beauty, an ear untuned to nature's melody, and a heart unmoved by natural affections, man may well be excused from seducing himself from society and the world, and, pent up in the narrow, nameless region of self, pour out his misanthropic dirge, chill as the air he breathes, within the damp walls of a Hermit's cell. No! we are made for society, not society for us, and nature is vocal with music and teeming with beauty and radolant with fragrance, to lessen the asperities of our journey and smooth our pathway to the grave. Then, the threshold of our existence is past—the infirmities of earth are left behind, and redeemed and regenerated, we ascend to join the angelic choir, ever according their beatific strains to the praise and the love of their Creator!

PROSPECTS AT THE WEST.

FRIEND GROSH—The advance and prosperity of the United States as a republic, can not but be a subject of pleasing reflection to all good citizens. A republican government, originated and supported by the voluntary suffrage of a free people, constitutes one of the greatest anamolies in the history of nations. Here Religion (one of the noblest gifts of God to man) prevails, unaided by the strong arm of government. So far, it has not been blended with the subjects, proper, for legislation; and as yet, there exists no fixed connexion of Church and State, to sway or regulate the consciences of the people. No—a spirit of religious toleration and concession obtains, and all worshippers are permitted to enjoy the rights of conscience, under the benign and healthful influence of our federal constitution. So long, therefore as the councils of this republic refuse to acknowledge clerical authority, the people may and will rejoice. Yea! they may enjoy the admonitions of conscience, and "worship God under their own vines and fig trees, with none to molest or make afraid." Is it not fair and rational to conclude, that our happiness as a nation, is as much owing to the dis-union of Church and State, as to any other individual cause? With us the question admits of no doubt.

Aside, however, from the business of religious legislation, powerful measures are being employed throughout the Union, to determine the moral capabilities of the people. A spirit of inquiry is abroad in the land, and investigation succeeds investigation, with astonishing rapidity. The search seems to be made, not only in relation to the physical energies of mankind, but extends still farther, and embraces a higher grade of powers—it appertains to the religious feelings and sentiments of the human heart. Cause and effect, in all countries, observe their usual relation. In the western country, the same measures are employed by religious parties, to gain the ascendancy, as in the eastern. The Catholics, from priority of exploration and settlement, appear to occupy the advance ground. The earliest adventurers to the "Far West," were French priests, adherents to the principles and usages of the Church of Rome. Among the number of such pioneers, the name of Hennipin may be mentioned. That celebrated Catholic "Father" located himself in the interior of Illinois, on the border of a beautiful lake, now bearing his name, where he spent the balance of his days in propagating his religious sentiments.

It was, indeed, perfectly natural for the pioneer to the West, on leaving his early home, the cradle of his infancy, to seek a country similar to the one he had left. The cultivation of religious impressions, was, with him, a business of paramount importance. His mind was undoubtedly influenced by his holy religion, in determining the character of his future residence: abiding the precepts of his fathers, he sought abroad the same privileges and immunities enjoyed at home; and here, in the West, between the great chain of lakes on the East, and the "father of waters" on the West, he selected his home—and here, too, he early erected the Cross, in commemoration of his "holy religion."

To the Catholics belongs the honor of having erected the first spires pointing heaven-ward, in the western country. They have apparently anticipated a severe struggle for opinion's sake, and have taken precautionary measures, to wit, the accumulation of funds, and the erection of churches. In most or all important places, they have erected, or have in progress of erection, buildings for public worship. At Galena, a border town, in this State, the Catholics have nearly completed a house of very respectable dimensions, for public worship. At Du Buque, also, only fifteen miles from Galena, they have a church nearly completed. Indeed, in all parts of this State, Catholic enterprise is apparent.

CHICAGO.—In this city, though they have not, as yet, any very splendid house for worship, they are taking measures for the speedy erection of one. Their numbers are large, and funds are not wanting.

In all this country—a country beautiful in appearance, interspersed by prairies, groves, and gentle rivers—no kind voice is heard proclaiming the final "restitution of all things"—the salvation of mankind, based upon the immutable principles of benevolence and love. It is indeed true, that where Catholicism prevails, there may be found advocates of a doctrine which, though perhaps shorn of some of the obnoxious features of the Romish Church, possesses of itself, principles equally odious and derogatory to the character of God, and the subversion of the best interests of mankind—the doctrine of John Calvin. From the shores of Lake Michigan to the "father of rivers," no ministering angel is heard sounding the trumpet of universal reconciliation. That cheering proclamation to the shepherds, "Behold, I bring you glad tidings," etc., is not the sound that crosses these prairies—no; a sound alarming in its character—one little better in its influence than the "lone whoop" of the enraged savage, is heard, occasionally, to respond to the priests or vicegerents of Rome. The labor and care of the ministers of the Bible, have been almost exclusively confined to the middle and eastern States. Let a glance at the condition of things in this country, be taken by the friends of liberal sentiment; let the advocates of universal grace and happiness, look abroad and remark the magnitude of the work before them. From a residence in this country for some three years, I am persuaded that great good might be done here by ministers of the New Testament. The struggle between Catholics and Presbyterians, now pending in this country, may possibly work a salutary result—the destruction or subjugation of both parties. It would seem to be the imperative duty of all who admire the plan of universal reconciliation, in conformity to the laws of God, to unite their influence in arrest of error; to guard the citadel of true religion from all unhallowed encroachments. Let liberal men, good and faithful, be sent to this country, and while the spirit of enterprise is engaged in improving the soil, let the moral vineyard be cultivated.

Yours, with respect, D——.

LOVE OF PRAISE.

Few things give greater impetus to the energies of man, than the love of praise. It operates powerfully upon the whole amplitude of society—is inseparably connected with the existence of man; and whether it is a more prolific cause of evil or of good, is a matter of skepticism. It is this that has nerved the aspiring conqueror's soul, who, in his bloody career, wantonly sported with human life—subverted empires of earthly felicity, and reared the impregnable barriers of animosity between nations,

—"Who had else
Like kindred drops, been mingled into one."

It was this that gave impulse to the gladiator's arm, and drenched the arena with the blood of humanity.

But, on the other hand, it has infused its vitality into the patriot's bosom, and directed his efforts to emancipate, elevate, or adorn his country. The philanthropist who has roamed in foreign lands, and sought to alleviate the distresses of the suffering, has not been a stranger to its influence; and even Philosophy, with all its boasted benefits, is indissolubly associated with the love of renown.

It is obvious, then, that its influence will preponderate in favor of evil, so long as the sanguinary field twines the laurel for ambition's brow—so long as the glory of man is to be won by means that involve the misery of his kindred race—so long as the chivalrous spirit of the eighteenth century shall pervade the world.

MORAL OMNIPOTENCE.

Many of our Partialist brethren, especially Arminians, have not been able to conceive how all men can possibly be saved—made holy and happy—be reconciled to God, and united into one family in heaven, except by the exercise of a physical power on the part of God.—All their ideas of omnipotence are derived from external, physical force—the lightning's rending, crushing velocity—the power of cohesion and gravitation—the cell, the fetter and the rod—these are to them the emblems and images of all the power God possesses—or if they conceive of his having any other power, it is a power inoperative on the sin-hardened will of man, and falls so far short of infinity or omnipotence, as to be finally ineffectual in "subduing all things unto himself by the Word of his power."

These low and unworthy ideas of God's omnipotence are the greatest barriers of the Partialist's mind, that Universalism meets in its march to universal, spiritual empire. They are invincible, save by an influx of knowledge and spirituality, which shall break them in fragments, and make them goodly parts of a better temple.

They not only debase the image of God in man, but dishonor the Original in human estimation. Such an omnipotence as they ascribe to God, he truly possesses, and by it governs the material world—but to ascribe it to him as his only power that is omnipotent, is as degrading as to assert that the only courage man possesses, is an animal courage—the courage of the bull or the bull-dog!

John Murray, when he stood up calmly waving the huge stone that had been aimed at his life, did he manifest no courage but that of the beast of the field or the yard, or of the fowl of the barn yard? George Washington, when retreating before his country's invaders with a handful of troops, and avowing his purpose to flee from State to State until he should cross the mountains into the "back woods"—was his, only an animal courage? The sages of the Congress that staked property, and life, and sacred honor on our declaration of independence—risked a traitor's death on the ignominious gallows—was their's merely an animal courage?—The man who boldly dares to refuse a challenge, knowing that he shall be branded as a coward by all duellists—perhaps by all the community—is his merely an animal courage? The glorious army of martyrs, headed by the Son of God and his apostles, who endured every indignity without resistance, that they might benefit mankind and do the will of God—was their's an animal courage?

So, turn we to exhibitions of God's omnipotence—was it a physical power that sustained the great and good men above named, in the path of duty and of right? Was it merely a physical power that constrained a persecuting Saul of Tarsus to ask, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?"—or Agrippa to cry out "Almost persuadest thou me to be a Christian!"—or Felix to tremble on his seat before his prisoner? Was it merely a physical power that enabled a despised Nazarene and his twelve poor and persecuted disciples to overcome two hierarchies and subdue the "Mistress of the world" to the foot of the Cross? Is it merely a physical power that has converted thee, my brother, and thee, my sister, from the error of your ways—from enmity to the name of Christ—from deep rooted and long standing prejudices—from love of popularity and worldly favor, to sit down humbly on the lowest seat in the Christian church, among a sect every where despised and spoken against, and calmly to welcome "reproach, because you trust in the living God, who is the Savior of all men"? Oh, believe it not! All outward force in the world had not effected half these wondrous changes! Physical power may raze mountains, build temples, slay thousands, desolate kingdoms, found empires; but it is moral power, only, that can overcome mind, and change the deep, firm purpose of the human soul. This moral power God possesses in an infinite degree—equally with his physical omnipotence; and however slowly it may operate, or mysterious may be its modes of working, by it he is able to do all that he desires for the good of his moral creation.

What he has done, is but as small a portion of the exhibitions of his moral power, as the exhibitions of his physical power are but deficient exhibitions of his physical omnipotence. It is as nothing—or less than nothing, compared to the vast whole, and has mostly been exhibited to us in visible action, by human agency. How much more efficient must they be, when moral Omnipotence operates directly on the moral powers of the human soul, released from flesh and blood, and set free from sin and ignorance! Who can comprehend its vastness and its irresistible power!

Human agency, however free, must be but limited in its powers or even in its will of resistance. Should it, however, will to resist, it would be annihilated in a moment. The soap bubble of the school boy might as well hope to bear on its convex expanse the lofty mountain, or the pondrous globe, as the human will to bear up against the weight of God's moral power—supposing (that is to say) that God had given man an agency capable of willing to resist it in its full operation. But the truth is, man's understanding, will, agency—all are finite—all unable to resist the constraining influences of God's moral omnipotence. God will not always be wroth, for the spirits would fail before him, and the souls that he has made, would perish at his rebuke. He will send forth his moral power gently to incline the hearts of his children to him, and render them willing in the day of his power. He will not force their inclinations—he will not compel by might—but by the sweet influences of his spirit of grace, he will melt the stubborn will so that it will cheerfully and willingly flow confluent with his own, and constrain every soul to be gladly subject to his moral power and rule.

It is in vain that the opposer points us to a few hardened wretches whom no means have yet been able to subdue. Unless it can be proved that all means have been fully tried, but in vain, we shall believe that God has yet means in store fully sufficient to effect his will. Or unless it can be shown that these wretches are of a nature different from all other moral beings, (not excepting even the devils, if they are moral beings,) God's goodness and love must be admitted to operate ultimately on them as it does and will on all others. To prove that this must be admitted, a few remarks may be necessary. We argue thus.

All moral principles are the same to all moral beings—they are as universal as our moral nature extends—hence the same principle that, in the hands of God, will be successful in overcoming evil, will be successful so far as properly employed by man. And the same principle that subdues what is evil in our moral being, will subdue what is evil in another moral being, under similar circumstances. For all men have the same faculties and powers of mind—the same moral feelings—as well as the same physical organization, however varied. The sable son of Africa—the tawny Asiatic—the red man of America—and the paler-faced European, are alike men in their bodily conformation—and alike gifted with the powers of the human mind—God hath made of one blood all the nations of men—and the spirits of each are of the same spirit, for he is the God and Father of them all. Varieties there are in their degrees of power, and combination of faculties; but no differences in kind—no contrarieties in their several natures. Hence the love and kindness of God that saves one man from sin, can be made to save all men—the goodness of God that leads one to repentance, when exercised in adaptation to and accordance with the several peculiarities of all, is sufficient to grant unto all men repentance unto life. And as the goodness of the universal moral Parent overcomes the evils of his moral children, so can each child overcome the evils of his brother by a similar goodness. I care not how depraved—how base—how hardened in crime, or full of hatred and malice he is—there is still a chord left to vibrate to the tones of confidence and affection while sense and reason last—only let those tones be properly modulated, and be set on the right key.

Thus, then, it appears that God's moral power is as fully able to effect his will in the moral world, as his physical power is able to do his will in the material universe—and that moral power is goodness and love.

THE ANCHOR OF THE SOUL.

"Which [hope] we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the vail"

A consideration of the peculiar imagery used by the apostle, in the passage that heads this article, may be pleasing and interesting to many readers. In his many travels by sea, his observing mind had noticed the utility of an anchor to a ship—the security which it afforded to the vessel when properly let down and fastened—and the certainty it afforded against the chances of being driven out into the wild and trackless waste of waters. He applies his observations to the hope of the Christian in God's promises.

In the temple before the Holy of Holies, hung a splendid and beautiful curtain called the vail. It served to divide the inner and most holy place from the outer one, and to screen from common observation, the sacred shekina, or cloud of glory which was the divine presence on the ark of the covenant or testimony. Behind this vail none but the High Priest of the Jews was permitted to enter—and he but once a year, and then, only, after particular cere monies carefully performed. Behind this vail, but in the real temple, that is, in "Heaven itself," the apostle represents Jesus as entering in behalf, not of the Jews only, but of the whole world. He went before us—as our forerunner—as the person who carried the anchor of the vessel forward to a good and secure place, and there fixed it in such a manner that it might afford strong and certain aid to the vessel.

There is more in this figure than is noticed by the common or unreflecting reader. You have noticed the flukes, or backward bent points at each end of the bow forming the lower part of an anchor. By their holding to the craggy rocks, or sinking into the earth, at the bottom of the sea, the ship is held doubly steadfast. The anchor can not drag, and if the cable that connects it with the ship, be but strong enough, the vessel is moored "sure and steadfast," indeed. The Christian's anchor is his hope in the fulfilment of the Gospel which God preached to Abraham, that, in Jesus, every one of all the nations of the earth will ultimately be blessed. Our hope is in God—in the divine testimony of Heaven—in the ark of the new and better covenant established on better promises. There Jesus has entered before us—as our forerunner. There he has carried forward our anchor, and fixed it securely, so that we are moored in safety—so that we are held in the haven of Gospel rest, sure and steadfast.

Paul says, "We which have believed, do enter into rest." We have believed, and we know we are at rest—for we have joy and peace in believing. Moored thus in the harbor of the Gospel, anchored on the Rock of Ages—our hope placed securely in the divine testimony where all is "sure and steadfast"—unchanging and unchangeable—what can we fear? "Perfect love casteth out fear." And as the anchor of the ship is placed out of the reach of the storm—where winds and waves are unknown—so is our hope, which is as an anchor of the soul, placed by our forerunner where the troubles of this world never come—where the storms of affliction never beat, and where the waves of sorrow never roll their troubling surge.

I once travelled in a stage, unknowing and unknown. Two of the passengers were speaking of some amiable and excellent girl of their acquaintance. She had early embraced religion, obtained what every one supposed was a well founded hope, and joined the church. Here her piety and devotion were most conspicuous. She was foremost in every good word and work. Especially in laboring for the conversion of sinners, and in leading youthful impenitents in the Sunday school to embrace the Saviour, she was most successful. Many a brand—said the passengers—many a brand had she plucked from the burning—many a victim from the grasp of the spoiler had she rescued. She was looked up to, as a being of almost a superior nature—a saint in the house of God, and an example to all young females in the society. Thus reverenced as a saintly sister—she at last was courted and wedded by a clergyman of the same denomination, and transplanted by him into his own fold.

The cold and lukewarm state of her husband's flock awakened her Christian sympathy, and, at her entreaties, measures were taken to get up a revival for the benefit of the sinners, and the almost sinful church of her husband's congregation. Long, and faithfully, and earnestly did this couple labor in the church for the salvation of sinners. At last a call was made for those willing to be saved, to come to the anxious seats—and, wonder of wonders! the pastor's wife—this devout and godly female, was one of the first to come forward—declare her hope to be false and delusive—take the anxious seat as an impenitent, hell-deserving sinner, and to call aloud for mercy and salvation! An extensive revival followed, of course, and this lady obtained another hope—whether certainly better than the first, deponent said not—but it could not, if my fellow-passengers said true, it could not appear to be a better one—for the first was believed by every one to be genuine. In this anecdote we see the importance of hope, based on the immutable, all-embracing and unalterable promises of God—connected with the Rock of Ages beyond the vail, by the strong cable—a Gospel faith. But her hope was not as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast—neither did it enter into that within the vail—consequently it did not keep her at rest, in joy and peace, and was easily affected by every storm of time and earth, on which it rested, instead of being firmly fixed on the Rock of Ages. And if her second hope depends on aught else than the immutable counsel of God—and reaches not into that within the vail, beyond the shores of time—it will prove just as false and delusive as did the first one.

Reader—Examine your hope of salvation—if it is based on God alone, it is steadfast; but if based on man, or earth, look to it! A. B. G.

4. Read and approved the proceedings of the last session of this body.

5. Appointed Brs. O. Ackley, A. B. Grosh, and S. J. Hillyer, committee on ordination.

6. Appointed Brs. P. Price, T. J. Smith, and G. W. Montgomery, a committee to nominate delegates to represent this body in the next United States Convention to be held in Boston, Mass., in September, 1838.

7. Resolved, That at the future session of this body, we will take no part in arranging the public services, further than those connected with the annual sermon; and that we recommend to the societies where we shall hereafter meet, to arrange the services to suit themselves.

8. On motion, the committee appointed at the session of this body in 1836 "to prepare a model or models for society, or church and society constitutions; also rules and regulations for the government of this Convention in its deliberations," and which committee was continued at the session of 1837—be discharged.

9. Whereupon—Resolved, that a committee of three be appointed to report as soon as may be during this session, rules and regulations for the government of this body; and that it be continued with instructions to report at the next session of this Convention any improvements it may be able to suggest.

10. Appointed Brs. Grosh, M. B. Smith, and O. Whiston said committee.

11. Attended the public annual service of this Convention.

12. Adjourned to meet immediately after the close of the afternoon service.

13. Met according to adjournment.

14. The committee appointed to nominate delegates to represent this body in the U. S. Convention, reported the names of the following persons as said delegation, who were appointed with power individually to appoint substitutes and collectively to fill all vacancies. Ministerial—R. Tomlinson, Ridgeway; T. J. Sawyer, New-York; S. R. Smith, Albany; and O. Whiston, Cooperstown. Laymen—Hon. W. Berry, Homer; S. Van Schaack, Albany; Seymour P. Murdock, Ridgeway; Charles Eldred, Auburn; Lewis Seymour, New-York; and P. P. Hayes, Poughkeepsie.

15. The committee appointed to report rules, etc., reported a code which was adopted.

16. Br. J. Babcock, of the Allegany Association, presented a request of said Association for the fellowship of this body. Granted.

17. Appointed Brs. Grosh, Montgomery, and Tomlinson, a committee to recommend a place suitable for holding the next session of this body, and also to take into consideration the propriety of changing the time of its annual meeting, and to report in the morning.

18. Met on Thursday morning according to adjournment.

19. United in prayer with Br. M. B. Smith.

20. Read the proceedings of yesterday.

21. The committee to designate "a place for holding the next annual meeting of this Convention," recommended that said session be held in Rochester, Monroe county. Report accepted.

22. Said committee also reported the annexed resolution:

Resolved, That the Constitution of this Convention be so amended that the annual meeting shall commence on the second Wednesday in June, instead of the last Wednesday in May. Accepted for the action of the next session.

23. Appointed a committee consisting of Brs. O. Ackley and R. Tomlinson to recommend a person to preach the next annual sermon before this Convention.

24. Whereas in some cases letters of fellowship have been granted to persons whose moral characters were not sufficiently known, or who could not preach to the acceptance of any of our societies, therefore

Resolved, That we recommend to each Association in our fellowship to consider the propriety of so altering its rules for granting fellowship as to require candidates to signify their intention to preach, which intention shall be entered on the minutes, or otherwise published, if thought proper—and that the committee on fellowship be required to ascertain that the candidate has preached and conducted to the acceptance of the people among whom he has labored, and possesses a good moral character, before they report in favor of granting him a letter of fellowship at a subsequent session of the Association.

25. In accordance with the recommendation of the committee for the selection of a preacher to deliver the next occasional sermon, Br. M. B. Smith, was appointed, with power to select a substitute.

26. Resolved, That the occasional sermons be considered as the property of the Convention, in common with the Minutes thereof, but that the Convention as a body, shall not be responsible for the peculiar views advanced in such communications.

27. Resolved, That we repeat the recommendation of 1837 to the several Associations composing this body, in reference to raising funds for defraying the expenses of delegates.

28. Appointed Br. Sawyer to prepare and publish the Minutes, and accompany them with a Circular.

29. Adjourned to meet in Rochester, on the last Wednesday in May, 1839.

W. Berry, Moderator.

TO MY DEPARTED BROTHER.

They tell me consumption's pale hand's on my brow,
That his cold icy breath passes over my cheek!
That, like my lov'd flowers, so sweetly bright now,
My eyes will soon close in their last dreamless sleep!

Oh, brother, I'm coming!—your bright blissful home,
Is better than mine, with its gloom and its tears!
Oh, who would choose always in darkness to roam,
Surrounded with sorrow, with death, and with fear.

My Henry, my brother! the sweet moon is smiling;
And shedding her mild beams on dew drop and flower;
The star that thou loved best, how bright it is shining—
Oh! I would go to thee in just such an hour! L. H. W.

MY HOME IS NOT IN EARTHLY JOYS.

BY CHARLES CONSTANTINE PISE, D. D.

My home is not in earthly joys,
Where bliss is never given:
Allure me not, ye fleeting toys—
My country is in heaven!

Oh! what may charm my heart below,
Whence every hope is driven?
This waste of sorrow and of wo,
Proclaims my home is heaven.

That form, with cheeks of rosy hue,
And eyes as meek as even,
Is not the form of pleasure true—
True pleasure is in heaven.

Her charms are shadows of a day,
To cheat the fancy given—
Her fairy hues shall soon decay:
For all must fade but heaven.

BROTHERLY LOVE.

Oh! how amiable—how blessed in its effects—is brotherly love. The exercise of this virtue, is expressly required throughout the word of God, and in the New Testament is made even the test of the new birth. David said—"How good, and how pleasant it is, for brethren to dwell together in unity." Jesus said—"a new commandment give I unto you, that ye love one another." Paul exhorts—"Let brotherly love continue," and St. John has declared that "by this shall all men know that ye have passed from death unto life, because ye love the brethren." Again—"He that hateth his brother is a murderer; and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him."

In the commands of our religion to "love one another with pure hearts fervently," there is something which comes in conflict with a particular passion of human nature, and is designed to overcome it. From the selfishness of men—which we take to be something very different from a true self-love—arises that spirit of envy and strife, which would make enemies of brethren, and introduce all the sad works of mutual injury and destruction. Alas! how wide is the disposition, for men to "bite and devour" each other. In some respects they are worse than other animals, but few of which prey upon their kind—for men sometimes live on the blighted hopes and ruined fortunes of their neighbors! This makes earth a hell, rather than an Eden. It was to overcome this strange and criminal disposition, and to make human society the abode of peace, by obliging each to help the amount of other's happiness, that we are required to exercise brotherly love. This virtue is not a narrow principle, as explained by some professing Christians, which requires us to love those only who belong to our church. Too many, it is to be feared, when they hear the exhortation, "Let brotherly love continue," derive from it a sense of their duty to love their brethren in the church only. This is too restricted, and a pernicious view of the requirement; for it would leave Christians at liberty—as too many have done—to hate and maltreat all who do not belong to their communion. The Gospel not only requires us to love our friends, as did the Pharisees, but to love our enemies, even as Christ loved his, and prayed and died for them. It may be hard for some minds to cultivate this love, but it is a duty and may be done. We are all brethren. "one God has created us—have we not all one Father?" Hence it is our duty to exercise brotherly love towards all men.—Were this done, what a heaven there would be on earth! Then would we no longer see neighbor circumventing neighbor, and seeking his injury; no longer would men feast, cannibal like, upon the crushed prospects and ruined fortunes of others. But "each esteeming others better than himself," and regarding the happiness of his neighbor, the whole machinery of human society would move on with perfect harmony and effect, producing, what the Gospel was designed to produce, "peace on earth and good will towards men." May God of his infinite goodness and power hasten the day!—Gospel Banner.

EXPERIENCE.

Experience—word so lightly used, so little understood! Experience—mysterious spirit! whose result is felt by all, whose nature is described by none. The father warns the son of your approach, and sometimes looks to you as his offspring's cure, and his own consolation. We hear of you in the nursery; we hear of you in the world—we hear of you in books; but who has recognized you until he was your subject, and who has discovered the object of so much fame, until he has kissed your chain? To gain you is the work of all, and the curse of all; you are at the same time necessary to our happiness, and destructive of our felicity; you are the saviour of all things and the destroyer of all things; our best friend and our bitterest enemy; for you teach us truth and that truth is—despair. To wake from your bright hopes, and feel that all is vanity—to be roused from your crafty plans, and know that all is worthless, is a bitter, but sure destiny. Escape is impossible, for despair is the price of conviction. How many centuries have fled, since Solomon, in his cedar palaces, sung the vanity of man! Though his harp was golden, and his throne of ivory, his feelings were not less keen, and his conviction not less complete. How many sages of all nations have, since the monarch of Jerusalem, echoed this sad philosophy! yet the vain bubble still glitters, and still allures, and must forever. The genealogy of experience is brief; for experience is the child of thought, and thought is the child of action. We can not learn men from books, nor can we form, from written descriptions, a more accurate idea of the movements of the human heart, than we can of the movements of nature. A man may read all his life, and form no conception of the rush of a mountain torrent, or the waving of a forest of pines in a storm; and a man may study in his closet the heart of his fellow-creature forever, and have no idea of the power of ambition, or the strength of revenge. It is when we have acted ourselves, and have seen others acting; it is when we have labored ourselves under the influence of our passions, and have seen others laboring; it is when our great hopes have been attained, or have been balked; it is when, after having the human heart revealed to us, we have the first opportunity to think; it is then, if we can think, that the whole truth lights upon us; it is then that we ask of ourselves, whether it be wise to endure such anxiety of mind, such agitation of spirit, such harrowing of the soul, to gain what may cease to interest to-morrow, or for which, at the best, a few years of enjoyment can alone be afforded; it is then that we waken to the hollowness of all human things; it is then that the sayings of sages, and the warnings of prophets are explained and understood; it is then that we gain experience.

A SISTER.

He who has never known a sister's kind ministrations, nor felt his heart warming beneath her endearing smile and love beaming eye, has been unfortunate indeed.—It is not to be wondered if the fountains of pure feeling flow in his bosom but sluggishly, or if the gentler emotions of his nature be lost in the sterner attributes of manhood.

"That man has grown up among kind and affectionate sisters." I once heard a lady of much observation and experience remark.

"And why do you think so?" said I.

"Because of the rich development of all the tender feelings of the heart."

A sister's influence is felt, even in manhood's riper years; and the heart of him who has grown cold in its chilly contact with the world, will warm and thrill with pure enjoyment, as some incident awakens within him the soft tones and glad melodies of his sister's voice; and he will turn from purposes which a warped and false philosophy had reasoned into expediency, and even weep for the gentler influence which moved him in his earlier years.

HEALTHFUL EXERCISE.

A lady possessed of a fine figure who dresses with taste, and rides gracefully, never appears to more advantage, than when seated on an elegant and well gaited horse. Nor can she indulge in a more salutary mode of exercise. For younger females it is equally beneficial. As riding on horseback, moreover requires some boldness of spirit, the practice tends to lessen that female timidity, which is often inconvenient and injurious to its possessors, as well as to others. However desirable sensibility may be, in a reasonable degree, like all other qualities, it may become excessive, turn to evil and impair health. Experience teaches us that it often does so, especially in feeble persons, in whom it is most prone to become inordinate, on account of their feebleness. To restrain it, therefore, so as to hold it within due bounds, by invigorating exercise, and judicious exposure to something bordering on danger, or at least resembling it, is an end that should be constanly aimed at, in the physical education of females—and also of males, who have any thing of a feminine susceptibility of temperaments. .....As an in-door exercise, for both males and females, nothing is superior to dancing. Besides the grace of movement, which it teaches, it gives action and excitement to the whole frame, the music and social intercourse contributing their part to the general effect. If it sometimes does mischief, by being carried to excess, that is an abuse of it, and does not justly bring reproach on its proper use, or furnish evidence that it ought to be discarded. As well might the use of food be discarded because too many persons abuse it by eating too much. Ten thousand people injure themselves by the abuse of eating, for one who does so by dancing. The exercise of swinging by the arms, if judiciously practiced, is beneficial, especially to those who have weak chests. So is that of dumb-bells, with various others, to which time does not allow me to refer.—Caldwell on Physical Education.

DEATHS.

In Upper Lisle, January 20th, of consumption, Miss LAURA HINMAN, aged 27 years. In her life and death was manifested the power of that faith which brings salvation to a lost world. A few days before her death, she chose a text for her funeral sermon, Isa. xl: 6–8, and requested me to offer the words of consolation from the same. C. S. B.

In Upper Lisle, April 16th, BILLINGS LULL, aged 19 years, an adopted child of Jehiel Clark. While they mourn, may they rejoice that their loss is his gain, and be enabled to say, Father, thy will be done. Sermon by C. S. B.

At Smithville Flats, JOHN W. TARBEL, aged 11 years, second son of widow Tarbel. Sermon by C. S. B.

In Moriah, Franklin county, N. Y., April 25th, Mrs. SARAH MEADS, in the 85th year of her age. Of most excellent character, she was universally beloved. From the age of fourteen, before the venerated Murray commenced his labors in Boston, or the name of Universalist was known in this country, she embraced the doctrine of God's universal grace—in this faith she lived, by it she was guided in her works of goodness, and in it she died rejoicing. Her husband, Thomas Meads, a wealthy farmer in Massachusetts, was a soldier of the revolution, and she devoted all her time in manufacturing clothing for the army, free of expense.

Agreeably to her dying request, a Universalist preacher (Rev. John Simonds,) delivered her funeral sermon on the 26th, from Rev. xiv: 13—"Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord," etc. J. F. S.

 Universalist papers in New England please copy.

In Verona, suddenly, of scarlet fever, HENRY C. SHEPARD, youngest son of Aaron and Sylvia Shepard, aged nine years and five months. How quickly are the ties of fond affection severed by death, and our anticipations based on youthful promise, dissipated!

In Vernon, Oneida county, May 11th, Mr. JOHN VAUGHN, aged 38 years, leaving a wife and five children deeply afflicted. His death was from consumption—his faith in the universal goodness and impartial grace of God, enabled him to bear with uncommon patience and resignation his protracted dissolution. The funeral was attended on the following Sunday in the Methodist meeting-house, in Augusta, by a large concourse of sympathising friends. M. B. SMITH.

UNIVERSALISM THE ONLY PERFECT SYSTEM OF MORALITY:

OR, FATHER B—— AND THE ORPHANS.

BY REV. T. J. SMITH.

[Concluded.]

The sable curtains of night were again drawn round the world, as I was left to my own reflections, and the stillness around. I now had an ardent desire to see this venerable father, and hear from his own lips the principles of his actions. I soon fell asleep, and the sweet visions of repose mingled joy in the scenes of the night. I awoke with the first ray of the morning, refreshed in spirits, and thankful to the Giver of every good and perfect gift, for the kind care and keeping through the silent watches of the night. My thoughts soon recurred to the day that had gone, and the facts that I then had heard. I was left to wonder how, and why, a religious creed should affect the daily walk and conversation of the believer, as indirectly advanced in the case of Deacon F. and those called infidels. The one with many pretensions, still lacked in good practice; the others, without any pretensions to piety, were forward in the practice of virtue. How belief should have any power over our conduct, I could not understand. And if so, what must be the belief of Father B——? he was called a Christian, and so was Deacon F., and yet the conduct of the one was as different from the other, as light is from darkness. The deacon was a Calvinist, and what could be the doctrine of Father B——? This I desired to know. The doctrine of Calvin I understood. The creeds of Calvinists and Arminians I was familiar with; but I knew of none essentially different from these. And these were too nearly alike in the main particulars, to lead to such difference in conduct. What Father B—— believed, I was overanxious to learn, and ardently desired his return. This desire was soon to be gratified, for he then, unknown to me, had returned late the preceding night, and presently made his appearance in the room I occupied, seemingly much pleased with my rapid recovery. After much agreeable conversation, in which I was instructed as well as amused, we were summoned to our morning meal.

Our repast being finished, and we again comfortably seated, Father B—— recommenced bringing forth "things both new and old," for my entertainment. The conversation soon turned upon religion—its origin, nature, and adaptation to the wants of mankind—and, withal, its purifying, ennobling, and heavenly influence on individuals and communities. This was a subject with which Father B—— appeared not only acquainted, but even familiar—giving an outline of the same in words fitly chosen and full of meaning. His views were strange, and somewhat startled me by their novelty. I proposed objections, which he readily answered with much good humor, and in such a masterly manner, that, to say the least, I was silenced if not convinced. I soon learned that he was familiar with the whole volume of revelation, while my knowledge (which often had appeared extensive in my own eyes) was confined, as it were, to one page thereof. As a matter of prudence, I resolved to waive all farther objections, and try to profit by what I could not successfully argue down.

His remarks appeared reasonable and just, but it seemed to me they were opposed to Scripture. This objection availed me nothing, for Scripture testimony soon drove me from this retreat, and I frankly confessed my inability to maintain opinions counter to his, and begged him to favor me with a history of his religious experience. I asked in sincerity, for I wished to learn what religious principles induced him to such kind and praiseworthy actions toward his fellow-men, as ascribed to him by Harriet M. He readily consented, and commenced in the following words:—

"Young man, as I believe you ask with a good motive, I cheerfully comply with your request, and will try, in my broken manner, to give you a brief account of my past life in matters of religion. I was brought up and educated after the straightest sect, a Calvinist—instructed in that doctrine, and taught to believe with my forefathers, that the Calvinistic creed was the only way 'given under heaven, whereby men could be saved.' Early in life I was awakened to this subject, and why I did not immediately unite with the church, I know not; I did not doubt its doctrine, nor want for warm and pressing invitations to join, but when my mind was consenting, the words of my Master seemed to stand before me—'Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they testify of me.' For several years my attention was given to the volume of inspiration, and I yet remember well how I then thought the Bible contained strange and contradictory sentiments. I found much therein that seemed to favor and support my creed, and much was against it. Baffled in the attempt to make what I had been taught, agree with the tenor of Scripture, or the Scripture agree with my creed, and being advised by the apostle to 'try the spirits,' I determined to test the doctrine in another way.

"I now proposed to myself to bring the tenets of the church down to practice, and see their effects on the conduct and happiness of the believer. I was taught by this creed, 'That God from all eternity elected a part of mankind to everlasting life, and for them made provision for a Redeemer, but was pleased to pass by the rest—provide them no Saviour, but ordained them to wrath and indignation—and all without any foresight or regard to any works whatever, on the part of the creature.' On this fundamental article of my faith, long and critically I studied. By it, the destiny of both classes was fixed and sure, in the counsels and decrees of Jehovah. Those elected to life and bliss unending, could live as they listed—the vilest and best of conduct, alike, was sanctioned and blessed by Him who made them his peculiar favorites. And those ordained to wrath, could do nothing to alter their destiny—vice and virtue, alike, must receive the same reward. With neither class could I see any motive whatever, to 'cease to do evil, and learn to do well.' I looked again, and viewed the subject in another light. By this doctrine, the Parent of the universe was represented as partial, cruel, and unjust, taken in connection with the Saviour's command to his followers, 'Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.' If men were required to be like Him in perfection, and he was partial, cruel, and unjust, then men to be perfect as he is perfect, they too would be partial, cruel, and unjust, and would treat with merited contempt the unregenerate, and bless those, and those alone, of the same faith.

"But as you are acquainted with this doctrine, I need not enlarge, for you will readily perceive by these hints the course I pursued, and the natural results of my investigation. The more I searched and reasoned, the more unreasonable and inconsistent appeared my creed. One point after another was cast aside, for I could not cling to a doctrine which virtually forbid my doing unto others as I wished them to do unto me. This was not the work of a week or a month, but rather of many. When the whole system, its nature and bearings, had been examined and rejected, I turned my attention to find the truth of revelation.

"About this time I removed some distance from the place of my nativity, and located in a neighborhood where the Arminian principles were the most popular. I attended their meetings—learned their peculiar views—and at first was well pleased with the new doctrine. It gave the Deity a more agreeable character—removed all partiality, cruelty, and injustice, and made him the kind Parent of all his children. But when I considered the subject in its length and breadth, it then was clear, that what this system made up in goodness, it took away in power—made nothing positive and sure—but left all to the sport of chance; and in going through the same process I had pursued with the faith I first imbibed, I found it nothing more nor less than a doctrine of continued sinning and repentance, and, consequently, that it did not and could not inspire its believer with the spirit of love, to 'bless and curse not.'

"You may not be aware of the natural consequence of a rejection of these doctrines. When these two systems had been discarded, my mind, racked by many discordant views, was reft of hope, that anchor of the soul, and 'swung from its moorings' into the broad and dreary wastes of infidelity. I then was truly 'without hope and without God in the world.' There was an aching void—a longing desire; nature could not fill the one, or reason gratify the other. I fain would have given credit to the testimony of Holy Writ, but it appeared opposed to reason, and reason was a part of myself, and how could I reject it? I determined to follow the light within me, lead where it might, and cast revelation aside as the fabled tales of other times. Man seemed a lone orphan in the 'vale of tears'—the tender ties of consanguinity were severed—the great connecting link was sundered—all was dark and cheerless in the pilgrimage of life—my soul was wrapped in doubt and darkness—while beyond the dark valley of the shadow of death, nought but the horrors of annihilation were there! No genial ray of light divine could reach the dreary vault—but night, appalling and unending night of darkest shade and deepest gloom, would brood in sable horror over all that once was man. Sickening, life-taking thought!—and yet it was brighter and sweeter, far, than endless ages of pain and wo!

"Time rolled away, and the 'blackness of darkness' was my bitter portion. Such was the state of my mind, that I gladly would have sunk in Lethe's cold and dreary wave, to rise no more forever; for I was dead while yet I lived.

"But this misery was not always to last. The same reason that led me to doubt and deny an overruling Power, seemed now to whisper that I had forsaken her domain, and pointed me to the works of nature and providence, where the marks of His forming hand were clearly seen, and as I had followed her in her disordered state, she called me to follow and believe her in her native sphere. I obeyed her dictates, and from the abundant and manifest proofs of a Deity in all I saw, in all I felt, and in all I was, the conviction was sure—I could not resist it—'there was a God, all nature spoke,' and told me, too, that he was good. This was the first dawning of light upon my benighted soul, like the faint glimmering of gray twilight, the precursor of approaching day. The Book of Revelation was still viewed with suspicion, but I resolved to look again into the long neglected and almost despised volume. I took it up, and the first words that met my eye were, 'GOD IS LOVE.' Could this be so? Did it mean as it said? Was there no limitation? Was there another passage in the Bible of the same import? I searched—yes, there was: the Psalmist says, 'the Lord is good unto all, and his tender mercies over all his works.' The Saviour declares, that 'He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth his rain on the just and the unjust.' The Bible seemed full of testimony. I had seen the same before, but not in the same light—a veil was over my eyes—prejudice warped its meaning, and hid its truth. Nature, Providence, and Revelation now agreed, and to my mind the prospect opened bright and fair. On the declaration of the apostle, that 'God is Love,' I founded my theory, and you may well suppose the superstructure corresponded with the corner-stone.

"My faith was the result of much toil and research, and I now believe (as I have done for many years) in the 'restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began'—'that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he will gather together in one, all things, in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him.' In short, I believe 'in one God, the Father of the spirits of all flesh,' and 'one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time.' And the prophet assures me, that 'the ransomed of the Lord shall remember and return unto Zion, with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads.' My bosom now expanded with hope—the hope of immortal life beyond the grave—and the ample promises of revelation, furnished an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast, entering into that within the vail, whither our forerunner for us hath entered. The refulgent beams from Bethlehem's star, dawned on the pathway of my feet, and life, and light, and love divine, filled me with the joy and peace of believing. Life-giving, happifying faith! It fills the soul with love supreme to God the Father, and love and good will to our fellowmen. By it the chain of friendship is brightened: the cord that binds to life and all intelligence, is the cord of love. It is the doctrine of impartial grace, and leads its believer to 'cease to do evil and learn to do well'—'to walk in the ways of wisdom, which are pleasant, and all her paths are peace.' It works by love, and purifies the heart to every good word and work. Different, far different from all other doctrines ever believed, the nearer it is lived unto, the purer and better it will appear. It contains the spirit of life within itself, and he who drinks this spirit in, will feel that the bread of heaven and the water of eternal life has reached his heart, and he will strive to become perfect, even as his Father in heaven is perfect; and as God is good unto all, he will be the same to the evil and unthankful, and will learn 'to bless and curse not.' Then is it not pre-eminently what the angelic host declared to the shepherds: 'Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, and good will toward men'!

"Young man, I have tried this doctrine for years, and it never has been found wanting. I have endeavored to walk by its light, to live by its spirit, and adorn the same in a well ordered life. Of all the blessings that ever fall to the share of earth's wayward children, give me my religion, and I then have a treasure laid up in heaven, where moth and rust doth not corrupt, nor thieves purloin from my possession. Infidels may mock—skeptics scorn and deride—but scoffs and derision move me not. I pity, but can not condemn them. Their doubts are based upon its abuse. They have heard unreasonable, inconsistent, and horrid sentiments advanced in its support, and disgust has been the consequence. They have seen many bearing the Christian name, using their religion like a cloak, for a covering, professing a great love to God and their fellow-men, and yet, with all their pretensions, their brethren might float down the stream of poverty to ruin, and their purse-strings would be tied with the 'Gordian knot,' which compassion for some missionary cause alone could untie. The widow and orphan might pine away and starve, and no tears bedew their cheeks—no aid be given; but copious effusions of briny drops would fall for the miserable condition of the poor Hindoo, in Indostan's torrid clime. No marvel that many scorn and deride, while profession and practice are such strangers to each other. But rather a marvel that from the horrid dogmas preached, and the natural fruit of a corrupt tree, many more are not robbed of hope and God in the world. Pure religion alone can stay the onward tide of moral death, and the apostle informs us, that 'pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father, is this: to visit the widows and fatherless in their afflictions, and keep himself unspotted from the world.' To do like this, is to follow the angel commissioned from high Heaven to bless the children of men. In one hand she holds all terrestrial blessings, and with the other points her votaries to heaven. All who see her in her primeval loveliness, must and will love her. With arms of snowy whiteness around her children, she bears them through earth's winding paths, and peace and joy rest under the shadow of her wings. Those who have been with her most, will ever love her best.

"Young man, the sands of my life are nearly run. The frosts of many winters are on my brow, yet the chill of age reaches not my heart. That still beats as warm as in the morning of life. I have seen, felt, and enjoyed much, and soon, very soon, the 'silver cord will be loosened, the golden bowl be broken, the pitcher at the fountain be broken, and the wheel at the cistern cease to revolve;' the current of life must cease its course, my bosom fail to heave, my heart forget to beat, and I be 'brought down to the grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in, in his season.' Yet the charnel-house has no terrors for me. My Lord and Saviour burst the bars of the tomb, and bore away the keys of death and hell, and sung his triumph when he rose! Then why should I fear? Beyond the dreary vault that soon must hold this feeble clay, this mortal must put on immortality, and death be swallowed up of life. There, there shall meet the wide-spread family of man, and unending life of joy and love bless a congregated world. With such hopes I go, and had I the gold of Ophir, the diamonds of Golconda, and all the wealth of worlds at my command, I would rather give the heavenly faith of a world's salvation than all on earth beside, as a lasting legacy to my fellowmen. It would bless them through the journey of life, and at the closing scene, fan their hopes of a brighter and better world to come. May this faith be yours as it is mine, and then will you know the joy and peace of believing."

Thus closed the narrative of Father B——. I need not inform the reader of the various feelings awakened in my bosom, while listening to the rapid sketch of Christian experience by this "father in Israel."

The Christian religion was presented in a new light to my mind. I was interested in the subject, and fervently prayed for its light to reach my heart, and guide my feet. Skepticism, that chaos of the mind, had brooded over my being, and my experience in regard to the popular doctrines of the day, agreed with that of Father B——, and I determined to pursue the same course which had led him safely through the mazes of doubt and darkness. In short, all I had heard in the house of this venerable man, was full of interest and instruction.

In a few days after Father B——'s return, my strength was so far regained, that I made preparations to complete my journey. When I expressed a willingness to compensate my host for the trouble I had made him, he replied, "he had done no more than his duty," and hinted that my obligation to him would be discharged, if opportunity and disposition enabled me to imitate the "good Samaritan."

A horse was readily obtained, and with a heart filled with gratitude, I bade a lasting adieu to the inmates of the mansion of Father B——. I soon reached the place of my destination, accomplished my business, and returned again to my long left home. Though detained by misfortune several weeks longer than I anticipated, yet this time was of more real value to me, than many years that had previously rolled away. My mind recurred back in sweet satisfaction, to the place where the germ of a living faith and hope was first planted in my bosom. There the first glimmerings of the truth of the Christian religion burst upon my mind. And the spark of devotion there imbibed, I have fanned by a sedulous attention to the Scriptures, and now rejoice in the faith of a world's salvation.

Reader, with the fond hope that the truth, the love and spirit of the Gospel, may reach your heart, and induce you "to do unto others as you wish them to do to you," I bid you farewell.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;

FOR SUNDAY, JUNE 17, 1838.

JOHN XIX: 1-16.

Last week we traced the history of Jesus down to the period when the Sanhedrin had, in their mighty council, condemned him to death for blasphemy, as they called it, and had retired for the purpose of contriving how best to carry their malicious and unjust judgment into execution.—Some thought they had not the power of life and death; others, that they were afraid the people would interfere and rescue their intended victim; others, that they wished to expose Jesus to a still more cruel and ignominious death than stoning; at all events the result of their consultation, was a determination to carry him before the Roman governor, then in the city on account of the festival, and accuse him of crimes against the Roman government. Between the retiring of the members of the Council and their re-assembling to carry their plot into execution, Peter's fears overcame his attachment to his Master, and the natural forwardness of his disposition, and caused him to deny him whom he had promised to follow unto death.

We will now briefly essay to connect the events last week, considered with the paragraph selected for this week, by an outline of the intervening transactions. If the attempt be made by our readers to fill this hiatus from their memories before proceeding to peruse the following sketch, they may again derive from this attempt such benefits as were last week indicated.

Early in the morning the Council re-assembled, and with their prisoner, proceeded to the palace of the Roman governor, known among them by its Latin name Prætorium. The attentive readers of the evangelical narrative will have already noticed that Jesus was led into the palace, but that his accusers did not go in with him. They may wish to know why. The reason was this—they might have contracted such ceremonial defilement as would have required a week's separation from the congregation, and thus have prevented them from participating in the services of the festival which had commenced the evening before. "They could do a great injustice, but they would not endure a small defilement so much stronger was their superstition than their principle." When Pilate came forth and took his seat on the tribunal erected for the administration of justice in the open air, upon an enclosed space called the pavement, because paved with marble and stones, in the style called Mosaic, the members of the Council presented their indictment against Jesus—"We found this man perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying that he himself is Christ, a king." This charge they must have known to be false: they must have known in their hearts that not one of themselves but was more disaffected to the Roman government than was Jesus, so far as they could discover. But malice, like scandal, is not scrupulous in the choice of means: Both are blind to the beam in their own eye, but marvellously acute in the perception of specks in the eyes of others. Pilate, after examining Jesus relative to this charge, and finding in him no symptom of a seditious spirit, came forth and so spake to his accusers. Upon men, however, determined upon the death of Jesus, this only exasperated their malign feelings instead of silencing them. The narrative is now occupied with details of the Jewish rulers and populace renewing their charges of sedition and treason, and of Pilate's repeated attempts to release Jesus, as one entirely guiltless of what was laid to his charge. We have been asked by a youthful student of Christ's history, why Pilate did not persist in his determination to act as justice demanded—why he ever consented to condemn one whom he thought innocent. To enable our young querist to conceive of Pilate's motives aright, we stated to him that he was appointed to the government of Judea by the Roman emperor Tiberius, who, being of a jealous temper, might have recalled Pilate had the Jews made out a plausible complaint against him. This he doubtless thought they were likely to do if he refused them what they seemed so resolutely set upon. Therefore after having made five, some reckon seven, unsuccessful attempts to discharge Jesus, and after being pretty plainly threatened with a complaint against him to the emperor, we find Pilate making a compromise with his conscience or sense of right, washing his hands in token of his having no share in the shedding of innocent blood, and then reluctantly delivering up Jesus to the usual punishment of traitors and revolters.—Certainly here, the fear of man brought a snare, and happy is he who is so superior to this fear as to have no parallel to it in his own history.

At the commencement of this week's paragraph we find Pilate giving his consent to the crucifixion of Jesus, seemingly at least, and leaving him to be scourged. This was always inflicted upon seditious persons before they were crucified. After being scourged Jesus was led back to the court of the Prætorium, and there was subjected to the rude and unfeeling mockery of the Roman soldiery. The details of their treatment are harrowing to the feelings. Pilate thought that the sight of his scourging, and his indignities, might have abated the rage of his enemies, and somewhat subdue their malice, and accordingly, presenting Jesus in this miserable plight, he again pleads for his release. But his expostulations now, as before, are vain. Finding from the Jews that Jesus claimed to be the Son of God—some heathen deity as Pilate would understand it—his reluctance to condemn him is increased. But all his efforts are unavailing; and against all his honest convictions, the Jewish insinuation prevails—"If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend." The fear of a removal from office prevails against his honest convictions; and willing to "content the people, Pilate gave sentence that it should be as they required." Immediately after Pilate had pronounced the sentence, the persecutors of Jesus hurried him away to execution.

Here the paragraph of this week leaves us. In our next week's "Mail" we shall resume the narrative. Meanwhile to gratify the sense of justice in some of our readers, we may mention that the Jews, heretofore dissatisfied with Pilate's government, were not less so after this transaction; but persisted in their complaints to the emperor, who, about five years afterwards, recalled Pilate and banished him to a remote province—Vienne in Dauphiny—where, after enduring great misery for two years, he committed suicide. CIRCULAR LETTER,

Of the Pennsylvania Convention of Universalists.

Dearly Beloved—Our recent session was holden in a town in which the brethren are few in number, and where consequently we could not reasonably expect to enjoy so much general communion as might have been experienced elsewhere. Nevertheless our meetings for public worship, especially those holden in the evenings, were numerously attended by remarkably attentive hearers; and we have good reason to believe that our labors of love were productive of satisfactory results. And the joys arising herefrom, were heightened by the unity of feeling and free social intercourse and communion of the council of brethren. The Lord evermore preserve us in this heavenly state of mind, and continue to us the blessedness of unity and love. Amen.

In this our annual epistle, we design introducing and recommending several measures, the adoption of which would, in our judgment, greatly conduce to the welfare of the brethren, and the prosperity of our common cause. We affectionately invite your attention thereto, in the hope that you will be so satisfied of the utility of the measures proposed, as practically to regard them, and to make of such practical regard a point of religious duty. We are sensible that our recommendations are, to a commendable extent, already observed by the brotherhood; but we feel assured that greater fidelity than has heretofore been generally manifested, is required by the spirit of the doctrine we profess, and the state of our denomination at large. We therefore beseech you to hear us patiently.

I. Without intending any preference in the arrangement of items, we begin by recommending a more extended patronage of our periodical publications. Having none other than a common interest in the prosperity of those who are engaged in these means of promoting a knowledge of divine truth, we feel much freedom in urging this topic for consideration. We know that several of our papers have numerous patrons—but we have reason to believe that thousands of persons who are abundantly able to defray the expense of subscription, do nothing to sustain our periodicals. They thus deny themselves a source of special gratification and improvement, and withhold their mite from the means essential to the prosperity of the brethren connected with the press. This ought not so to be. We would have every man consult his pecuniary resources and necessary expenditures—but we would also have him remember that a weekly messenger of good tidings is a minister of comfort with which he can not so readily dispense as with many an article of luxury of ten fold the cost. Less than one cent per day, will furnish any individual in the United States with any paper published weekly by our denomination, including the expenses of postage.

We also recommend the strictest punctuality in remitting to publishers the amount of subscription. This seems a small matter to engage the attention of a State Convention—but we are not permitted to "despise the day of small things." Great ends are frequently accomplished by apparently insignificant means. The coral is forming a continent in the Pacific Ocean. That which to each of the patrons of a paper is of very small importance, is all-important to the publisher. The farmer who should sell a bushel of grain to each of 2000 persons, scattered over the Union, would scarcely admit the plea of any one of his debtors, that $2 can be of little consequence to him who has faithfully tilled the soil and gathered the harvest. We are of opinion that our publishers would do well to require advance payment in all cases—but since they consider this course inexpedient, we strongly and specially recommend our brethren punctually to remit to our publishers the just recompense of their labors.

II. Social meetings for prayer, mutual instruction, and praise, contribute greatly to the growth of the mind in all the graces of the Christian life. They tend to unity, peace and joy among the disciples, and are instrumental in arming them against the power of the adversary. He who is a well-instructed scribe in the kingdom of heaven, will not only be always ready to give a reason of the hope within him, but will be always prepared to minister consolation to the afflicted, and comfort to the mourner. And he will also be at no loss should the evil day visit himself. We know of no means so conducive to all the ends of the Christian institution, as the description of meetings here referred to, provided all things be done decently and in order. We recommend zeal while we reprobate sectarian cant—and encourage the brethren to culture the generous feeling of enthusiasm, while we admonish them against the evils of fanaticism. Pray with the spirit and the understanding—sing, instruct, exhort, in like manner; and though no public minister of the truth is in your midst to lead in your devotional exercises, the spirit of the Highest will be present with all its quickening and regenerating power. Though but two or three be assembled in the name of the Lord's Anointed, you may claim the promised blessing, if you are "strong in faith, giving glory to God, being fully persuaded that what he has promised he is able to perform."

III. Punctuality in attendance on the public ministry of the Word, is a privilege and duty which no disciple can neglect without detriment to his spiritual interests. Profession of faith without possession of a desire to abide in the courts of the Lord, appertains to the letter that killeth. He who has been purified from the dross of error by the refining fire, and afterwards becomes lukewarm, is in danger of the coldness and torpor of the second death. We would have the brethren regard their Christian privileges as their duty to themselves, to the cause in which they profess to be engaged, and especially to the rising generation. No man of illuminated mind, desires his children to contemn the counsel of the Most High, and tread under foot the blood of the everlasting covenant—yet neglect of public worship by parents, has a tendency to alienate the affections of their offspring from the Hope of Israel, and shut them out from the blessed joys of the New Jerusalem. We beseech the disciples duly to ponder the paths of their feet, lest a snare come upon them, and they be caught in the toils which themselves have laid. Bring up your children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord—else they will not, they can not pronounce the hearty filial benediction.

IV. We feel at liberty to admonish our brethren against the evil of neglecting the annual sessions of our Associations, and of the annual meeting of this Convention. Our preachers in Pennsylvania are as yet few in number—and it is very desirable that they give heed to the yearly convocations of the brethren. Concert of action is essential to the welfare of Zion. It is true, distance and limited pecuniary resources are pleas, the plausibility of which we have personal cause to allow—but when we take into account the advantages accruing from personal intercourse of the disciples, (especially the preachers,) and mutual advice and encouragement—and when we also consider that our societies could, without great inconvenience, defray the expenses of attendance, we affectionately and particularly recommend the punctuality of attendance above signified, and express a hope that our brethren who are united in society relation, will make suitable provision for the expenses of their delegates.

V. We have no reason to believe that there is at present any looseness in the discipline of our churches in this State, yet to guard against the evils of that liberty which soon resolves itself into licentiousness, we recommend our Associations and Societies to countenance no person as a Universalist who sets at nought the moral principles of the Gospel. We must guard against rigor on the one hand, and laxity on the other. Charity is greater than faith or hope—but a drunkard, a profane swearer, a dishonest man, or other vile person, has no claim to the dignified and honorable appellation of a Universalist. This brief word of caution we earnestly commend to the practical regard of all who pray for the peace and prosperity of Jerusalem. In concluding this annual epistle, we beseech the Master of Assemblies to pour out his spirit upon all flesh, to the end that the knowledge and love of his name may have free course, run, and be glorified; and especially do we devoutly pray that our denomination may continue to increase in numbers and in grace by the energies of the word of truth. In behalf of the Convention.

CIRCULAR LETTER

Of the New-York State Convention of Universalists.

Beloved brethren—Another year has passed, and in the good providence of God, this body has been permitted to hold another annual session.

We have to regret that owing to the busy season of the year, and the bad travelling, the different Associations composing this body were not so fully represented, as duty seems to require, and we sincerely hope that in future, greater attention will be paid to this subject.—Let Associations appoint individuals as delegates whose attendance may be relied on, and let them be authorized to find substitutes in case any circumstances should prevent their fulfilling, in person, the duties assigned them. Let the delegation when assembled in council be authorized to fill all vacancies that may exist, so far as it may be done from within the limits of their respective Associations.

To secure a more general attendance, the Convention at its session in 1837, passed a resolution designed to relieve delegates from the burden of expenses to which they have hitherto been subjected. That resolution was repeated at this session, and it is hoped will commend itself to the attention of our Associations and societies at large.

The business of the Council, we hardly need say, was conducted with the usual kind and conciliatory spirit. We have no bickerings, and no unfriendly contention here

The public religious services were fully attended, and were accompanied with the most obvious tokens of heart-felt and thrilling interest on the part of the numerous auditors.

So far as we could learn, the prospects of our cause throughout the State were never more truly flattering than at present. In common with other denominations, we have suffered to some extent, from the late severe pressure of the times, but it is believed that little permanent injury has been sustained to the interests of our Zion.

Altogether, this session of our Convention has been eminently gratifying, and, we doubt not, useful. The interest of our beloved cause, we hope, have been consulted and our prayer is, that many such meetings may be enjoyed Brethren in the faith, let your light so shine before men, that others seeing your good works may glorify your Father in heaven. By order, T. J. SAWYER.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

No. 27.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.

Utica, June 9, 1838.

My Dear Sir—Having shown that every attribute of the divine Being, as taught in the Scriptures and allowed by all Christians, stands directly opposed to the doctrine of endless misery, and clearly in favor of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind, I shall next proceed to show that the character, advent, labors and doctrine of Christ, as predicted in the Old Testament, and more fully laid down in the New, can not be consistently explained on any other ground but that of universal salvation.

2. In what light does the Old Testament exhibit the promised Messiah? Does it ever ascribe to him the character of a partial Saviour, or that of a weak, capricious, or revengeful being? Does it ever represent him as undertaking less than the salvation of the whole world? or as engaging in a work, for the accomplishment of which he was incompetent? or in the pursuit of which he should encounter obstacles insurmountable, or difficulties that should discourage him? No, neither. He is uniformly represented as an all-sufficient, entirely competent, completely successful, and gloriously triumphant Redeemer and Saviour.

3. He is there set forth as the Seed of the woman that should bruise the serpent's head—the Shiloh, to whom the gathering of the people should be—the Rock smitten and the Well of water, as a fountain of life—the Fountain to wash in from sin and uncleanness—the Sun of Righteousness—the bright and morning Star—the Stone cut from the mountain without hands, that was destined to fill the whole earth—a Shepherd to lead and feed his flock—a Refuge for the weary—an Ensign for the people—a Prophet, King, and Governor to instruct and rule them, from sea to sea, and from the rivers to the ends of the earth—the Righteous Branch and Tree of life, both to heal and nourish the nations—the Messenger and Testator of the Covenant—the Refiner and Purifier—a Feast of fat things for all people—in short, as the Salvation of God to the ends of the earth.

4. If these representations exhibit the true character of Messiah, I ask, shall the serpent's kingdom eternally stand? Shall the people never be gathered to Shiloh? Shall souls forever thirst and never taste of the water of life? Shall sin and uncleanness never be washed away? Are there millions of souls on whom the Sun of Righteousness, with healing wings, shall never rise nor shine? Shall not the whole earth be filled with the knowledge of God, as the waters cover the sea? Will the Shepherd never feed his flock, nor the weary ever find rest? Will the people never flock to their Ensign, nor the Prophet instruct, nor the King rule over them? Will the nations never be healed? Will the Messenger of the Covenant never come to his temple, nor refine his silver, nor purify the sons of Levi? Shall not all people partake of the feast of fat things? And shall not the salvation of God extend to the ends of the earth? How will you answer these and similar questions?

5. In like manner the New Testament exhibits Christ as a universal and complete Saviour. He is there represented as the true Light, that lighteth every man that cometh into the world—the Bread of God, that cometh down from heaven to give life unto the world—the Physician to heal the morally diseased—the Author and Finisher of faith, and the Captain of Salvation—the Jesus, or Saviour, who should save his people from their sins—the Deliverer who should turn away ungodliness from Jacob—the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world—the Head of every man—the Head of the Church, which is his body, and the fulness of him that filleth all in all—the Heir of all things—the faithful and true Witness—the prevailing Lion of the tribe of Judah—the Door and Shepherd of the sheep, who gave his life for the sheep—the Mediator and Testator of the better covenant—in short, as the complete Saviour of the world.

6. Now if Christ be the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world, shall not every man be enlightened? If the Bread of God giveth life to the world, shall not the world have life? If the morally sick are healed, shall they eternally remain diseased? Shall not faith, in the now unbelieving, be perfected under such an author and finisher as Christ, and salvation be completed under such a Captain, of whom it is said, "he shall not fail nor be discouraged"? If he saves his people from their sins, shall they eternally remain unsaved? If he turns away ungodliness from Jacob, and takes away the sin of the world, shall ungodliness and sin forever remain and hold mankind in endless bondage? Shall the body of Christ eternally remain incomplete, or diseased, or in bondage? Shall the Heir of all things never possess his inheritance? Did the Faithful and True Witness testify falsely when he declared, "and I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me"? Shall the Lion of the tribe of Judah be defeated and never prevail? Shall the sheep never enter the Door opened for them, nor the Shepherd that died for them, lead them into the green pastures and by the side of the still waters of God's love? Shall the Mediator never accomplish the object of his mission, nor see the better covenant fulfilled, nor witness the conferring of the inheritance on those to whom it was bequeathed and attested by his death? In short, if he be the Saviour of the world, shall not the world be saved? Can he be in truth styled the Saviour of the world, if a large portion of the world be eternally lost?

7. From all these and numerous other descriptions of his advent, character, and the object of his mission, what else can be inferred but that he came for the purpose of effecting the salvation of all men, and was purposely represented as a universal Saviour, both in the Old and New Testaments? Can all these representations possibly accord with the idea of his being only a partial Saviour or Deliverer of mankind? Surely not. Moreover, the character of Christ, as exhibited in his life, labors, and teachings, while on earth, can never accord with the doctrine of endless misery, nor with any other than that of the salvation of all men.

8. In what character did Jesus appear on earth—in that of a Destroyer, or that of a Saviour? in that of a friend, or foe of mankind? in that of an impartial and kind benefactor of all, or in that of a capricious and petulent avenger of pretended or real wrongs? When persecuted, did he retaliate? When reviled, did he revile again? When reproached and scoffed at, did he curse his foes? Nay—his whole life was one continued exhibition of love, benevolence, and compassion. It is emphatically and truly said of him, "he went about doing good." To the poor and needy he was condescending and humane. He gave health to the sick, feet to the lame, eyes to the blind, ears to the deaf, speech to the dumb, sanity to the lunatic, bread to the hungry, forgiveness to the sinful, salvation to the lost, and life to the dead. Ever merciful and mild, he compassionated the sufferings of every condition, wept at the grave of Lazarus, his friend, and also over the approaching woes of Jerusalem, where resided his bitterest foes; and even for his bloody and cruel murderers, he prayed on the cross, and in the agonies of death at their unfeeling hands, besought his Father for their forgiveness!

9. As his life was one of ever-enduring benevolence and compassion, so was it one of spotless purity and holiness, of filial obedience, and of humble resignation to every dispensation of divine Providence. The same resignation which he practised, he inculcated upon the minds of his followers—teaching them that God was good and worthy of all confidence and trust. Sometimes he reproved his followers for their want of faith or confidence in God, but never for putting too much in him. "O ye of little faith, wherefore do ye doubt?" He teaches them, the very hairs of their heads are all numbered—that even a sparrow falls not to the ground without their Father's notice, and that God even clothes the grass of the field and the lilies of the vale, and will by no means neglect the interest and happiness of his nobler creature, man.

10. He also taught his followers to practice the same benevolence and kindness to their fellowmen, that they experienced at the hand of God—to love their enemies, bless those that cursed them, do good to those that hated them, and pray for those that despitefully used and persecuted them, in order that they might thus imitate, and become practically and characteristically the children of their Father in heaven. Now, had Jesus inculcated the idea of the implacability and hatred of God towards his enemies—that he caused his sun to shine and his rain to fall only on the just and good, and withheld them from the wicked and unjust, the evil and unthankful; had he taught them to hate and curse their enemies, that they might be like God; in short, had he set them the example by cursing his enemies, and dooming them to endless wo, instead of praying for them on the cross; then indeed we might well doubt his impartiality, and question whether he either believed or taught the doctrine of universal salvation. But when we consider the life, the labors, the spirit, the temper, the example, the doctrine, the precepts and moral instructions of Jesus, we seriously and earnestly ask, is there aught in any of them, incompatible with this benevolent doctrine, or aught that favors in the least, the unmerciful doctrine of never-ending wo? Let the candid and reflecting reader judge.

11. Again, if Christ is to be regarded as the image and representative of God, and his spirit and his temper to his enemies, as the spirit and temper of God, as the Scriptures teach us, how can we come to any other conclusion than that God is good to all, not excepting his enemies, and designs the salvation of the whole world? Did Jesus pray in faith, and did a double portion of the spirit of his Father rest upon him, when he prayed for his betrayers and murderers on the cross? If so, will they not be saved? And if their sins are to be blotted out, and they are to obtain salvation, (as Peter teaches, Acts iii: 14-26,) who is there in the world that will not? In short, if God be for us, who can be against us?

12. How can the great object of Christ's mission and labors, be mistaken by an attentive reader of the Bible? The inspired apostle declares, "we have seen and do testify, that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world."—1 John iv: 14. Those that saw and heard the sublime instructions of Jesus, said, "We have heard him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world."—John iv: 42. It is worthy of remark, that Christ is no where called, in Scripture, the Saviour of a part of the world, nor a part of a Saviour of the world, but emphatically and repeatedly the Saviour of the world. That the object of his mission was the salvation of the whole world, few in the present day dare deny. The question then occurs, Will that object be accomplished, or will Christ fail or be defeated? Now we maintain, and think the Bible abundantly warrants the conclusion, that he will not fail nor be defeated; (Isa. xlii: 4 and liii: 10, 11;) but that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, all his gracious designs will be consummated, his labors of love accomplished, his object completely attained, his doctrine and predictions fulfilled, the whole world redeemed from sin, purified in the blood of the Lamb, rendered holy and happy, and glorious forevermore, and the reconciled kingdom delivered up to God the Father, that God may be all in all. Not one word of all he predicted shall fail; not one for whom he died shall eternally perish; but all, reclaimed and restored, shall shout, "Salvation to God and the Lamb forever."

13. As a Prophet, Christ predicted both the fact and manner of his own death, his resurrection from the dead, the destruction of Jerusalem, the woes coming on that generation, and many other events that have been literally and fully accomplished, and thus gave us evidence both of his prophetic character and veracity, insomuch that we have every reason to believe every other prediction and declaration which he made relative to the object of his mission and the salvation of the world, shall, in God's own good time, be fully verified. His resurrection and exaltation to glory, is the sure pledge of the resurrection and salvation of the world—the earnest that, because he lives, we shall live also—that as the head of every man, the first born of every creature, the first begotten from the dead, hath arisen, so his body, (every individual of the human family constituting a part thereof,) the fulness of him that filleth all in all, shall eventually arise to glory, incorruption, and endless bliss.

14. I shall now proceed to consider the more direct and positive testimony of Scripture in favor of the final salvation of all mankind. I take the Bible as the only correct, safe and all-sufficient rule of faith and practice. "To the law and the testimony; if we speak not according to these it is because there is no light in us." I profess to receive no doctrine but what can be proved by a "Thus saith the Lord." But if reason, common sense, philosophy, correct logic from allowed premises, benevolence, the prayers of all good beings in the universe, and last and best, the general voice of revelation, all unite and harmonize in attesting the doctrine of universal salvation, then must this doctrine indeed be worthy of all acceptation. This is my firm belief. The following are some of my reasons for regarding this doctrine as eminently scriptural.

15. Because the Scriptures not only represent God as the universal Creator and Parent of all mankind, who created, not to curse and torment, but to bless and make them happy. (Isa. xliii: 6, 7; Mal. ii: 10; Acts xvii: 25–28; Wisdom of Solomon xi: 24–26,) but they also describe him as the only rightful Lord, owner and proprietor of all men: and if he be so, he can never suffer his property to be irrecoverably lost, and fall into the hands of an enemy. "Behold all souls are mine," saith God, "as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine." "For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things, to whom be glory forever." Ezek. xviii: 4. Rom. xi: 36. This last text is thus beautifully paraphrased by Dr. A. Clarke: "Of him, as the original Designer and Author; and by him, as the prime and efficient Cause; and to him, as the ultimate end for the manifestation of his eternal glory and goodness, are all things in universal nature, through the whole compass of time and eternity—to whom be glory. And let him have the praise of all his works from the hearts and mouths of all his intelligent creatures forever, throughout all the generations of men. Amen, so be it: let this be established forever." Com. in loco.

16. Because God, in the covenant of grace, hath given all mankind, and power, dominion and authority over them, into the hands of his Son for the express purpose of effecting their salvation.—"Thou art my Son: this day have I begotten thee. Ask of me and I shall give thee the heathen thine inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth thy possession." "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth." "The Father loveth the Son and hath given all things into his hand." "Thou hast given him power over all flesh that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him." Psa. ii: 7, 8; Matt. xxviii: 18; John iii: 35; and xvii: 2. Moreover the Faithful and True Witness declares, "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out."—"And I, if I be lifted up from the earth will draw all men unto me." If then, all mankind, without exception, are given to Christ for the express purpose that he should give them eternal life, and all shall so come to him as not to be cast out, shall any be doomed to endless misery? And shall not all be saved?

17. Because God wills the salvation of all men, and inspires the hearts of all good men to desire and pray for the same glorious end. "I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks be made for all men; for kings and all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour; who will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth." "Thy will be done." 1 Tim. ii: 1–4; Matt. vi: 10; xxvi: 39. Would the apostle exhort, or would God inspire mankind to pray for that which is in opposition to his will? or for that which he determined never to grant? or does man possess more benevolent feelings towards his fellow-beings than God does?

18. Because Jesus came to fulfil or accomplish the will of God. "I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day." "Then said I, Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me) to do thy will, O God." "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work." John iv: 34; vi: 38, 39; Heb. x: 7.

19. Because none can defeat the will of God—it shall certainly be accomplished. "He doeth according to his will in the army of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, or say unto him what doest thou?" "He worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." "I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do." Dan. iv: 35; Eph. i: 11; John xvii: 4.

20. Because God has no other will than that above expressed and clearly revealed; and he will never have a different will. "He is in one mind, and who can turn him? and what his soul desireth that he doeth." "He is without variableness or the shadow of turning." Job xxiii: James i: 17. Seeing therefore what God's will is, considering also its immutability, and the means employed for its accomplishment, why should we doubt the salvation of all men?

21. Because it is God's pleasure, as well as his will, that all should be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth. "For thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created." "As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live." "For the Lord taketh pleasure in his people; he will beautify the meek with salvation." Rev. iv: 11; Ezek. xxxiii: Ps. cxlix: 4.

22. Because God's pleasure shall be accomplished. "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." Christ came to accomplish the pleasure of the Most High, and the prophet declares, "the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand." "For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower and bread to the eater; so shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth; it shall not return unto me void; but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it." Isa. xlvi: 10; liii: 10, and lv: 10, 11.

23. Because God's fixed and unalterable purpose accords with his will and his pleasure; and that purpose shall certainly be accomplished.—"Having made known unto us the mystery of his will according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him." "The Lord of hosts hath sworn, saying, surely as I have thought, so shall it come to pass; and as I have PURPOSED, so shall it stand—for the Lord of hosts hath purposed, and who shall disannul it? and his hand is stretched out, and who shall turn it back?" "I have spoken it, I will also bring it to pass; I have purposed it, I will also do it—I bring near my righteousness; it shall not be far off, and my salvation shall not tarry; and I will place salvation in Zion for Israel my glory."—Eph. i: 9, 10; Isa. xiv: 24, 27. and xlvi: 11–13.

24. Because God "hath spoken of the restitution of all things by the mouth of all his his holy prophets since the world began." Acts iii: 21. Now God would never have foretold this event by the mouth of all his holy prophets if it were never to be accomplished. And it is certain that the fulfilment of the predictions can only be accomplished by the salvation of all men. The learned Dr. Adam Clarke, forgetting his creed when he comes to this text, writes thus on it: "As the grace of the Gospel was intended to destroy the reign of sin, its energetic influence is represented as restoring all things, destroying the bad state and restoring the good; taking the kingdom out of the hands of sin and satan, and putting it into those of righteousness and truth. This is done in every believing soul: all things are restored to their primitive order, and the peace of God, which passes all understanding, keeps the heart and mind in the knowledge and love of God. The man loves God with all his heart, soul, mind and strength, and his neighbor as himself; and when such a work becomes universal, as the Scriptures seem to intimate that it will, then all things will be restored in the fullest sense of the term." If all theologians could lose sight of their creeds when they read this and similar passages, it appears to me they would come to the same conclusion with this eminent Commentator.

Yours in all faithfulness, D. SKINNER.

THE UNSATISFYING NATURE OF ALL EARTHLY THINGS.

BY REV. S. GOFF.

Happiness is the object, end, and aim of every individual of the human family. We are all searching for it in some form or other, as for a "hid treasure." The mind of man is so constituted that it is forever looking onward, beyond its present sphere, for something higher, more noble, and more satisfying than aught it already possesses. And hence it is ever active, ever on the alert, seeking for something to add to its sum of present enjoyment, and to aid in satisfying its unbounded desires. But it is never satisfied, never full, but always seeking fresh supplies. In a word, it ever wants "something new." One source of enjoyment only prepares the way for another. One advance in wisdom and knowledge prompts us to further exertions and further researches. And one ray of hope darting its animating influence across our mental vision, impels us onward in the pursuit. And thus we may go on, adding joy to joy, pleasure to pleasure, and one degree of happiness to another, in endless progression, and yet never be satisfied. We shall still aspire after something higher, holier, more enduring. And we may search the lore of antiquity, and ravage all the monuments of art throughout the civilized world, for this something, but we shall not be able to find it there. There is still left an aching void. And all the pleasures, and all the enjoyments derived from the vain pageantry and the gaudy splendors of this fleeting and transitory existence, will ever be insufficient to satisfy the increasing desires of the immortal mind.

Hence, we find that, in all ages of the world, men of all ranks and conditions have sought for some object or being superior to themselves, in whom they could repose confidence, and trust for support in times of distress and danger. On these objects they have placed their affections, and grounded their hopes of felicity and joy. This is the prevailing, the universal inclination of the human mind. All, from the rude inhabitant of the western forest, to the enlightened American and the polished European, have had their objects of adoration and forms of religious worship. It is indeed true, that the ideas entertained of the power and dignity, as well as the objects of worship themselves, were very different. Thus, some have worshipped the sun, moon, and the hosts of the planetary world; some, rivers, trees, and mountains; others, beasts, birds, fishes, and insects; and others still, images of iron, wood, and stone.

But notwithstanding this diligent and ardent search for happiness, still the object was not attained—it was still beyond their grasp. The worship of objects like these, was far from producing a good and happy effect upon those who were the subjects of it. These imaginary deities were frequently supposed to be angry with their votaries, and to require the sacrifice of human victims—of even helpless and unoffending infants—to appease their wrath and conciliate their favor. And even to the present time, Paganism causes the widow to be burned alive on the funeral pile of her husband.

Now, can it be supposed that the worship of deities that required such sacrifices, or a religion that imposed such heavy burthens, was calculated to give peace, joy, consolation, and happiness? Will it give peace to the fond mother, to throw her loved offspring into the "sacred river," and see them swept away by its raging waters, to be devoured by the monsters of the deep? Will it impart joy to the affectionate wife, as she watches over the couch of her dying husband, to know assuredly that when "the pale king of terrors" has finished his work, she too must bid a final farewell to all the scenes of time, and in the full vigor of health, perhaps the bloom of youth, become a a prey to the kindling fagot? Will it give consolation and happiness to the friends and relatives of the aged pilgrim, to see him prostrate himself before the car of Juggernaut, and thus become a victim to the madness of heathen superstition? Oh, tell it not—it can not be! And we may search all the systems of Paganism throughout the heathen world, and shall find nothing that will satisfy us; nothing that will give solid comfort and substantial happiness.

Where, then, shall we go? Where shall we find that for which we hunger and thirst? Where shall we find that which will satisfy the ardent and longing desires of the mind? We must go to the Gospel—"the Gospel of peace"—"the Gospel of our salvation"—"the glorious Gospel of the blessed God!" There the soul may feast itself upon the rich provisions of immortal and unchanging love, and drink its fill of the pure waters of salvation, and thirst no more forever. There the mind may expatiate upon the perfections of "the Father of the spirits of all flesh," the Creator of all worlds, the Former of bodies, the Supporter of our lives, and the bountiful Benefactor of the whole intelligent creation. There we shall find a fulness for each, a fulness for all, and a fulness for evermore. In the Gospel we may have peace without alloy, and joy unmixed with sorrow. We have here no cruel sacrifices to offer; no immolating human beings to obtain the favor of wrathful deities; no funeral pile; no car of Juggernaut, and no raging Ganges with monsters waiting to devour our little ones. No—none of these. But all is peace, and life, and heavenly joy.

NOTICE.

I hereby inform the Universalist society at Lakeville, that their disappointment on the first Sunday inst., was occasioned by a notice being inserted that I would preach in Dunkirk that day. Br. Andrews of Wolcott, who had agreed to exchange with me on that day, having seen this notice while on his way to Lakeville, supposed I had changed my mind and instead of going to Wolcott had gone to Dunkirk. Therefore he returned to Wolcott, as any man, under such circumstances, would have done, that his congregation might not be disappointed in being without a preacher.

This notice is given that no blame may be charged to either myself or Br. Andrews. No one can more seriously regret the disappointment than myself. They may expect to be faithfully supplied the remaing two Sundays during my absence; the third Sunday inst., and the first in July. O. ROBERTS.

HOPE.

Who is there that loves a state of uncertainty and suspense? No one. All had rather know almost the worst coming event that can be imagined, than to be kept on the tenter hooks of suspense respecting it—tossed about of contending hopes and fears, and racked by every thorn of thought which the restless imagination can strike, at every turn, into the inmost recesses of the soul. What is hope? It is a desire and an expectation of the fulfilment of that desire. It is not simply a desire—for many of us desire things which we never expect to receive. The aged may desire to be young, but not expecting to become young again, they do not hope for it. A man with an incurable disease may desire to be well again—but not expecting ever to be cured, he does not hope for it. Dreading death, we may desire to live on in our present state forever—but not expecting to be exempt from the common lot of mortality, we do not hope for an endless earthly existence.

Hence hope is not simply a desire. Neither is it expectation alone—for a man may expect things to take place, which he does not hope, neither desire to come to pass. For instance—a man desiring to live on, may expect shortly to die—he surely does not therefore hope he will die. A dreadful calamity is impending over me—I expect it to come with destruction every moment—yet I do not hope for it, for I do not also desire its coming. An expected, an undesirable event is feared, not hoped for—but a desirable event expected, is not feared, it is hoped for.

Thus we see the nature of hope—it is the sunshine of the heart—composed of two ingredients, which separate are neither very happifying, it becomes, in their union, one of the happiest ingredients of human felicity. Desire without expectation, racks the soul with a most keen and sensible deprivation of happiness. Expectation without desire, whelms it in cold clouds of dread and terror. But unite the two, and, like colorless liquids in Chemistry, their union gives them radiance and beauty, and lights up the rainbow in the soul where but lately the clear rays of unexpecting desire, and the pellucid drops of undesirable expectation mingled in one storm of depressing doubt, anxiety, and terror. Such is hope—but such is not all pertaining to the Christian's hope. I have spoken but of the general nature of hope—of temporal hope inclusive.

But let us now lay aside the grovelling desires and expectations which cling, as by the power of gravitation, to earth and sensual things; and let us examine more particularly into the nature of that hope spoken of in the Gospel. The thing hoped for is what God promised to all the nations, families and kindreds of the earth, through Abraham and his seed. It is called the Gospel—for it is glad tidings, good news, and a joy-giving message. Thus Paul says, "And the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the Gospel unto Abraham, saying, in thee shall all nations be blessed." The same apostle also says, "For when God made promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no greater, he sware by himself, saying, surely, blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee. And so, after he had patiently endured, he obtained the promise. For men verily swear by the greater, and an oath for confirmation is to them an end of all strife. Wherein God, willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath: that by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before us."

The hope spoken of, then, is the hope that we being included in the all nations, families, and kindreds of the earth, will be blessed in Abraham and his seed. The heirs of this promise, it is evident, are all those embraced in the promise. By a belief in the truth of the promise, these become the children of Abraham by faith—the Israel of God—and enter into "the rest"—the Canaan of believing.—And in this manner Abraham becomes the father, not of one nation, or of the Jews, only—but of a multitude of nations. This hope of the great and common salvation—this expectation and desire of universal blessedness in Jesus, the seed of Abraham—is, then, the hope, "which is as an anchor of the soul." It is often, very often spoken of and alluded to in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament. The apostles of our Lord, in particular, dwelt upon it with affectionate earnestness, whenever they preached to the Jews, who were the lineal descendants of the great Patriarch. In the recorded Acts of the Apostles we find Peter declaring to them, "Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed. Unto you first, God, having raised up his son Jesus, sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities."

Our Calvinistic brethren who consistently contend that God's will and purpose will be done—that Jesus will do all he came to do, and all that God sent him to do—attempt to evade the universality of God's promises and Christ's mission, by saying that all families, all kindreds, and all nations of the earth, only mean some out of all families, nations and kindreds.—But the Bible does not so explain it. The Jewish was one of these nations—in it was found some of these families and kindreds. Now, does Peter say that Jesus came to save some of their nation—some out of their families—some out of each of their kindreds? No; far from such limitation. Hear him. "God, having raised up his son Jesus, sent him to bless you, in turning away EVERY ONE OF YOU from his iniquities." Not some—not a few, or a part—but "every one of you from his iniquities." Can you frame a more positively universal declaration than this? Well—and will God save all the wicked, hard-hearted and stiff-necked Jews, and then deny his impartiality by dealing less kindly with any of the other nations embraced in his covenant—his oath-confirmed promise?

Our Arminian brethren who suppose, very justly, that all of all nations, families and kindreds of the earth are included in God's purposes and promises of salvation, and in Christ's mission, strive to evade the necessary inference of universal salvation by placing the veracity of God in the keeping of frail and fallible man.—God will only save man on certain conditions, which man alone must perform, or be lost forever. Man can not be saved in his sins—yet all men will not, of themselves, turn from sin—therefore all men will not be saved. Now look again at the last quoted passage. Does Peter name any conditions as having been laid down by our God when he promised on oath to Abraham? Does he mention any salvation in sin? Or does he intimate that if people will not turn from sin of themselves, they will never be turned from it and saved? No—far from it. He says, "Unto you first, God, having raised up his son Jesus, sent him to bless you, by turning away every one of you from his iniquities." Not to bless them in their iniquities. Surely there is nothing doubtful, or uncertain, or any probability of failure in what God hath sworn he will do, and according to that oath hath sent Jesus to do. And why should we doubt the end when we have seen the beginning. Jesus has come—to the Gentiles the Gospel has been preached, and many have already become the children of faithful Abraham, and we are certified that when the fulness (not a part only, but the fulness) of the Gentiles be come in, then shall all Israel (not a part, but all Israel) be saved.

Abraham believed before he obtained the beginning of the fulfilment of the promise—and shall we doubt after—long after God has begun to fulfil that part relating to us? And if we do doubt, can our faith be counted to us for righteousness—will it justify us, or make us just, as the word justify denotes? Believe it not. A doubting faith is not a purifying one. He that feareth can not be made perfect in love. And the word can not profit those in whom it is not mixed with faith. Such a faith is a fearful one, but not a hopeful one. Such believers can not have "strong consolation."

Oh how different is the "refuge"—"the hope" of the apostles of Jesus—"Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul both sure and steadfast." Our life being hid in Christ with God—depending on the predeterminate counsel and purpose of the immutable Eternal, and not on the changing and fleeting will of man—and the Gospel of our salvation being true, independent of our belief or unbelief, we securely rest upon it, and remain steadfast in its hopes. Such was the faith of the early Christians. They neither created it by their belief, nor destroyed its truth by their unbelief. Its truth was in the counsel of Jehovah, and he had declared it immutable, and promised its fulfilment, long, long before they came into being, or ere he called on them to believe in it. Thus the apostle Paul, writing to the Ephesians, says, "According as God hath chosen us in Christ before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love: Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children, by Jesus Christ, to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will, to the praise of the glory of his favor, wherein he hath made us accepted in the beloved: in whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace." "In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the Gospel of your salvation: in whom, also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that holy spirit of promise which is the earnest (or surety) of our inheritence, until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory." Here five things are evident. 1. God had determined that all things, both which are in heaven and on earth, should be gathered together in one, in Christ—determined it, I say, before the foundation of the world. 2. That the early Christians, who first trusted in Christ, should, as a part of the all things, be thus gathered as the first fruits—as the beginning of the fulfilment of this good pleasure and purpose of God. 3. That to the Ephesians, while unbelievers, this word of truth was preached—it was truth to them before they believed, though they trusted not in this glad news of their salvation, until after they had heard it preached as truth.—4. That after the Ephesians believed this word of truth—this glad tidings of their salvation—as a part of the whole human family which God purposed to save in like manner, they were sealed—confirmed—rendered sure with that only spirit of promise which is a surety of the fulfilment of that in which they believed. And 5. That this holy spirit of promise—this hope which is "as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast"—is a prelibation—an earnest—a surety that we shall enter on that inheritance embraced in it, when the purchased possession is redeemed for us. Just, for instance, as the sensation of hunger, the longing for food, is an earnest that there is such a thing as food, or why should we long for it? or how could we desire it. Or, in like manner as the money given to close a bargain is a surety that the bargain made will be fulfilled. With this difference, however, that in the bargain the earnest is given by man, who being fallible, may have erred—or frail, may pass away—or changeable, may alter his mind—or weak, may be unable to do what he promises. But in the Covenant which God has made with the world, through the medium of his Son, the earnest given us comes from one who is all wise, and can not err—ever living, and can not pass away—immutable, and can never change in his purposes—and omnipotent to execute his promise. Well, then, hath the apostle declared that "God, willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise," (and all the kindreds of the earth are the heirs of that promise,) "the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath; that by two immutable things," (his promise and his oath,) "in which it was impossible for God to deceive, we might have a strong consolation who have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before us; which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the vail; whither the forerunner is for us entered," even Jesus, "made an high priest forever after the order of Melchisedic," and "after the power of an indissoluble life." RETURN FROM THE SOUTH.

After an absence of between seven and eight months, we again find ourselves, together with our family, within our own quiet domicil in Utica, and by the blessing of Divine Providence, in the enjoyment of general health. The same benignant Parent of all, who is over all and with all, who watches over all for good, in their out-goings and in-comings, their up-risings and down-sittings, in their travels by land and by water, their sojourn at a distance or their abiding at home, has been with us and the many friends we left behind. The same eye has looked upon, the same potent arm has protected, and the same munificent hand has supplied the wants of all; and to him be all the praise.

We find that several of our friends and acquaintances have been called, during our absence, to pay the debt of nature, and bid adieu to earth with all its joys and all its sorrows. The loss of the living we mourn, and sincerely sympathise with them in their bereavements, but trust that what is their loss is the unspeakable gain of the departed, and that though they mourn the loss of kindred on earth, they rejoice in the assurance that their friends have gained immortal bliss in heaven

We had two principal motives for our sojourn at the South, during the Winter: the one was, to supply with the preaching of the word of life, the First Independent Christian Church in Richmond, Va., which had long been destitute and in somewhat of a languishing condition, for the want of a pastor. The citizens of Richmond, generally, appeared to have learned comparatively little of our distinguishing sentiments, though we found a few very warm-hearted and devoted friends, who cordially took us by the hand, and co-operated with us in efforts to diffuse more generally our glorious views of the Divine character and government, and the ultimate destiny of our race. Though Superstition frowned upon, and Bigotry denounced us and the doctrine of a world's salvation, yet our meetings were usually well attended, by a very respectable class of citizens, and continued to increase steadily as long as we stayed. And we sincerely hope they will continue to increase under the labors of our young and highly esteemed Br. Chapin, who succeeds us for a season in that place. Richmond, as the capital of the State and the largest city in the Old Dominion, is an important place, and should not be neglected—the truth should there especially be preached faithfully, fully, and constantly: and if so preached, we doubt not its fruits will be an hundred fold. We shall always remember with gratitude and affection the many expressions of kindness and true Christian benevolence, we received from our friends in Virginia, and pray for the richest of Heaven's mercies to rest on them continually.

Another object in spending the Winter at the South, was to avoid the extreme severity of climate which the inhabitants of this Northern region have for several years past experienced. By a location in a milder region, we hoped to recover from a severe affection and chronic soreness of the throat, or passages leading to the lungs, usually denominated by physicians, bronchetis. We were not as successful in obtaining the last object as we had hoped to be; for although our general health has been, for the most of the time, very good, and we were able to preach regularly every Sabbath, (though some of the time only one sermon per Sabbath,) the difficulty is not removed, nor are we certain that it is in the least mitigated. Had we listened to medical advisers, we should have suspended our public labors in the ministry a year ago. But dearly as we loved the ministry, and the cause of a world's emancipation from darkness and error, we could not consent to cease from speaking in public in the name of the holy child Jesus, till fully convinced that this was indispensably necessary to restore health and preserve life. We now feel that conviction, and believing that although public speaking might not of itself produce the difficulty complained of, it nevertheless prevents recovery from it, when it does exist. Accordingly, we have made up our mind, however reluctantly, to cease from public speaking altogether, from this time, for a few months to come, in hopes thereby to recover so as to resume that delightful duty again, and prosecute it more effectually than we have been able to for the last fifteen months. The ministry of reconciliation, is the profession of our choice, and in it we have labored unremittingly for about sixteen years, with how much success it becomes not us to say, but with what sincerity our Father in heaven knows. If we have been instrumental, in the hand of God, in doing any good, however little it may be, to him be all the thanks, and to him all the praise.

We expect to make Utica our residence during the present Summer at least, and the readers of this paper will probably see occasionally in its columns, some traces of our feeble pen. It is probable, also, that during the Summer we may visit several different parts of this, if not of other States, for the double purpose of the healthful exercise of travelling, and to attend to some yet unsettled business connected with the former publication of this paper. In conclusion, we congratulate and again greet with friendship and good will our brethren, friends and readers in this part of our Master's vineyard.

We very much regretted to learn, on our return from the South, that Br. T. P. Abell, who was expected to accompany Br. Chapin to Virginia, had abandoned the idea of going, and entered into engagements with the society at Rochester, N. Y. We regret his not going to Virginia, first, because his labors are much needed and would, no doubt, be eminently useful there. Indeed, the labors of three or four or more preachers, are much needed in different parts of the State, and we have no doubt would be, if the right men were there, eminently useful, and liberally encouraged in planting and upholding the standard of truth, where hitherto it has been little known, for want of preachers to tell the good news of salvation to the people. 2d. We regret that he did not go on another account—the people of Virginia had been given to understand he would come among them, and were therefore anxiously expecting him, particularly our good friends in Gloucester, in Tappahannoc, and in the vicinity of Richmond. We still hope some one or more of our good ministers of reconciliation will be induced to go to Virginia, and deal the bread of life to the hungry souls there that are longing to receive it.

POETRY.

From the Knickerbocker.

THE SOUL'S TRUST.

"Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God; for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God.—Psalms.

Though trouble assail me, and dangers surround,
Though thorns in my pathway may ever be found,
Still let me not fear, for thou ever wilt be
My God and my guide, while I lean upon thee.

The sweet buds of promise may fade ere they bloom,
The hopes which are earth-born, lie low in the tomb;
And though my life's pathway seem weary to me,
I shall gather new strength, as I lean upon thee.

Though bound to the world by the heart's dearest ties,
Though earth's fairest scenes are outspread to my eyes,
Oh never, my Father! permit me to be Found trusting to reeds—let me lean upon thee.

And in that dread hour, when my aw'd soul may stay,
No longer on earth, but is summoned away—
Amid those great scenes which no mortal may see,
Let me know nought of fear, as I lean upon thee!

TRUE AND FALSE KINDNESS.

"Sister Catharine," said Alice W., as she entered her sister's chamber, "I remember you said the other day, you should not wear your stout calf-skin shoes again. Will you let me give them to a poor little girl at the door. She looks thin and pale, and must be cold this morning without shoes." "Do not speak to me now, Alice, I do not know where the shoes are and can not look for them." "Can you not find the shoes now and read the book another time," said Alice, as she stood beside her sister's chair;—but as she looked up in her face, she saw her thoughts and feelings were far from the child of want, and that it would be in vain to say more to her. "I don't love to tell her so," thought Alice, as she closed the door, "yet what can I do?"—At this moment she thought of a little treasure she had been collecting. A pile of bright shining silver pieces, amounting in all to a dollar and a half. Her resolution was soon formed, and tying on her bonnet, she took the little girl by the hand, and led her to a shoe store at the corner of the street, and selecting a strong well made pair, she placed them in the hands of the little girl. A smile lit the pale countenance of the child, and her heartfelt, "thank you Miss W." resounded again and again in Alice's ears as she retraced her steps to her home.

The "beautiful tale" was finished before Catharine rose from her chair, and she then seated herself at her writing table and placed a fair gilt-edged sheet before her. Upon this she wrote, in a fine graceful hand, a few lines, enclosing within the paper a costly ring, and directed it to a wealthy young friend, whose acquaintance she was desirous of cultivating.

The afflicted mother of the little girl was yet engaged in her daily toils, although the sun had almost set, as her child entered the room. "O mother, mother!" she exclaimed, "see what Miss W. has given me; now I shall not be sick so often, and can go out when it rains. Are they not beautiful shoes?" A tear fell upon the cheek of the mother as she saw the gift; raising her eyes, as she thanked her heavenly Father, and prayed for blessings to descend on her who had been so kind to them. The next morning as Alice, from her window saw the little girl pass proud and happy, she felt a deep thrill of joy in her heart.

Catharine's gift was received by her young friend from the hands of a servant. She read the note with cold indifference and then looked for a moment upon the ring, "It is rather a pretty one," said she, and placing it upon an already profusely jeweled finger, the giver and the gift were alike forgotten.—*Reg. DISSIPATION.

The clock struck eleven. The anxious, terrified, lonely mother shuddered at the sound, and with an unconscious energy pressed her poor little babe to her heart, while the large tears, not without cause, fell, unbidden from her swollen sunken eye, and rested on the cheek of the slumbering innocent. Where then was he who had sworn to protect them, and by a vow registered in heaven, had promised unalterable affection for her. He was an instance I could wish without a parallel; for dissipation had bound him in her chains, and in the thraldom of vice he could forget that he had a bosom companion sighing in his absence for his return, and in his presence overpowered by the conflicting emotions occasioned by the recollection of former times, when he was virtue's friend, and she the darling partner of his happiness.

The unfortunate man returned something inebriated at a late hour, and found her senseless on the floor.—The shock restored him to himself, though some half lost, half recollected images flitted through his bewildered imagination. She was declared to be in a raging fever; medical assistance was in vain, for the disease was one which baffles all skill, and in the short space of a fortnight, she died broken-hearted. No murmur escaped her lips against the author of her misery, the destroyer of her happiness, the cause of her untimely death.—Then it was that he fully awoke from his dream; then it was that every unkind word, every ungrateful look, thronged back upon him, and harrowed up his soul;—then it was that he uttered the unheard groan, and poured the bitter tear; more deep, more bitter because unheard and unavailing.

Is there any one now who is just beginning the career of vice and folly, unaware of the misery he is bringing upon himself, and all connected with him, let him read this and pause; for it is only on the immutable basis of virtue that we can found our actions, if we wish them to be pleasing in the sight of our fellow-men, and acceptable to our Creator.

VALUE OF TIME.

It is said that a man who had accustomed himself to seize a pen whenever his wife was putting on her shawl and bonnet to walk, found, before he expected such a result, that he had written a tolerable book. Wonders may thus be accomplished by all in their stray moments, would they but improve them. I would not prevent people from reflecting, from resting, or enjoying themselves; but the worst of it is, many waste large portions of their lives without doing any of these.

Circumstances favor persons thus bent on rational employment. Instead of idling away a half hour before dinner, or some appointment, if they take up a book or pen, or undertake to do any little duty which demands their attention, they find often the time they might have frittered away, much longer than they anticipated. Many a friend might be secured or obliged by a letter written at these intervals, by those who profess to have "no time." We all have "time," more or less, which might be devoted to the performance of neglected duties.

INVENTIONS.

"There are many devices in a man's heart."—Prov. xix: 21.

How surprisingly true is the language, "there are many devices in a man's heart." How true it is that God hath made men upright, but "they have sought out many inventions."

The minds of men are so constructed, they are ever on the wing in search of something new. They soar in flights through unknown, and almost unimagined regions of thought, in search of novelty. Device succeeds device, and invention succeeds invention, almost in endless succession. Years of labor and toil are spent, with all the patience mortals can possess, or draw from the imaginative mind, and womb of unknown matter, something that shall astonish still more, the already astonished world. At one time the lightnings by man's invention are overcome, and you see the thunders of heaven at his control. At his will they may speak out in pealing accents, "long and loud," telling of the wonders of creation and of its Creator! It may tear up the mountain oaks, and scatter far and wide its torn fragments—and even seek to rend the mountains base. * * * * *—Universalist Watchman.

MARRIAGES.

DEATHS.

In Butternuts, May 6th, Mr. Jonathan Star, aged 75 years. Br. Star was sustained in sickness and in death by his faith in a world's salvation. Sermon on the 8th, by L. Hyatt.

In Nassau, May 14th, Mr. George W. Daboll, aged 45 years. A beloved husband and father and a valuable member of society—an honest man and a Christian. He retained his standing in the Baptist church but his faith extended beyond his creed, and when unable to speek, he still testified by unequivocal signs that he believed in Universalism. Since his death a contrary report has been circulated—may God bring the propagator to repentance, and make him a friend to the truth. W. Wilcox.

In Pottsdam, April 27th, Mrs. Electa Blood, consort of Mr. Amos Blood, aged 26 years. She was a firm believer in the impartial grace of God, and an estimable example of the social and domestic virtues. Sermon from Psa. xlvi: first clause of 10th verse, by the writer. F. J. Briggs.

In Potsdam, May 18th, Mr. Benjamin Bailey, Jr., aged 44 years, lacking six days. He endured a painful and distressing illness for nearly seven years with almost unparalleled fortitude and patience The funeral was attended on the 20th, when the writer agreeably to request, tendered the consolations of the Gospel to a numerous circle of mourning friends, from Isa. xl: 8. F. J. Briggs.

In Sennet, April 4th, of consumption, Miss Mary L. Green, aged 14 years.

In Clarkesville, April 13th, of inflammation in the head, the son of Mr. Ross, aged 5 years.

In Aurelius, April 29th, Mr. Samuel Goold, aged 67 years. To the relatives of these deceased persons, may the consolations of the truth be given and the blessed words of Christ enjoyed in all their comforts. G. W. M.

In Westmoreland, on the 27th of April last, Mr. Salmon Cushman, aged 48 years. He was an affectionate husband and father, a kind neighbor, and a good citizen—and has left an extensive circle of relatives and friends to lament his death. M. M. J.

In Warsaw, March 20th, Br. Paul Raymond, aged 33 years. During his sickness, which was lingering and painful, he manifested patience and fortitude becoming a Christian. Though he had been a believer in the final restitution but a short time, yet his faith was firm and unshaken. During the many interviews he had with his friends, (both Universalists and Limitarians,) he testified his unwavering confidence in the ultimate purity and happiness of all mankind; and only regretted that he could not talk to them more of the great salvation. But notwithstanding this, reports were in circulation during his sickness, that he had renounced his faith. They were wholly unfounded; and by his request, were corrected at his funeral. Br. R. was a truly good man, a kind husband and father, and a worthy citizen.

His funeral was attended on the 22d, and the consolations of truth tendered to the mourning relatives and sympathising friends, by the writer. W. E. M.

CONVENTIONAL SERMON,

Delivered before the New-York State Convention of Universalists, at its session for 1838, in Oxford, Chenango county.

BY REV. G. W. MONTGOMERY, OF AUBURN.

When the Jews assembled for the worship of Jehovah, the blood of sacrifice flowed from the streaming altar; and when, turning away from the God of their fathers, they stood before Moloch, in the valley of the Son of Hinnom, their sons and their daughters were compelled to pass through the fire. When the pagans of ancient days met in their temples for praise, it was offered in the discharge of obscene ceremonies and the voice of the most degrading superstition. When the vast car of the monstrous Juggernaut is drawn abroad in the midst of its multitudinous worshippers, its track is crimsoned with the blood of its victims, whose bones whiten on the plains of error. And when the vows of an heathen heart are discharged, perchance some widow burns upon the funeral pile of her departed husband, some child is smothered in the grave or cast into the Ganges, or some aged parent is left to die from want.

But at our hands, no such rites are required. No victim smokes on our altar, no child is made to burn or drown by our worship, no intelligent being is crushed by our God, nor is the widow made to perish as a pleasing sacrifice to Deity. Praising that sublime Father of all mind, whose name and whose nature is love, whose smiles of beneficence are thrown over all creation; believing in that Saviour, whose life was the most spotless integrity, and whose blood flowed for the redemption of man; all that is demanded of us, is, to offer unto God the devotion of a pure mind and a virtuous life.—For in his sight, one deed of charity, one resistance of temptation, one act of integrity, one trait of virtue, though manifested by the humblest person on earth, is far more precious than all sacrifices and ceremonies.

In addition to this worship of a pure mind and a virtuous life, God calls upon us to show our gratitude for the plenitude of grace which has ever been showered upon us, by using our efforts for the advancement of truth. That truth which was sealed as the voice of heaven by the Saviour's blood, and consecrated by him, in all the persecutions he bore for the salvation of a lost world.—That truth, which, if adorned by us as it ought to be, would many times re-enact the Pentecostal scene, by the conversion of multitudes from the fear of error and the chains of sin to the freedom of truth and the majesty of virtue. This gratitude, we, nominally at least, profess to exhibit. For, living in a land shadowed by the broad wings of liberty, whose irrepressible energies are tearing off every chain from intellect—surrounded by the benefits which have arisen from the reformation, whose waters are still bearing the world onward to untried glories in religion and philosophy—we have met in annual convocation, for the express purpose of consulting the interests of Zion, and of devising means for its more rapid advancement. For the furtherance of this object, your speaker, though he sees around him many persons at whose feet he should sit for instruction, instead of attempting to instruct them, deems it his duty to boldly and fearlessly discuss a point, which, if properly acted upon by us, will give an impetus to the cause of truth, perfectly irresistible. That point is, what is religion? and is founded on the following text.

> But he that received seed into the good ground, is he that heareth the word, and understandeth it; which also beareth fruit, and bringeth forth, some an hundred fold, some sixty, and some thirty. Matt xiii: 23.

This question has deeply agitated the Christian world. It has been answered in various manners, and has been so identified with absurdities, so mingled with dogmas, and so mystified in the speculations of the schools, as to be robbed of its beauty and crippled in its energies. Sometimes it has been virtually made to consist in the observance of forms—sometimes, in the belief of certain creeds—sometimes, in following a particular sect—sometimes, in mere excitement—and sometimes, in a strict adherence to ceremonies, and a determinate zeal in defence of a favorite faith.—While the fact is on all hands much neglected, that a virtuous life is a very important part in the composition of religion; a fact, however, of which many scarcely ever dream, or if they do dream of it, they cast it aside as a troublesome item.—Though, on examination, it must be very evident that there can no more be true religion without virtue, than there can be thought without mind.

An opinion has obtained in community, that religion can be procured in a few days of excitement, and that mind can at once assume the plenteous energies and the glorious influences of piety. An individual who may have lived in comparative looseness of life, suddenly becomes excited, and in a few days, with scarcely any perusal of the Bible, joins the church, and is supposed to wear the Christian character. Now, a miracle of heaven might instantaneously change an individual from a life of vice to one of virtue; but, as no miracles are at present wrought, it is not possible that religion can be obtained in a few days, unless it can be shown that the murderer, the thief, and the frozen miser can immediately jump from their wicked conduct into the purity of virtue. The soul that has been steeped in vice, can become religious only by repeated exertions, by a constant watch over the passions, and by a steady perseverance in the paths of holy action.

In most of the considerations in relation to this subject, religion has been separated from virtue, and a broad distinction made between good works and piety; as though Christianity had any other object on earth, than, through faith in the mind, to inspire goodness in the actions. How often in times past it has been affirmed, that the merely moral man is in more danger of destruction than the wretch who crawls in the gutters of vice.—Hence it is in the parlance of this world, that a person may be fished up from the waters of profanity and impure action, may become excited, shed some tears, and join a church, and then be viewed as a religious person and an heir of salvation. While he whose benevolence is warm, whose integrity is unimpeachable, and whose conduct is irreproachable, not having experienced a mysterious nondescript feeling in his heart, is said to be without religion, and consequently a victim of destruction. And how true it is, that all believers in the restitution, howsoever excellent their lives, are represented as devoid of religion entirely, and must be lost—while that person, whose hand is red with the blood of a fellow-being, if he affirms that he is sorry and says that he repents of his deeds, is supposed to be saved. So that the wicked individual is transformed into a religious man, with prospect of heaven, while the virtuous man is made to be irreligious with the doom of gehenna. But thus to dissever religion and virtue, is like dissevering life from the body, or expecting the sun to be useful in nature without the light and heat which flow from it.

People are too prone to substitute profession for religion—to serve God in the exhibition of ceremonies rather than in a pure and humble life.—It is this which has reared the altar streaming with the blood of sacrifice, built the gloom of the monastery, and established a religion of form, without soul or vigor. And it is this which has marred true religion, cramped its energies, impaired its strength, and bound up all its blessed influences with the chains of superstitious error. Instead of going abroad among mankind as a universal, all-pervading principle, which entwines itself around every good principle of human nature, it has been limited to this sect or that sect, as though religion was designed for the few and not for the many. Under such circumstances, religion is like a child so enfolded with bandages, that the modellings of nature are lost and tortured into deformity—it is despoiled of its beauty by error, and the free and the fresh influences with which Deity endowed it, are repressed by the spirit of sectarism.

In reference to religion, however, there are certain facts which serve to show from what hearts it is absent. An individual may believe, but this belief does not alone make him religious, for the truth can be held in unrighteousness. A Judas believed, though a traitor to the cause of his Master. Nor will excitement constitute religion; for an individual may become excited for the time being, and then commit foul crime. If excitement constituted religion, then the pagan who flings himself beneath the wheels of Juggernaut, has the advantage of us. Nor will form constitute religion; for the most splendid forms and ceremonies were practiced during the dark ages, when the gloom of ignorance hung over the world, blighting its hopes and fettering mind with the chains of superstition. Nor will zeal constitute religion; for no person can be more zealous than was Saul of Tarsus, while persecuting the followers of Christ, or were our pilgrim fathers while whipping Baptists and hanging Quakers. These things alone, separate from religion, in the presence of God, are but an idle tale, and are far from receiving the commendation, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

What then is religion? In answering this question there is one consideration to be carefully observed. When Christianity is spoken of, it is frequently called religion. This, in my judgment, is incorrect. Religion is one part of Christianity, but not all of it. Christianity is made up of doctrine and religion; and these two together compose the Gospel of Christ. The doctrine or principles of Christ form a cause; religion or practice is the effect of that cause. For illustration: the sun is a cause, and it produces light and heat, but the sun is not the light or heat, nor is the light and heat the sun—yet they are inseparably connected; one is the inevitable result of the existence of the other. There may be, it is true, stars which afford a feeble light, but still, the sun is the grand reservoir of light and heat, whose volumes are continually pouring out to send the smiles of the love of God from the rivers to the ends of the earth. So, Christianity is the sun of truth in the moral world, and the result of its doctrine is religion. There are feeble moral stars among the heathen; but Christianity is the only great source, the inexhaustible fountain of truth and righteousness.—In answering the question, then, what is religion? you will readily perceive that my duty is not altogether to dwell on the doctrinal principles of the Gospel, but the rather to find out what is the effect of those doctrinal principles. The views advanced concerning cause and effect, are sustained by the text. "But he that receiveth the seed into good ground, is he that heareth the word and understandeth it; which also beareth fruit, and bringeth forth, some an hundred fold, some sixty, and some thirty." Seed is put into the earth—and as it germinates and grows, fruit is the effect. Now Christ compares his word to a seed, and the effect of that word to the fruit which the seed produces. The word then, I call the doctrine or the cause; the fruit I call religion, or the effect—and both combined, form Christianity.

What is the word? It is the teaching of Christ; and is perfectly simple and easy to be understood by unbigoted minds. When Paul was inquired of by the jailor, what he should do to be saved, he was answered, "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ." When Philip was conversing with the eunuch, he considered his declaration sufficient, so far as belief was concerned; "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God." Acts viii: 37. In this point all sects agree. They also agree in another which flows from it—the resurrection of Christ. They also agree in still another—that every person will be punished according to their deeds. True, many believe that heaven is the reward for obedience, and hell the punishment for disobedience. But for myself, while I am taught that God "recompenses the righteous in the earth," that some will receive many stripes and others few stripes, I am also taught that immortal felicity is the gift of God. "For, by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast." Eph. ii: 8, 9. The principles then, which form the word, are; 1. that Jesus is the Son of God; 2. that there is a resurrection from the dead; 3. that "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself;" 4. that virtue will be rewarded and vice punished.

We must now meet an objection which flows from this view of the subject. All sects can not be right; some must be wrong or in error. Now, as religion is the result of truth, does it not follow that those sects who are in error, and devoid of religion; and hence, are we not driven to the illiberal course of affirming that some sects have no religionists among them? Certainly not. That there are virtuous people in all sects is very evident—it would be worse than bigotry to deny it. How shall we meet this fact? Can not a blind man enjoy the heat of the sun? Can not an individual be blessed by the light and heat of the sun, even though in an error concerning their origin and the mode of their production? Now, the moral precepts of the Gospel are clear to all; and an individual may be influenced by them, even though he may not understand the principles from which they flow—he may be good, even though he may not have that "perfect love which casteth out all fear." In fact, that the spirit of Christ can penetrate even a heart invested with error, and there manifest its heaven-born powers, is one of the noblest seals that the Gospel of Christ claims divinity for its origin, and that the broad benevolence of the Deity is in it. For it is an inveterate foe to that narrow feeling, which can discover no truth or find any good people but in one sect, exclusive of all others.

It will be remembered, that the good seed of truth, when received by an individual, produces fruit; greater or less in amount, according to the talents of the individual. What kind of fruit?—It is not the fruit of persecution—there is no religion in persecution. When our Saviour was journeying to Jerusalem, and a Samaritan village refused to receive him for the night, and his disciples, in their indignation, wished him to call down fire from heaven to burn up that village, what was his answer? Did he encourage them to attempt advancing the glory of God at the point of the bayonet and the mouth of the cannon?—No! "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are." Religion encourages no reviling sectarism. Nor is it the fruit which embraces a creed, condemns all other opinions unheard, and refuses to examine a principle before it is stigmatized as licentious in its tendency. This fruit is pointedly condemned in the Scriptures. When Christ said to the Jews, "and why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right"—when Paul said to the Thessalonians, "prove all things; hold fast that which is good"—they branded with infamy the practice of denouncing other persons as heretics without looking into the proof of their opinions. Nor is it the fruit of vice. In all the Scriptures, and by all its writers, vice of every description is most pungently rebuked. In the glorious sermon on the mount; on other occasions; in all the teachings of the apostles; the sinner is told of the consequences which he must inevitably experience; of the pain he must endure; of the thorns which beset his path, and of the distress which must follow him so long as he continues in transgression. And besides this, the Redeemer most clearly illustrates the fact, that a person can not be his follower who dwells in sin. How powerfully he rebuked the Pharisees for their hypocricy—and how often he told the disciples that they must love one another—and how frequently he dwelt upon the necessity of virtue and benevolence. Though the world may not consider the fact; though there are those whose claims to follow Christ, are mere profession and a hypocritical show; yet there is no truth made more clear in the New Testament, than that there is no such thing as true fellowship with Christianity without a pure life and a determination to avoid iniquity.

The question then, still recurs to us, what is the fruit which truth produces? An important question, because when solved, we shall at once behold what religion is. On this point a number of very clear and definite passages will be adduced, which can not be mistaken; to be closed by the quotation of a passage, which can not be mystified by the most daring sophisms, or rendered intricate by creeds. After the repeated instructions which Solomon had received; after all his trying experience; in his most sober conviction, he said, "let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter; fear God, and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man." Eccl. xii: 13. To which the language of the prophet is a most beautiful addition; "He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" Micah vi: 8. God imposes no onerous requirements upon his children.—The sum and substance of all his laws; the very essence of what he commands us, is, that we stand firm in the energies of virtue; "fear God, and keep his commandments."

If we visit the great teacher himself, and hear his hallowed words, we shall be convinced that Christ marks a good life as one of the noblest ornaments of his glory. "Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets." Matt. vi: 12. Trace out this language in all its ramifications and bearings upon human life, and no person can avoid the conclusion, that if it is made the star of our actions, it will guide us to the practice of integrity, and make us holy in all the pathways of duty. On a certain occasion a Jewish scribe inquired of the Saviour, "Master what shall I do to inherit eternal life?"—or in other words, what course shall I pursue, in order to secure the enjoyment of the Messiah's kingdom. "He said unto him, what is written in the law? How readest thou? And he answering said, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself. And he said unto him, Thou hast answered right: this do, and thou shalt live." Luke x: 26, 27, 28. The scribe queried concerning who was his neighbor. In order to make this point clear, our Saviour referred to an incident which occurred on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho. A Jew was there robbed and left half dead. A priest and a Levite passing that way, with a glared eye and a hard heart, which can give only in a crowd for acclamation and pomp, left him without notice. But a Samaritan, between whom and the Jews there was no dealing, when he saw the forlorn stranger, cast off the enmity of his people and his fear of robbery, bound up the wounds of his foe, took him to an inn and provided for his maintenance. These facts most vividly exhibited the truth to the scribe, that in order to love his neighbor he must do good even to his foe.

These two commandments of loving God and our neighbors in their several bearings upon various points, are luminously spoken of by the apostle Paul. "Then Saul, (who also is called Paul,) filled with the Holy Ghost, set his eyes on him and said, O full of all subtilty, and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness! wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord?" Rom. xiii: 9, 10. And to show how important he deemed this divine love, he said, "now abideth faith, hope, charity (or love;) but the greatest of these is charity." 1 Cor. xiii: 13; or love towards God and men. Faith in the doctrine of Christ is noble—it consoles us in the seasons of adversity, and robs death of its sting. Hope is beautiful—it lifts us over the stormy billows of despair, and enables us to anticipate that home beyond the waters of dissolution, where order and harmony shall prevail in the whole human family. But greater than hope or faith, is charity, love divine. It is the soul of the Christian system—it is the energy of its moral influence—the very atmosphere of the Gospel kingdom, the breathing of which sends health into the mind and affections. It is this which disposes man to all good, robs him of his sins, fills him with Samaritan spirit, and teaches him to love God supremely and man universally. And how we shall love God the poet has beautifully shown.

> Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase!)
> Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
> And saw, within the moonlight in his room,
> Making it rich, and like a lilly in bloom,
> An angel, writing in a book of gold;
> Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
> And to the presence in the room he said,
> "What writest thou?" The vision rais'd its head,
> And, with a look made of all sweet accord,
> Answer'd, "the names of those who love the Lord."
> "And is mine one?" said Abou. "Nay, not so,"
> Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
> But cheerly still, and said, "I pray thee, then,
> Write me as one that loves his fellow-men."
> The angel wrote and vanish'd. The next night
> It came again, with a great wakening light
> And show'd the names whom love of God had bless'
> And, lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

To these passages one will be added, which though very distinct in its communication, has quietly slumbered in the corner of an apostolic letter, for all that multitudes have regarded it.—"If any man among you seem to be religious and bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain. Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." With what sophism can this language be met?—Religion is benevolence and virtue—it is the religion which the truth of Christ breathes into the soul, and warms in all the actions. And why is it that the Christian world has so long searched among creeds, mysticisms and ceremonies for religion, when it is here so plainly set forth in its noble simplicity and its adaptation to the world? Why have they so long contended to decide the question, What is religion? when it is thus settled by an inspired apostle? Opportunities for applying this religion have not ceased—man is not so perfect that he needs it not. How broad and ample is the field for its application—how varied the scenes in which the holiness of its powers can be tested. When man is so sinful as he is, so much the slave to his passions, so oftentimes the foe of his fellows, so frequently the despiser of moral right, he can not do without this religion. It is the broad shield which secures community from destruction—the fountain of pure and living waters, which re-invigorates the moral faculties and strengthens man with virtue. And if men would let alone their quarelling in regard to difference of opinion—if they would put away their prejudices on the shelf of oblivion—if they would throw away their creed-books, and depend more on the Bible—if they would earnestly and prayerfully take up the religion of Christianity—how different would be the condition of our communities.—Why, if all the believers in Christ carried out in their lives the noble religion of love to God and all men, vice would cease, profanity would be no more, slavery would vanish, and the influence of their example would do more in one year towards banishing paganism from the earth, than all the missions have effected since their establishment. The wondrous tale would fly on the wings of the wind to the uttermost parts of the world, that Christians came up to the standard of moral perfection which their divine Lord established for them. Sinners would wake from their dormancy, and admire—heathen would leave their temples of idolatry, and believe—the skeptic would away with his doubts and follow Jesus—and the countless throngs of the human family would join in the song that the system of Christ was indeed good news of glad tidings to all people. But, alas! with a moral power which shows their divine origin, and with a religion which is grand in the purity of its requirements; men neglect it, and still grope along in sin. This religion is so clear that it is forgotten. But place it in the clouds of mysticism, so that it can be seen without being understood, and men will become so zealous about it as to fight with one another concerning its meaning. But simplify it—make it plain—thunder in the ears of men, that it requires them to be virtuous in one department of life, kind in another, benevolent in another, and good in all; and it seems to be neglected because every body can understand it, and so simple that every person can find it in a light suited to their capacities

It seems scarcely to have entered the minds of men, that religion is a thing which enters the duties of common life, and is indeed a friend in counselling us under any and every circumstance; and that when an individual discharged a duty incumbent on him to fulfil, he has discharged one duty of religion. They do not dream that it gives courtesy in company, purity in speech, freedom in thought, integrity in business, benevolence and judgment in charity, patriotism in council, obedience to parents, wisdom in the parental circle, piety and worship in the church, kindness to the sick and afflicted, liberality towards religious opponents, forgiveness to enemies, and gratitude to God for all his unnumbered mercies. This is not seen; and yet, the highest aim of religion is to expand our moral natures and to build us up until we become firm temples of virtue, from which an example shall go forth to wither the influence of vice, and draw the sons and daughters of sin home to God and righteousness. The noblest trophy which religion can boast, is a soul won from transgression, and led to the beautiful plains of integrity. It asks no more than to rob man of his follies, and to give him strength to resist temptation, and to enable him to walk onward in the free-born influences of truth. It chains no mind, it fetters no reason, it lessens no happiness, it creates no contention, it originates no illiberality, it causes no profanity, it brings forth no fear; but like an organ in a choir of voices, it diffuses itself into every portion and circumstance in life, and adds to every enjoyment. The religious man is one who respects the opinions of others, who reverences truth from whatever source it may come, who admires virtue by whomsoever practiced, who adorns his life with virtue, and whoever cherishes that noble spirit which expands his desire for the whole human family. The religious woman is one who loves amiable feelings, whose example is pure and holy, who adorns the cause of her Saviour, who frowns on vice and builds up virtue, and wherever she moves, is reverenced for the purity of her character, the sweetness of her manners and the kindness of her conversation.

How sublimely pure and good must a system be, which advocates such a religion as this; and ever enforces upon men the fact, that, in order to truly worship Deity they must become assimilated to his character. Christianity! It is the name of the best gift from heaven to man. It opens before us the character of God; the power, the wisdom, the justice, the mercy, the goodness, which forms his name and nature—Love. It unfolds all the virtue of a Saviour's life, all the undying strength of his benevolence for a wicked world. It tells us of the plenitude and extent of his mission, and of the glorious kingdom which God has given him to accomplish that mission.—It reveals to us how Deity, in the richness of his affection for us, has placed a torch of hope even on the coffin of the dead, and secured our resurrection from the grave. It exhibits to us the rejoicing theme of the reconciliation of the world, and how the great Fountain of love would purify all mind, and expand it with joys ever new and knowledge ever increasing. It opens to us that subduing affection with which the sins of the humble repentant are forgiven, and his life filled with those pure actions which ever grace the true Christian. It is wisdom in prosperity—it is strength in adversity—it is light and joy when hours of doubt and darkness come down upon the soul—it is consolation to the mourning—it is an angel of mercy in the house of death—it is the staff upon which the weary pilgrim leans as he journies in the valley of the grave—it is the youth of old age—it is the guiding light of manhood's strength—it is the warning voice and the instructing teacher of youth—it is the power which makes good parents, kind brothers and sisters, amiable and obedient children, faithful citizens, firm patriots, diligent and virtuous rulers, and ever the humble and forgiving followers of the Redeemer. And it is that truth, whose benevolence will not rest, whose voiceless eloquence will not be silent, until it shall leave a redeemed world in the presence of God and the Lamb, fitted to grow in the infinite knowledge of heaven and the ever-during joys of the dwelling place of Deity.

Such is Christianity. And that the religion of Christianity is beautiful, has already been shown. In the mistaken parlance of the world, it is often affirmed that the path of religion is a thorny path, full of pains and sorrows. But it may as well be said, that good health is painful, or that pleasure is a bitter. The fact is, it is a luxury to do good—there is a satisfaction in practicing virtue to be found in no other source—it is heaven on earth.—And let others represent it as gloomy, as blunting the happiness of life; for ourselves, we can cheerfully respond to the sentiment of the poet:—

This world's not "all a fleeting show,
For man's illusion given;"
He that hath soothed a widow's wo,
Or wiped an orphan's tear, doth know
There's something here of heaven.

And he that walks life's thorny way,
With feelings calm and even;
Whose path is lit from day to day
By virtue's bright and steady ray,
Hath something felt of heaven.

He, that the Christian's course has run,
And all his foes forgiven;
Who measures out life's little span,
In love to God, and love to man,
On earth has tasted heaven.

MINUTES

Of the proceedings of the Central Association of Universalists, for 1838.

Met in Lebanon, Madison county, on Wednesday, June 6th. Appointed Br. Woolley, Moderator; Br. Williams, Clerk, and Brs. J. Ballard, S. Henman, and Delong a committee on public services.

Heard the report of the committee of discipline for the last year. No complaint. The committee on fellowship and ordination, reported the ordination of Br. W. M. Delong, and a letter of fellowship to Br. W Martin. Report accepted.

Appointed Brs. Biddlecom, Delong, and M. B. Smith, a committee on fellowship and ordination; and Brs. Biddlecom, Delong, and J. A. Norton, a committee on discipline for the ensuing year.

The following preamble and resolution was unanimously adopted.

Whereas, since the last session of this body, our worthy Br. S. R. Smith, its Standing Clerk, has removed from its boundaries—therefore Resolved, That the thanks of this body be tendered to Br. Smith, for his long, faithful, and valuable services; and that Br. A. B. Grosh, is hereby appointed to fill his place as Standing Clerk of this Association.

Voted, That the committee on discipline be authorized to appoint Conferences, when and where they shall think proper, within the limits of this Association, by giving timely notice thereof.

Appointed Brs. M. B. Smith and Williams, ministers, and E. Stebbins and M. Hubbard, laymen, delegates to represent this Association in the State Convention in May, 1839; with power to appoint substitutes.

Appointed Br. Woolley to preach the occasional sermon for next session, with power to appoint a substitute; and Br. Williams, to prepare the minutes for publication.

Adjourned Thursday, 7th, after the conclusion of public services, to meet in Marshall, Oneida county, on the first Wednesday in June, 1839.

E. M. Woolley, Moderator.

A. Williams, Clerk.

Sermons were preached by Brs. T. J. Smith, Clark, Babcock, Rounseville, C. S. Brown, M. B. Smith, and Brs. Goodrich, Doolittle, Williams, and Biddlecom, took parts in the services.

LAY DELEGATES PRESENT.

C. Isham, R. D. Fuller, Hamilton; J. Ballard, S. Henman, Lebanon; E. Foote, S. Richards, Bridgewater; J. Dunbar, O. B. Gridley, Marshall; Wm. Hutchens, P. Halleck, Clinton; J. Stetson, J. H. Peck, Sangerfield and Brookfield.

MINISTERING BRETHREN PRESENT.

W. M. Delong, Lebanon; E. M. Woolley, Cazenovia; M. B. Smith, D. Biddlecom, Clinton; C. S. Brown, A. G. Clark, Upper Lisle; N. Doolittle, North Norwich; T. J. Smith, J. Eddy, Winfield; J. Babcock, Hume; J. Boden, Cooperstown; J. T. Goodrich, Oxford; J. S. Sharp, Pharsalia; W. Rounseville, South Virgil; J. Hayward, Burlington; A. Williams, Hamilton.

REMARKS.

At the close of the morning services, the Eucharist was administered, by Br. M. B. Smith. Although the weather was somewhat rainy, still there was a respectable number, who joined with devotion, in the worship of the one God; and took sweet counsel together in the sanctuary. The ministry of the word was with power, and calculated to do good by giving instruction. The excellent singing, also contributed to the pleasure of the worshipping assembly, and the harmony that prevailed, and the union of sentiment that found a mutual reciprocation, from heart to heart, told of feelings softened and influenced by benevolence and good will.

Union please copy.

THE RECORD.

Rev. A. G. Clark has engaged to preach one-fourth of the time in Caroline, Tompkins county.

Br. J. Chase has engaged to labor with the Universalist Society in North Bloomfield, every Sabbath for the year to come. He has labored with them half the time for nearly two years past, and they have increased in numbers and liberality, so as to sustain preaching all the time. They have a convenient brick church, a good organ, (played by Br. Chase's daughter,) and are in prosperous circumstances. Those who communicate with Br. C., are requested to direct, North Bloomfield, Ontario county, N. Y.

A church was formed in Peru, O., a short time since, and now numbers 30 members.

From the Trumpet and Magazine we learn, that the friends of impartial grace in Rhode Island, have organized themselves into a State Convention, called "The Rhode Island Convention of Universalists." Br. B. H. Davis was chosen Standing Clerk, and Brs. Wm. S. Balch, Christopher Robinson, and Henry Carrique, Committee on Fellowship and Ordination, for the ensuing year.

Installation.—Br. R. O. Williams was installed as pastor of the Universalist Society in Dover, N. H. on the 23d ult. Sermon by Br. H. Ballou, 2d.

Ordination.—Br. Francis W. Baxter, was ordained to the duties of the ministry of reconciliation, in Frankfort, Me., on the 24th ult. Sermon by Br. D. D. Smith.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 26.—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.

Bethany, Va., June 1st, 1838.

Mr. Skinner:

Sir—Not willing that even an unsupported assertion of yours, if it have only the merit of appearing plausible to one in a hundred of my readers, should pass without courteous attention, I will introduce my present epistle with a summary notice of your unsupported and unsupportable assumption—viz., that all punishments are disciplinary chastisements for the good of the subject, and that therefore they must all terminate in reformation; consequently can not be eternal, in the proper and unfigurative use of that word. Such is the third leg or philosophic limb of your system.

2. Your philosophy assumes, 1st. That punishment and chastisement are but two names for one idea. 2d. That all punishment necessarily terminates in the reformation of its subjects. 3d. That punishment is never properly exemplary, or for the good of other beings not the subjects of it. And 4th. That punishment is not necessary for the honor of the Governor of the Universe—or, that God or his law can not be insulted; or if insulted, that he can not resent it in any other way than by forever wearing the indignity and by forgiving the author of it. What a field for abstract wanderings does your philosophic limb open to our view! Four grand assumptions are the four elements of your philosophy of punishment. They are all false; and very prudently you are content simply to assert them.

3. With regard to the first it may be conceded that no one word is always so strictly used, even by good speakers, as to preclude all ambiguity. Hence as punishment sometimes ends in correction or chastisement, we find the one term sometimes used for the other. But they are not thence convertible terms; and the sophism in your reasoning is, that because punishment sometimes is correction, you make it convertible with that term: just as if I should say the term tree sometimes means an oak, and you should snatch the concession and affirm hence all trees are oaks. All oaks are indeed trees; but, Sir, all trees are not oaks. So all chastisements or corrections are indeed punishments; but all punishments are not chastisements. Punishment is penalty or pain for transgression, without any regard to what the issue of that pain or penalty may be. It sometimes has, and it may always have, three objects—1st. The glory and honor of the Lawgiver. 2d. The good of the offending subject. And 3d. The guardianship and defence of the unoffending. Something, in other words, is due to the King, to the subject, and to his fellows on every transgression: punishment is that unavoidable something.

4. Your second assumption is but a new modification of your definition of punishment. To chasten is to reform; therefore chastisement is reformation. Now it is essential to your argument that all punishments, not a few, but that ALL punishments do end in reformation. But multitudes are often punished for drunkenness, licentiousness, and a thousand other vices, and afterwards die in the act of transgressing. Therefore you can not demonstrate from facts (for it is contrary to innumerable facts) that ALL punishments do in this life terminate in correction or amendment, or chastening of men's morals. You have then to beg the question as usual, and assume that what fails in this life will be successfully prosecuted in the next, and that punishment will be increased and perpetuated in another world till the incorrigible in this life shall become holy. This you can not prove from any fact; but then your hypothesis of what is compatible with God's perfections here kindly supplies the place of fact; and thus you can easily prove, as aforesaid, your philosophy by your divinity, and then again prove your theology by your philosophy.

5. But I have some Bible facts to the contrary of your hypothesis: for in the other world satan and the rebel hosts are not reformed by six thousand years' banishment from the presence of God; and there is no reason to conclude that satan and all other imprisoned spirits are any nigher holiness and happiness now than they were thousands of years since. We have facts against your hypothesis. But you can ease your hands of all this trouble by denying that there is any satan, or rebel host, or wicked spirit in the other world, and ask with the infidel Paine, "Who ever saw the devil?"

6. The Apostle John says that after the final assemblage of God's elect into the eternal city, the wicked shall still be found in their sins: for affirms he (Rev. xxii: 15) "WITHOUT are dogs, and sorcerors, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolators, and whosoever loveth and inventeth a lie." This is the fixed and indelible character of those without the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem. Solomon also said, "In hades [or the world of spirits] there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom: therefore, whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." But a greater than Solomon has discovered that in hades, or in the world of spirits, (for so it reads in Hebrew and Greek,) there is a great work, device, knowledge, and wisdom; namely, that of repentance unto holiness and eternal life!! Mr. Skinner's doctrine is, "No need of such mighty effort to flee from wrath to come; for there is device, work, and wisdom in hades." Solomon's doctrine is, "Work here with all your might, for there is no work there:" "for to him that is joined to all the living there is hope." But says the Universalist, "To him that is joined to all the dead there is hope." Therefore they may repent in hades and escape to heaven. You think it no doubt creditable for you to differ from John and Solomon. Your second assumption then is not only contrary to such declarations as the above, but without one fact to sustain it, and with many facts against it. Will Mr. Skinner name some case—some man or angel that escaped out of purgatory and who was brought to repentance in hades by virtue of post mortem punishment? We only ask for one case!

7. Your third assumption is also factless, baseless, and contradictory to Scripture: for all punishment is not for the good of the subject, but for example to others. Was the destruction of the old world by a deluge, or of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, etc., for the good of the inhabitants, or for a punishment on them and an example to others? Not for their sanctification, but for an example, says the Holy Spirit by Peter and Jude. Jesus quotes from the last words of Isaiah, from a passage which, while it shows the perpetuity of punishment, declares that it shall be exemplary in the highest degree: "Men shall look upon the carcases of transgressors, for their worm shall never die, neither shall their fire be quenched, and they shall be an abhorring to all flesh."

8. I suppose, Sir, it was the absurdity of your brethren of the school of genuine Universalism, from whom it would seem you are on the road to apostacy, that has cast you down into a sort of papistical purgatory. You could not digest their strong meat of sending Judas into heaven before Him whom he betrayed, and of making suicide the shortest and most direct way unto Abraham's bosom. This indigestible mess compelled you to visit the springs of Restorationism and to refresh your soul with the poetry of the fabled Nine on the subject of a new passage through Avernus into perfect holiness and happiness. Do you say that "the wages of sin is death," and then say that death is a chastisement for the moral good of him who suffers it! Is death a moral means of holiness!

9. The last element of your philosophy, or your fourth assumption, is, that God's throne, law, and character may be insulted with perfect impunity as far as respects vengeance; for consistently with your hypothetical benevolence, God may chastise but can not punish the sinner. He may afflict him for the sinner's good, but not for the honor of his own throne, nor for the good of his other subjects. For what intent, then, did Jesus suffer such poignant sorrows as never pierced a human soul? Why did he taste the bitterness of death as mortal never did, exclaiming that God had forsaken him! Was it for his own good! Was it for his own reformation! Was it for an example to others to sustain sufferings when they were themselves holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sin! For what did he suffer through life, and for what did he die! Did he die to expiate the sins of men, or for his own sins, to magnify God's law and make it honorable; or merely to prove his own sincerity! On your hypothesis I ask, for what did he die?

10. Indeed I see no use you have for any Christ or Holy Spirit, or Bible, or preacher, or faith, hope and love, in order to future happiness. Restorationism, of all the systems of Universalism, to me appears the most unchristian, baseless, and imaginative. Some make a more plausible half-way system of Universalism by tacking together one point of Calvinism with one point of Arminianism. "Christ's death," says the Calvinist, "expiates the sins of all for whom he died; so that he suffered all the punishment due to the elect."—"Christ's death," says the Arminian, "is for all mankind in the same sense." Then comes the old-fashioned semi-demi orthodox Universalism; and, thanking both the Calvinist and the Arminian, says to the first, "Sir, you are right in the meaning;" and to the second, "Sir, you are right in the extent of Christ's death, and I am right in both: for I believe that he expiated all the sins of all for whom he died, and also that he died for all; therefore, all men immediately after death enter into eternal happiness." But, Sir, less plausible than he, you profess to have a Christ in your system, but no use for him: for you teach that men will suffer for their sins until they become holy. You deify Orcus: you give to punishment the power of Christ's death in the work of expiation; and the power of the Holy Spirit in the work of sanctification. You ought to have a temple reared to this new divinity that atones for all sin—that expiates all crime, and sanctifies even the devil and his angels. I do not wonder, Sir, at your sympathies with deists, skeptics, atheists, and all that unholy brotherhood, who, with you, are to be saved from sin by the fires of purgatory, or the temporal evils of a present world.

11. "The Universalists" with whom I have been informed you were once identified, "believe that a full and perfect retribution takes place in this world; that our conduct here can not affect our future condition, and that the moment man exists after death he will be as pure and as happy as the angels." This system makes death the saviour and the sanctifier, and gives to physical means the power of working a moral change!! It sends the duellist and the murderer expiring in the act of treason against God and implacable hatred against man, crimsoned with the blood of his fellow, and his heart burning with demoniacal passion, into the immediate presence of God, pure and holy as an angel of light! It weakens every motive to virtue, and gives an impetus to every temptation to vice. It commends to parents the immolation of their own offspring, and to the unfortunate self-murder as a sure preventive and a safe remedy of all evils. This is the renovating moralizing system over which the genuine Universalist places his Christ as a minister of sin, or as a sort of indemnificator of transgressors,

12. I could most unfeignedly wish, Sir, that you might see the beam in your own more absurd Restorationism with the clearness you seem to eye the mote in your brother ultra Universalian system. Is it not on the Apocrypha that you have constructed your notions of a man's expiating his own sins and gradually weakening his own corruptions by lingering in Orcus a few centuries! Or is it on the fables of the Greeks and Romans that you found your limbus purgatorius! At all events you must admit that it is a terra incognita—a land unknown to mortals—a floating island in an ideal ocean, from whose dark and dreary bourne no traveller has yet returned. May we not here inscribe HIC JACET upon your philosophy, and consign it to the land of forgetfulness!

13. But this is not all your philosophy. In your letter of May 9th, received here the 22d, you give us a new chapter on the finite evil of sin. This, indeed, appears in the midst of a disquisition upon the divine perfections. The holiness, mercy, justice, truth, and paternity of your God, you argue make the eternal punishment of sin impossible. Your God can neither punish nor pardon sin. He can only chasten the sinner, and his own sufferings make him holy, so that he needs no forgiveness. Your Christ expiates not sin, God pardons it not, nor can he punish it. The sinner's pains are his expiation—his sorrows the means of pardon; and the chastisement he endures in his sanctification: so that he needs no expiation, no Saviour, no Holy Spirit, no forgiveness.

14. Your philosophy of sin is unique and in good keeping with this part of your system. Sin with you is a peccadillo—a mere speck—a cutaneous and curable distemper, unworthy of the interposition of a divine physician! The tears of repentance flowing from the rod of correction are its sovereign remedy. You are expert on the mathematical doctrine of infinites, and eloquent in your refutation of the orthodox doctrines of "the infinite evil of sin." But, Sir, let me tell you that it is not only illogical, but a formal proof of your lack of matter to introduce the doctrines of other days and of other men, or the technicalities of the ancients in your arguments with me. I have used no such language about sin as you put into my mouth. Yet your philosophy of the finite evil of sin has almost converted me into the opinion that the old Protestant Divines were right in calling "sin an infinite evil." Your school-boy arithmetical puns and speculations about infinites, show there is some sense in the phrase which you oppose. No speaker or writer of sense indeed uses the word as you define it.

15. But, Sir, I speak for myself and affirm my conviction that every unexpiated sin as respects its consequences is infinite in duration, and that is all that our discussion requires. I do not, however, use this term in your vague and unphilosophic style: for with you if a thing be infinite in length, it is infinite in breadth, in height and depth, and in every other respect. You have never studied either the grammatical or the mathematical use of words, and therefore the ridiculous disquisitions you give us upon language. Let me then plainly illustrate my views of the infinitude of sin. If man could not die but by the hand of violence, would not every one that killed his brother, although he did it in a second of time, commit an infinite evil as respects the consequences of his act? Does he not deprive his brother of life forever!

16. There is not, Sir, a single violation of law that is not infinite in its consequences—i. e. in the defined sense of that word. If A rob B of a thousand pounds, has not B lost it forever! And is not the law of God violated forever! And would not the disgrace of an insulted lawgiver be eternal if the sin be not fully expiated? That is not a sinful act whose consequences are not infinite in duration. Did not the Congressional murderers of your Universalian brother Cilley, though the rifle executed their passion in a moment, deprive his wife of her husband forever, and his children of their father forever! I say again, Sir, every sin is infinite in its consequences; and let me add, that if God's law were only once violated, and that outrage not fully expiated, his government would be disgraced forever! If God be holy and just, if he be benevolent and true, he must make the punishment of sin commensurate with its consequences and demerits.

17. Will you not admit, Sir, that the term goodness, or the perfection we call the goodness of God, is generic, and that benevolence, mercy, compassion, condescension, justice, truth and holiness, are but different species or modifications of goodness? This being admitted, (and who dares to deny it?) follows it not that the goodness of God requires him to punish sin justly—that is, in the ratio of its evil consequences! If, then, sin be an outrage against God's character, government, and subjects, of infinite consequences and bearings, every divine perfection that enters into the moral character of God demands a commensurate expiation or punishment.

18. Or have you duly reflected that the person who represents sin to be a finite trifle, tempts to the commission of it? This being conceded, it follows that every effort to derogate from its heinousness—from its unspeakable malignity, or from the certainty of its adequate punishment, tends to the spread and continuance of it. The certainty of punishment has incomparably more power to prevent sin than the magnitude of punishment. The possibility, much more the probability of escaping punishment in whole or in part, therefore greatly nullifies the threatening of it. Hence Universalism, skepticism, atheism, never did, never can reform society. The highest compliment that in strict justice and truth was ever paid the system of momentary, doubtful, or uncertain punishment in any individual case, was, that the convert became no worse than he was before. This indeed is rather an extraordinary occurrence, and savors something of a miracle!

19. The soundest philosophy of civil government ever taught enforces the necessity of making punishment certain rather than severe. But, effectually to prevent crime, punishment must be both certain and severe. This human power can not effect, but Omnipotence and Omniscience can; and therefore without the sanctions of religion human society can not exist at all. Universalism, skepticism, atheism, are therefore not in accordance with human nature and human circumstances, but directly and positively subversive of society; because each of them divests the universe of a moral Governor that can punish sin or pardon it as Almighty Omniscience counsels and directs.

20. Sin a finite evil!!! Who can believe it? And yet for one offence of one person in reference to a single prohibition, the countless (almost infinite) millions of human kind have died and are daily dying! Sin a finite evil, a frailty, an infirmity, a cutaneous sore! And yet for one offence of one person sin has already reigned unto death for almost six thousand years! Sin a finite evil! And yet for one offence satan and his untold legions of angelic peers were hurled from the battlements of heaven, whence they have been sinking in the fathomless gulf during all the flight of time, and have not yet reached the place prepared for the devil and his angels! Sin a finite evil! And Jesus, God's only begotten and well beloved Son, holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sin, having it only imputed to him, is nailed to the cursed tree, and dies in such agonies as mortal never felt! Why, Sir, it is an insult to reason and to the God of reason. That he should have instituted such an expiatory remedial system, demanding the ignominious and painful death of the pure and spotless Lamb of God, adumbrated by seas of blood and sacrificial scenes of four thousand years' continuance, to obviate a speck, a blemish, a momentary evil, which, notwithstanding all that he has said and done, remains still farther to be expiated by the purgatorial pains and penitential tears of sinners—is a libel on the wisdom, power, goodness, justice, truth, holiness, mercy, condescension, and love of God. So far from being compatible with all the divine perfections, it is incompatible with any one of them. Because he is good, and just, and true, he will not so govern the world as to allow the possibility of the recurrence of sin, much less to hold out a temptation to it. Please again read my yet unanswered expositions of your theology of the divine perfections.

21. Your quotations of Scripture are without regard to any of the rules of interpretation. You seem not to inquire who speaks, or who is spoken to, nor even what is said. You can always prove any thing you please by thus disjointing, distorting, and violating the context. Time, place, person, circumstances, with you pass for nothing. The sound of the words with you decides their sense, irrespective of the interpretation of the context. What Jesus said to his disciples, you apply to all mankind; what the apostles said to the Christians, you apply to Turk, Jew, and Gentile. I do not find one in a score of your quotations that has any thing to do with the point before us. You might as rationally make the whole Jewish ritual imperative upon us, as compel the texts you have quoted in the preceding letter to bear upon the question at issue. But of this I have previously spoken. The Lord's prayer was taught to none but to the disciples of Christ; but you extend it to the human race—all religious classes—Turks, Jews, Infidels, etc., etc., etc.

22. But in disposing of your philosophy I will not resume the subject of interpretation. To conclude then your theory of punishment annihilating itself, I will state three of the absurd ideas, which, like unwieldy wens, hang upon this limb of your system:—

1st. You make punishment annihilate itself. It ceases by its own operations upon itself. In working reformation it kills itself. What else in nature annihilates itself? Nothing, Sir, but your notion of the intimacy between punishment and reformation!

2d. You make the effect destroy its cause.—This is second only to self-annihilation. Suffering is not the cause, but the effect, of sin; yet you make suffering, the effect, destroy sin, its cause!!

3d. You represent the sinner as saved by obeying a broken law, inasmuch as you make his post mortem salvation the fruit of his obedience to the divine requisitions which on earth he contemned; for you teach that the sinner passes out of purgatory upon his repentance, and obedience to that law, which, on earth, in his first state, he disobeyed. Thus you give to your law of justification a new power—the power of both condemning and justifying the same person!!

23. Presuming that you have already on hand as much as you can well dispose of in one epistle, I will not, for the present, overwhelm you with all the difficulties of your system.

Very benevolently, A. CAMPBELL.

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, JUNE 24, 1838.

MATTHEW XXVIII: 1-15.

Last week we surveyed the scenes through which Jesus had to pass at the palace and judgment-hall of the Roman governor. It is painful to contemplate such scenes of gross injustice; to witness a mob, with passions inflamed through the influence and representations of leading, artful men, prevailing in their unjust demands against a grave dispenser of justice; to see a judge flinch from the discharge of his duty, and from the fear of injurious reports to his superiors, consent to the death of an innocent prisoner; to think of the abusive and insulting conduct in which the officers of a court of justice were indulged. It is owing much to the spread of the spirit of Pilate's prisoner that Christian society does not present similar scenes of outrage and injustice now.

"The tender mercies of the wicked are cruelty." No sooner did the priest and the mob procure from Pilate the sentence of death, than they hurried their victim away to the place of execution. In twelve hours from the time when Jesus was discoursing and praying with his disciples, he is nailed to the cross. Early in the morning he was brought before Pilate, and at nine he was crucified. As was usual with those who were condemned to this punishment, Jesus was obliged to carry the beam to which he was to be nailed. But as he proceeds under this burden, we see his bodily powers fail; we see him totter and falter under the load. The want of sleep, the agitation of his feelings, probably the want of food have robbed him of his strength, and he sinks under the oppressive load. Yet notwithstanding these evidences of "tired nature," the unfeeling soldiers, and the brutal mob show him no compassion; in the midst of exhaustion, and the acute sufferings of crucifixion they are unceasing in their mockery, insults and injuriousness. When we faintly conceive of the sufferings of a crucified person, we wonder that any human beings could behave with such barbarity, as characterised the soldiers and the mob who attended the execution of Jesus. It is a surpassingly pitiful and revolting exhibition of human nature.

We can not find any language better calculated to convey to the reader an idea of the sufferings and ignominy of the cross than that of Prof. Ware in his "Life of the Saviour"—a work of which we would recommend all Christian parents, youth, and instructors of youth, to possess themselves. "It is not easy for us, at the present day, to conceive the terrible suffering of a death by crucifixion, or to understand the disgrace which was attached to it. It was the most shameful as well as cruel of all modes of execution. It was reserved for the most abandoned malefactors, and for slaves. When we speak of the disgrace of being condemned to the gallows, we present no picture of ignominy to be compared with that which pertained to crucifixion.

"The form of the cross is familiar to us. But it is commonly represented as of a far greater altitude, than really belonged to it. It was rarely more than ten feet in height. The upright beam, which was planted in the ground, was called the tree; and hence the apostle Paul uses that name for the cross. Near the top, it was crossed by a bar at right angles, on which was written the crime for which the person suffered. To the extremities of this his hands were fastened by nails driven through the palms. Thus the whole weight of his body was suspended by his hands, excepting as he partially sat on a small projecting piece of wood. His feet were nailed to the beam, but without any thing to support them. In this torturing situation, the poor sufferer hung for many hours, and died at last in indescribable agony.—So terrible was the torment, that it became customary to give the victim an intoxicating drink for the purpose of deadening his feelings; and the executioners often hastened the time of death by suffocation or otherwise, especially if the struggle continued longer than a day."

Such was the agonising—the ignominious death to which our Saviour was condemned. It is no unusual practice with some pulpit declaimers to dwell upon these physical sufferings, along with some other suppositious woes, as proofs of Christ's love to sinners, and especially, as arguments for men's loving him. We view these sufferings, along with his superiority to temptation, as proofs of his filial love, and of his supreme devotion to the will of his Father, and to the grand purpose for which he was raised up. In common with ourselves, Jesus revolted from sufferings and from death; yet knowing that these were before him, his devotion to God's purposes of mercy was superior to these natural antipathies. When we look to Jesus on the cross, we are ashamed of our own deficiency in proofs of love to his cause; and sometimes, we feel fired with a desire and a resolution to sacrifice more in the cause of virtue, self-improvment, duty, and Christianity. Whose zeal for God would now carry them through trials of half the severity of the Beloved Son? Let our self-control, our self-denial, our capability of endurance in a good cause gain strength when we contemplate the cross of Jesus!

About nine in the morning of a Friday, Jesus was suspended, and about three in the afternoon he expired. We have reason to suppose that his sufferings were intense just before he died, from his exclamation, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"—an expression of seeming despondence, but really nothing more than the natural, and as Bishop Porteus says, the "almost unavoidable effusion of a mind tortured with the acutest pain, and hardly conscious of the complaints it uttered."

Christ's prayer for his persecutors, and his few affectionate words to his mother and John, while in agony on the cross, show his forgetfulness of self, and anxiety for others, and are, doubtless, indelibly imprinted upon the memory of all readers of his history.

The Jewish Sabbath, doubly sacred on account of the festival, commenced at sun-down of that day, and before that, the bodies must be removed from the crosses. Jesus was therefore, hurriedly carried to an adjoining tomb, without the usual rites of burial. It was to complete these that the women came with their spices and ointments early on the morning after the Sabbath.

The super-natural darkness of three hours, the earthquakes, the rending of rocks, the opening of graves, and other circumstances attending on the death of Jesus, forced upon the Roman centurion who presided at the scene, the conviction, "Truly this was the Son of God." Not such was the impression of the priests and leading men. They persisted in treating Jesus as an impostor. On Saturday, their Sabbath, they come to Pilate, stating circumstances which made them afraid the disciples would come and steal away the body of their Master. They were allowed to and did seal the stone at the mouth of the cave, and set a guard of soldiers to watch the tomb. Thus did the enemies of the cause aid most materially in making the evidence of a real resurrection irrefragable. This was far remote from their intention, but Jehovah "makes even the wrath of man to praise him."

The women come at the very first dawn of day on Sunday morning, to complete the usual rites of interment, and find the tomb open, and the body gone. This news soon reaches his enemies as well as his friends. Behold! in the movements of the leading Jews, how far prejudice and wilful blindness will carry their deluded victims. Themselves will not yield to the force of facts which they can not deny; and the best framed story which they can forge is incredible, because self-contradictory. The soldiers on watch were heavily bribed, and instructed to report that while they slept the disciples came and stole away the body of Jesus. Wise sleepers! to know what was going an around them, and who passed before their closed lids! Sixty sentinels, (who ever heard of such before?) go to sleep at once, and in their sleep see the very men they are on guard against, and yet not one of the sixty wakes to intercept them." Credit Judæus non ego.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JUNE 22, 1838.

FRIENDLY LETTER,

To Rev. Messrs. Fowler and Savage, Pastors of the First and Second Presbyterian Churches in Utica, and their coadjutors in the late religious excitement in this city.

Rev. Sirs—You will, I trust, pardon the liberty I take in thus publicly addressing you, when informed of the circumstances and causes which impel me to the measure. Your professional and public characters, and the stations you occupy, when considered in reference to the subject on which I write, do not permit me to remain silent on a subject involving not only your public character as Christian ministers, but also your private character as gentlemen, as men of veracity, and as citizens of Utica.

I have just returned from the State of Virgina, after an absence from this city of between seven and eight months. I am fully informed, by the public press and by undoubted information from the most respectable individuals in this community, that during my absence, a remarkable excitement, a great stir and commotion on the subject of religion, has taken place in this city—that it was got up and mainly conducted by two individuals styling themselves Baptist preachers; the one of whom, if not fully known when he came, was long before he left notorious for his filthy conversation, his polluted life, and his putrescent character, as a "hissing and a by-word" through the city; the other, for years notorious for his low and vulgar breeding, his indecent cant, and sarcasms, his miserable buffoonery, and his numerous ungentlemanly, false, and slanderous stories against individuals and denominations differing in religious opinion from himself—that you received these men, especially the latter, with open arms and the most cordial fellowship, and for the purpose of getting up greater excitements in your respective churches, and making proselytes to your creed, foisted them into your churches and pulpits, openly and publicly gave countenance to them and their measures, sat under them and listened, day after day, night after night, and week after week, to the vulgar and slanderous tales of the latter, (that you may not misunderstand, and the public, especially distant readers, may know, so as to be on their guard against him, his name, KNAPP, is here for once, and once only, given,) and that you often smiled, and sometimes shook your sides with laughter, at the ludicrous falsehoods he told concerning myself, the church of which I have for years been pastor, and other individuals, and indeed the whole Christian denomination to which I belong. These tales, told for the purpose of exciting ridicule against Universalism and its abettors, many in your congregations knew, at the time, to be absolutely false, length and breadth; and you were, immediately after, fully certified that such was the case, in a respectful manner, and from the most credible sources of information. Moreover, some of you solemnly promised on your word and honor, that if the stories were false, they should be as publicly retracted as they had been stated—that as you had no desire to give currency to falsehood and slander, the retailer thereof, or some one for him, should apologise for, and retract the falsehoods prejudicial to mine and others' public and private characters. But weeks have passed away, and months have gone by, and yet no retraction is made, no apology is offered, your pledge is unredeemed, and your congregation uninformed from the pulpit that those stories were untrue, and those tales absolutely false and slanderous! Gentlemen, what am I?—what is a Christian public to think of these matters? What is the only inference that candid minds can draw from the course you have pursued? * * *

Gentlemen, I have been for eleven years a resident and preacher of the Gospel in Utica, and I have lived in all good conscience before God and men unto this day. My family has been here, and my out-goings and incomings have been observed and watched by friends and enemies of the doctrine I teach. My manner of life know or may know, all the citizens of Utica. I claim no exemption from the imperfections common to human nature; but I do claim that, if you have aught against me in my private or public character, now I am here to answer for myself, you shall make known your complaints to me, show me in what my guilt or misdemeanor consists, and not make your pulpits the vehicles of slandering me in my absence—nor my public or private character the foot-ball of religious mountebanks, and the laughing-stock of their idle and monomaniac dupes.

Had the slanderous tales referred to, been uttered by the same individual in the bar-room of a tavern, or in a grocery, or in the streets, I should never have written one word nor spoken one syllable concerning them, for the very good reason that the tongue that gave them utterance, (correctly described James iii: 6,) is utterly incapable, of itself, of slandering the character of any man who is known in community. For nobody acquainted with your instrument, would believe him in such a case. But it is not his tongue alone that has given currency to these tales. They were uttered in your churches, in your pulpits, in your hearing, with your countenance, with your assent and smile of approbation; and I appeal to you as Christian ministers, to your consciences, as accountable beings to that God before whose tribunal you and I must alike stand and be judged according to our works and motives, and ask, are you not both morally and religiously accountable for what has thus gone forth from your pulpits without contradiction from you, and with the sanction of your approbation? Do you not feel responsible? And does not conscience whisper in your hearts, "we be verily guilty concerning this matter"? Do you feel conscious that you are following the example and walking in the footsteps of the benevolent Jesus?—that ye are doing by others as ye would that others should do unto you, while these slanders from your pulpits remain unretracted?

Gentlemen, do you believe that "all liars shall have their part in the lake that burns with fire and brimstone"? And do you believe at the same time, that that lake represents the burning lava of an endless hell, where souls will welter in immortal and ceaseless woe? Moreover, do you believe not only that all liars, but whosoever "loveth" as well as "maketh a lie," shall experience such a doom? You may perhaps say you did not make nor tell the lies yourselves. But, Gentlemen, did you not love them, and smile at and approve them, and thus give them currency with your congregations? Let truth, let conscience answer.

Will you say (as I heard one of your members remark the other day) that you did not approve of all he said and did, especially of all his hard sayings against Universalists, but yet you believe he did good, and therefore you are bound to approve of him in general, and to regard him as a good man? Time perhaps will determine how much good he did, and whether, if any good shall ever result from his labors, it will be the kind of good that you anticipated. But supposing it should, are you prepared to adopt the principle that "the end justifies the means"—that it is right to "do evil that good may come"—that a man is justified in lying, or promulgating known falsehoods for the truth's sake, or rather for his opinion's sake? Will you say that because good resulted from the treacherous and wicked conduct of Joseph's brethren, in selling him into Egypt, that therefore they were justified in the act, and you are bound to regard them as good men? Will you say that because satan was allowed to afflict righteous Job, and to slander the character of that good man, and God overruled his afflictions for good, that therefore satan was justifiable, and is to be regarded as a good being? Then may you, on the same principle, justify the lies and slanders uttered against Universalists from your pulpits, and deem the instrument by whom they were uttered, a good man. And it is not impossible but what God, as in the case of patient Job, may overrule the slanders against Universalists for their good.

Gentlemen, if you deem Universalists in as great and fatal an error as your pulpit declarations would imply, why do you not seek to convince and reclaim us by candid, fair, and generous treatment? Do you suppose abuse, and slanders, and falsehoods will convince us? We are open to conviction, if in error. We have no desire to believe in falsehood. We are willing and anxious to give you a candid and patient hearing. But if you wish to win us to your faith, you must treat us kindly and speak truth about us. Tell us the truth in love, and we will listen. If this be your aim, why not accept the polite invitation extended to you by Rev. Mr. Grosh, in his letter addressed to you on the 23d of March last, to preach against our sentiments in our own church, and to a Universalist congregation? What have you to fear (if truth be on your side) from meeting us on fair and equal grounds?

In conclusion, Rev. Sirs, let me say, do not deem me your enemy because I tell you the truth, nor because I speak plainly and freely on the principal subject of this communication. "Faithful are the wounds of a friend, but the kisses of an enemy are deceitful." I can assure you I have no unkind feelings towards you—no wish concerning you, but for your prosperity and peace. But you may rest assured, that peace and prosperity can never be yours but in the ways of well-doing. "The way of the transgressor is hard," while "wisdom's ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." Let me also ask you to consider whether you have not had an enemy in your midst with his "kisses," while his heart was "deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked."

Brethren, to God and to conscience let us all faithfully submit the decision of this subject; and whatever the latter points out as duty, let no one of us ever shrink from the performance of it.

In all faithfulness, I am, Gentlemen, your brother in the Gospel of Christ,
D. Skinner.

REVIVAL MEASURES IN SCHENECTADY.

We have received a letter from Br. E. B. Vedder, of Schenectady, containing an account of the proselyting schemes which have been in progress in that city for a short time past; wherein we are informed that the notorious individual who was the coadjutor of John Fishpool in this city, had visited that place with his wild ravings and stereotyped slanders. It is with reluctance, that I notice a man who seems to pride himself upon his lawlessness. But in the absence of the Editor, I must comply with the request of our correspondent, though I will endeavor to be as brief as possible. The dream, and the stories of converted Universalists in this city and elsewhere, and about signal judgments, were related here: it is unnecessary to copy them, as they, or similar stories, appear to be repeated in nearly every place where that walking pestilence appears. They are like pocket medalions, carried only to fill up an otherwise empty purse.

It is sufficient to say that we believe them to be utterly false and unfounded. So far as this city is concerned, we do not know of a single case of a Universalist renouncing his faith, but we do know that the Universalist preaching has been better attended, since his visit here, than it had been for a considerable time previous. For the benefit of our friends, we present a small extract from the letter before us.

"In a conversation with Mr. Knapp, some days since, in which he was very bitter in his invectives against Universalism, he denied to me, pointedly, that Mr. Fishpool had any connexion with the revival at Utica. How is this? Must both your and the Baptist paper be made records of falsehood, to build up the character of Mr. Knapp?"

Answer. I, myself, heard Mr. Knapp state, while preaching in the Bethel church in this city, that Mr. Fishpool had labored in that house almost incessantly for two weeks before he (K.) commenced. How admirably do his stories hang together! But this is not all. It is a fact, that during the course of the meeting here, Mr. F. took a conspicuous part. And, with the exception of preaching, I should think, he took a more prominent part in its proceedings, such as praying, exhorting, persuading the credulous and fickle minded to go to the anxious seats, visiting from house to house, and committing other deeds well known to the public, than his principal associate did.

Our friends then, in Schenectady and elsewhere, may rest assured that the conductor of their revival meeting, will never be able to improve his name, by attempting to slander either ourselves or the Baptist Register. He is too well known. A. R. B.

THE UNIVERSALIST AND LADIES' REPOSITORY.

We would remind the public, that the first number for volume seven of this valuable monthly, has made its appearance, in a manner highly creditable to its talented and enterprising conductors. We had thought that the previous volume was so well conducted, that it would leave but little room for improvement, but we have been agreeably surprised—our hearts have been warmed by the spirit-stirring elegance of its articles, and our eyes gratified with its improved mechanical execution. It is truly a rich spiritual treat for the devotional mind. We are hardly willing to notice one article, to the exclusion of the others; but to give the merits of each respective article, would be impracticable, in the present crowded state of our columns. We are, however, tempted to notice one article, which we think should be read by all classes, viz., "Fashionable Idolatry," by Miss S. C. Edgarton. It is beautifully written, and is intended to expose the too "prevalent passion for popularity" among females. We think that the gentlemen will be equally as well hit as the ladies. Let every one peruse and profit by it. A. R. B.

"VOICE TO YOUTH."

We are now prepared to furnish any quantity of this excellent work, in various kinds of binding, to suit the taste of purchasers. We presume all who have perused the last and present volumes of the Magazine and Advocate, agree with us that the "Voice to Youth" ought to be in the hands of every young lady and gentleman. If so, will they please recommend the work to their friends who have not perused it? Even those who have perused it in the paper, will find it very convenient for their libraries in a volume by itself.

We have put some up in handsome morocco, with gilt edges, for the accommodation of those who may wish to make a present to a young friend, of something that will please the eye as well as improve the mind.

For sale also by P. Price, 130 Fulton street, New-York, and A. Tompkins, 32 Cornhill, Boston.

WESTERN MONEY.

We are informed that some of our Western subscribers are troubled to procure this State or Eastern money for us. We regret it, as Western money, although good at home, is not current here. Such, therefore, as can, we hope will procure this State or Eastern money for us, and those who can not, will send such as is current where they reside.

Br. Rogers—Send Pro and Con to Rev. G. W. Montgomery and Daniel Shurtliff, Auburn, N. Y. Br. M. will remit.

This may certify, that the Central Association of Universalists, of the State of New-York, do fellowship Br. William Martin as a Preacher of the Everlasting Gospel, and reposing confidence in his moral worth, cordially commend him to the support and confidence of all Christians wherever God in his Providence may send him.

POETRY.

From the Trumpet and Magazine.

DEATH OF REV. WILLIAM C. HANSCOM.

Gone is that buoyant spirit
From its frail temple here;
Gone upward to inherit
A purer, happier sphere;
All sorrow it exchanges
For joy and peace above;
Passed from the earth, it ranges
The fields of endless love.

Friend of my soul, I mourn thee,
For dear wert thou to me;
Yet love this heart hath borne thee
Shall flow still fresh and free,
As when in days of brightness
Our Gospel joys were one—
And thou in spirit's lightness
Came forth thy race to run.

My memory loves to linger
Among those halcyon days,
When touched by God's own finger,
Thy lips gave forth his praise;—
When as on eagle's pinions
Thy soul in joy could fly,
And speak of powers, dominions,
And thrones for man on high.

But never more in gladness
Thy message can I hear;
Yet shall not hopeless sadness
To this frail heart come near;
I will exult in heaven
That thou indeed art free,
That God in grace hath given
Immortal life to thee.

Mount upward, spirit glorious!
Who would not follow on,
Where, over death victorious,
Our Saviour Christ hath gone?
Where praise to God the giver
Of Gospel light, shall flow—
And all our race forever,
The GREAT SALVATION know

INSANITY.

We mentioned yesterday the annual report of the Friends Asylum near Frankford, for the relief of insane persons; and we ask attention to the subjoined remarks from that report—they are worthy of attention.—U. S. Gazette.

"In the first place, we would remark upon the false light in which insanity in all its forms has long been regarded, and the unjust and most injurious feelings entertained respecting it, by too many in the present day. That it is one of the gravest afflictions with which Providence has visited mankind, all those who have witnessed its appalling effects must be prepared to acknowledge; but that its intrinsic miseries are greatly aggravated by adventitious circumstances, growing out of the popular ignorance and superstition respecting it, is equally undeniable.

"Instead of regarding it, as it really is, the result of physical disease—than which, none of equal complication and severity can be treated with greater proportional success, provided the proper course is pursued at its commencement—the unhappy sufferer from its inroads is too often looked upon, even by his friends, with evident suspicion and distrust, while his malady is concealed, or spoken of as a visitation calculated to inflict a stigma, not only upon himself, but his family. From the prevalence of this latter idea, how many who under judicious care at the first dawn of the disease, might have been rescued in a few days from its grasp, are secluded and cut off from proper medical and moral treatment; while the disorder which is deranging the functions of the brain, goes on from stage to stage, until some irremedial change takes place in that organ itself, and the whole fabric of rational intelligence is overthrown, without one well directed effort being made to arrest the progress of the direful invader. We must expect to see these mournful results frequently realized, so long as the opinion is prevalent, that the imputation of insanity involves degradation and contempt, and justly subjects its unhappy victim to the loss of the common sympathies and privileges of humanity.

"Another circumstance which deepens the gloom, in which those diseases deranging the manifestations of mind are necessarily shrouded, is the erroneous opinion which is still entertained respecting the places provided for the reception of the insane, and the course of treatment therein pursued toward them. This is not to be so much wondered at, when we reflect that it is within comparatively but a few years, that any other object than security has been deemed of much importance in institutions of this kind; the comfort and restoration of their pitiable inmates, having for ages, been almost entirely overlooked or disregarded. While insanity was considered as a mysterious affection of the immortal mind itself, resulting from some undefinable or supernatural cause—and its unhappy subjects were remorselessly consigned, hopeless of cure, to chains and a loathsome cell—there to exhaust their remaining energies in unheeded ravings; or, cut off from all the sympathies and kindness which render life desirable, to drag out a wretched existence sunk in deplorable idiocy—it is no wonder that with the thought of a mad house, were associated the feelings of horror and dismay. But now, that the origin of mental derangement has been identified with disease, similar in character with the other morbid affections of the physical structure, governed by like laws, and subject to the same curative treatment, the asylums for the insane, under the influence of an enlightened philanthropy, have been radically, and totally changed; and within the walls of every such institution, if properly conducted, are congregated not only the various resources of medical science and art, and every thing calculated to divert the mind from its erroneous associations, and give new vigor to its powers, but also all that needful care, decided control, and well directed kindness, which, owing to the perverted feelings, the sufferer rejects or can not appreciate while within the sphere of his own domestic circle; but which are generally accepted with thankfulness from the hands of a stranger, and contribute powerfully to ameliorate his distress and restore his health.

"With a belief of the correctness of these views, the duty becomes incumbent upon all to endeavor, whenever opportunity offers, to change the tone of popular feeling respecting the insane, and the places provided for their relief, and thus subserve the cause of suffering humanity, by removing a portion of the accumulated load of suffering which rests upon that afflicted portion of our fellow creatures."—

DEATHS.

It is with great sorrow, we are called on to announce the death of our estimable and affectionate friend and brother WILLIAM CUTTER HANSCOM. He died at Cambridgeport, on Wednesday, the 23d ult., aged 22 years and 10 months. His disease was a pulmonary consumption, with which he had been threatened for several years, and which causes him to suspend his ministerial labors six months ago. It will be recollected by many of our readers, that he removed from Newmarket, N. H., to the town of Waltham, Mass., in the month of August last, which he did in the hope that a relief from the labor of preparing sermons for the pulpit, might mitigate the alarming symptoms of consumption which he manifested. The removal, however, was in vain. He was able to preach only about ten Sundays, when he found his ministerial labors so difficult to perform, on account of disease, and so wasting to his little remaining strength, that he was obliged to abandon them, although he hoped it would be only for a season. He removed to Cambridgeport, for the purpose of making his residence in the family of Br. Ebenezer Whitmarsh, with whom he formerly boarded in Newmarket, and who had removed to Cambridgeport about the time that Br. Hanscom removed to Waltham.

It has been a severe trial to our feelings, to see this young man, this estimable brother, this eloquent preacher, this faithful pastor, wasting for the last six months under the fearful disease of which he at last died.—Very few can realize the anguish with which we saw from time to time this disease developing itself, and furnishing daily the most painful evidences that our friend must fall beneath its power. But the struggle is now past—his troubles are over—his body is committed to the earth—and his spirit has gone to God who gave it.

During the whole course of his sickness, Br. H. evinced the spirit of the Christian. He submitted to the will of God with resignation. He had a desire to live for the sake of a widowed mother, and that he might preach the unsearchable riches of Christ; but if God had determined that his work was finished, he said, in pleasing confidence, "thy will, O God, be done." We saw, in his case, a remarkable instance of the power of the doctrine of universal grace to sustain the soul when all earthly comforts fail. He trusted in his God; he had a strong confidence in the paternity of the divine character; a strong hope in the resurrection of the dead, that comforted him in the deepest of his tribulations.—His faith remained bright and vigorous unto the end.

When he found himself drawing near the close of life, he made the arrangements for his funeral with much composure. He designated the place where he desired his dust might be laid; he named the brethren whom he wished might perform the parts of his funeral service; selected the text to be preached from and the hymns to be sung. In faithful acquiescence to his wishes, the funeral services were performed on Friday, the 25th ult.

In Schreopel, Oswego county, May 27th, JANE, youngest daughter of Abraham and Christina Vanderpoel—aged six months. S. B.

In Perry, May 23d, of inflammation on the lungs, Mr. WM. SLAYTON, aged 23 years. He had just come from Springfield, on a visit to his friends. Funeral services by the writer. W. E. M.

In Groveland, Scott's Corners, May 11th, Mr. WM VIBBER, aged 38.

PROPOSALS

For publishing the Pittsburg Glad Tidings and Ladies' Universalist Magazine.

The character which the "Glad Tidings" has sustaintained, for nearly two years past, is well known to several thousand readers, and the constantly increasing patronage it is receiving, induces the publishers to believe, that it is well approbated, and prompts them to put forth new energies to increase its interest and value. Its character will not be changed, except, that one apartment will be adapted, especially, to the tastes of females, with a design to cultivate a desire for reading, and to elevate the mind to a knowledge of itself and the importance of the female station in society. The publishers believe, that a work of this kind is called for in the western country, and that it will be well supported.

To make the title of the paper more appropriate and expressive of our design, we have substituted Ladies' Universalist Magazine for "Ohio Universalist;" but we intend it shall continue as much "The Ohio Universalist" as it has been, heretofore.

In addition to our present numerous correspondents, we have the promise of contributions from some of the best female writers in the country, which can not fail to make our paper as interesting as those published towards the "rising of the sun."

In order that the mechanical execution may be equal to any work of the kind, the former proprietor has associated with him a gentleman who is a practical printer, who will take the entire charge of the printing department. This will insure neatness and punctuality.

Our friends have been unanimous, almost, in saying, our list could be doubled if the paper were published weekly. It will, henceforth, appear every week, instead of once in two weeks accompanied with a printed cover, at least once a quarter; and this, too, without any increase of price.

To all who have thus far assisted us, we tender our thanks—hoping they will one and all, continue their favors. S. A. DAVIS and S. BELDEN.

TERMS.

The Pittsburg Glad Tidings and Ladies' Universalist Magazine will be published every Saturday, on fine paper of medium size, quarto form, and afforded to mail and office subscribers as follows:—$2 per annum; or $1.50, if paid in advance, or within three months from the time of subscribing; or $2.50 cents at the end of the year. To city subscribers, who receive their papers by a carrier, $2 in advance; $2.50 after six months, or $3 at the end of the year. ☞ Agents or companies, paying for seven copies, shall receive the eighth copy gratis; and in the same proportion for a larger number.

No subscription received for less than a year, unless the money be paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the publishers. All communications should be directed to the Editor, Pittsburg, Pa., and, in all cases, post paid. or free, unless containing a remittance of $5 or more.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.

NUMBER FOURTEEN.

BY S. R. SMITH.

BIGOTRY OF UNBELIEVERS.

That state of mind which, without knowing particularly why, is inveterately and obstinately opposed to any and every thing not congenial with its own views, is called bigotry. And whoever exhibits the dislikes and prejudices of such a mind, is denominated a bigot. One of the most full and perfect illustrations of this unamiable character, is furnished by the Jews, as their history has come down to us in the New Testament. They appear to have considered every thing odious and detestable, which did not entirely quadrate with their own opinions and practices. And they carried this feeling to the extreme of hating even the persons of those who ventured to dissent from their own views. This was the prominent cause of the wide and marked distinction between themselves and other nations—and certainly of the unrelenting persecutions which they waged against the primitive Christians.

It is not extraordinary that persons who sincerely and devotedly believe in any system of religion, should become unreasonably tenacious of their own views, when they are supposed to involve their own and the best interests of other men. But it is a surprising fact, that those should ever fall into the lowest depths of bigotry, who turn all devotion into ridicule—who treat the Bible as a vulgar jest—the miracles of Jesus as the tricks of imposture, and morality itself as a mere matter of convenience. And yet, nothing is more common than this excess, in those who make no pretensions to religion. With them, it is an extravagant prejudice which fastens upon a theory that professes unbounded liberality. For skeptics avow an utter indifference to the place or form of truth, if so be that they can find it. And while they do not pretend to have made the discovery with certainty, they generally treat all religious opinions as untrue. Now this is bigotry, sheer, downright bigotry, under its worst form. And it has assumed a great variety of aspects, in the exercise of its might and influence over man. But in this case, it is wholly without excuse—without even the semblance of an apology. For it does not allow its victims to feel assured that even their own views of religion are right. They may suppose that all others are wrong—but they can scarcely feel confirmed in a system of universal doubt and uncertainty.

The man who sincerely believes, and who deeply and devoutly feels that his religious creed is true, and that it involves his own happiness or misery, and that of his fellow-men, has some apology for the tenacity with which he maintains his opinions, and for the prejudices which he cherishes against every deviation from his standard. He is at least sincere in the belief that he is right, and conscientious in the very dogmatism with which he assails the opinions of all other persons. Besides, his integrity will, in many instances, lead him to acts of real liberality. For as his confidence in the strength of his position is unbounded, it renders him fearless, and he will manfully, and in general, civilly—certainly with some degree of dignity—listen to the assertions and arguments of opposers. Every step that he has advanced in general knowledge—especially in the knowledge of men—will be visible in the degree of candor and charity with which he regards those who, in his estimation, have fallen into great and even dangerous errors. But this is not all: the Christian religion, under every form in which it has yet been believed, has never been so perverted or misunderstood as to lose the whole of its moral power. Its great and prominent requirements, have never been entirely overlooked. The command to have "compassion upon the ignorant, and them that are out of the way," has diffused an angel's benignity over many a fiery spirit, and shielded many a heretic from legal condemnation. It was this that gave the first effectual impulse to that mighty revolution of mind, which, in its progress, has given security to every sect, and expunged from the list of human enormities, the atrocious cruelties of the Inquisition. Civilization did it not—science and arts did not do it—commercial enterprize and intercourse did not accomplish this desirable work; and could they have effected so much, Greece, and Rome, and Egypt, and Chaldea, had granted to man the rights of conscience. The most indulgent and catholic, the least censorious and intolerant among men, is the enlightened and devoted Christian.

Skeptics and unbelievers affect to look with great abhorrence on the bigotry which they still think prevails among Christians—which sometimes prevents them from reading infidel publications. And they seem at a loss to find adequate terms in which to express their utter abomination of such unparallelled meanness. They are scandalized that beings claiming kindred with men, should feel so self-satisfied with their own opinions, and especially with the belief of the Gospel, as to overlook or reject the means which are proffered to dispel the charm of, what they are pleased to call, superstition. And they unceasingly ridicule and contemn the determination manifested by many, of discountenancing the propagation of infidelity through the press. They are indignant that skeptical or infidel works are not placed by the side of the defences of Christianity—that Hume and Gibbon do not always find a place with Lardner and Paley—that Volney, Voltaire, and Boulanger, are not found always in the company of Berkeley, Porteus, and Hallyburton—and that Paine and Palmer, are not side by side on the same shelf, with Watson, Leslie, and Jennings. Finally, they seem impatient that heads of families, of whatever creed, do not incline to substitute Taylor's Diegesis, or some yet more imbecile and indecent offspring of unbelief, as the household guide, instead of the Bible—or at least, as assistants in the direction of the mind of youth.

Now, that there is considerable bigotry among Christians, is undeniable—and that it may have sometimes become excessive in contemning infidel productions, is quite probable. But for a part of this, however offensive the fact may be, unbelievers must thank themselves. They have so often, so unnecessarily outraged the feelings of sober and sensible Christians, by treating their opinions with unbecoming and unfeeling levity, that charity has been turned into disgust. The institutions of Christianity have been made the theme of low punning and vulgar wit—the claims of the Bible to respect, and its doctrines and precepts to the veneration and acceptance of mankind, have been attacked with hollow and pitiful sophistry and sarcasm—the hopes of the resurrection, so soothing to the mourner, have been assailed as the dream of ignorance and fanaticism, and rendered the butt of scurrility and derision. These things neither admit of denial nor palliation. They have not been provoked, nor, in general, retaliated. Of all the men in this world, the patriarchs of infidelity have been most successful in imparting their own peculiar spirit to all their followers. For, from the "courtly smile" and "solemn sneer" of the leaders of the host, down to the lowest and foulest joke of the most ignorant pretender to skepticism, one spirit of congenial sarcasm pervades the whole. The finger of Omnipotence fixed not a deeper and more indelible mark upon Cain, than the genius of infidelity has impressed upon the mind of its votaries in every generation. Sarcasm, polished or rude, according to the skill of the person using it, is the alpha and omega of every skeptic in every argument—in every publication against Christianity.

In view of these facts, can the unbeliever wonder that there are those who do not, and who will not read his writings, or converse with him on religious subjects! The buffoon himself, has long since been driven from respectable society, and there is no reason why buffoonery should not be expelled, at least from all participation in the discussion of serious subjects. And the skeptic will do well to consider, whether what he terms bigotry in the Christian, be not, in reality, a very natural and a very proper disgust at the ill-timed and ill-mannered witticisms perpetually thrust into every discussion of Christianity! It is time that infidels understood that some respect is due to the opinions and the feelings of other men. And they have, by disregarding these, provoked both severity and contempt, of which they have no right to complain. But under every provocation, there is scarcely a work in defence of Christianity, which descends to the use of mere jesting in the conduct of the argument. Infidels have been answered on every position, in the most dignified and unexceptionable terms. And the balance of courtesy is a thousand-fold in favor of the Christian argument, notwithstanding the occasional severity with which it is tempered.

When men complain of the remissness or imperfections of others, it is fair to presume that they are not guilty in the same particulars themselves. How, then, stands the case, in the affair of bigotry between Christians and unbelievers? Are those who complain so much and so loud, of the bigotry of Christians, immaculate in this matter? Does their actual liberality keep pace with their profession? Do they examine the Bible, and are they careful to read the arguments of those who have written in defence of Christianity? And if they have done these things, how does it happen that they have never yet replied, and seem not likely to reply, to the labored and candid defences of divine revelation?

To these queries, and others of a kindred nature, there is but one answer—they have done none of these things, nor are they disposed to do them. All obligation to investigate the subject in controversy, seems to be supposed to lie on the side of the Christian. For unbelievers certainly excuse themselves from any very arduous labor of the kind. Some of their most daring champions have acknowledged that they wrote without being in possession of a Bible—and some others have given little evidence that they used one. And in a great majority of instances, where objections have been fastened upon some of its passages, it was effected by abstracting the particular text from the subject, and from the general scope of the inspired penman. One standing evidence that they do not examine the Scriptures for themselves, is in the fact that they adopt some favorite view of them, as the basis of every objection. This, they would not and could not do, were they to enter in earnest upon an investigation of the subject, and carefully compare the creed with the record of truth.

Another fact is deserving of notice. If, in the protracted controversy which has been carried on between believers and unbelievers, much attention had been paid by the latter to the Scriptures, we should somewhere be able to trace the indications of their industry, in their works. New views, new positions and arguments, new inferences, or the abandonment of some as untenable, which had been used in vain by others, would have been the natural, the unavoidable consequence. For the human mind never, in different ages and in a large number of individuals, pursues the same train of thought, or adopts, without variation, a given set of ideas. But there is no evidence of any material deviation from the beaten track, in all the works of unbelievers. They have followed each other both in matter and manner—raised the same objections, cracked the same jokes, and repeated the same laugh, with as much precision as a patent clock-making machine would turn off any given number of wheels of the same shape, size, and description. Let him who doubts the correctness of all this, turn his attention to the defences of Christianity and of the Bible, which have appeared at different times, and he will there discover traces of the most indefatigable industry. He will perceive that the field of vision has been opened and enlarged on every hand. What was weak and untenable, was conceded; while a long train of new and irrefragable arguments were accumulated and brought to bear upon the fabric of infidelity, with irresistible might.

And why has not an effort more worthy of intellectual beings, been made on the part of unbelievers? They do not mean that the subject is unworthy of some regard—they can not complain that they have, in all instances, been treated with unbecoming disrespect—and they will not pretend that some of those who have defended the authenticity of the Bible, are unworthy of an answer. They can scarcely believe that their objections were so formidable as to defy all attempts at reply—or that when themselves are attacked, they are invulnerable. And as they have alike disregarded the objections to their own theory, the defences of the Scriptures, and the Bible itself, we have a right to seek for the cause where it may most probably be found. They are in general unacquainted with the arguments of those who have published any thing in defence of a divine revelation. The sources whence the proofs of the authenticity of the Bible are drawn, are obviously unknown to the majority of infidel writers. Hence they neither see nor feel the difficulties and precariousness of their own situation, nor appreciate the amount of obstructions which lie in the way of their success.

And why is this? The answer will be best obtained by requesting an unbeliever to read the Bible, or any given work in vindication of its heaven-derived authority. Take Lardner's Credibility of the Gospel history, and it is too voluminous—they shall never find time to wade through its numerous and heavy quartos. Take the Minute Philosopher of Berkely, and they do not like the dialogue form—you may leave it, however, and if convenient, they may give it an examination. Thus the size is too great or too small—the style too stiff or too quaint and familiar—or they have not time or temper to perform the labor. They have no heart for such reading—no desire for better or further information on the subject—their collections of books never include those against infidelity, nor do their studies in one instance of a hundred, ever lead them beyond the pages of some favorite unbeliever.

And what is this?—what the name and character of this procedure? It is bigotry—the bigotry of infidelity. It is neither contempt of the works of Christians, nor disgust at the treatment they have received in the replies which have been made to their more prominent authors—for they know not what these really are. And the Bible, they have conceived a prejudice against it—they have no taste for its instructions, no confidence in its doctrines, no veneration for its precepts, no belief in its truth. Hence, while the unbeliever expects all others to show their liberality in reading his productions, he himself sits quietly down without attempting to convince the world of his own catholicism, except by a professed indifference to all religious opinions. If bigotry is disclosed by its influence—if illiberality is the index of its presence, and that illiberality precludes the examination of both sides of the question in controversy—then is there bigotry among infidels. And for the same reasons, there is more of bigotry in infidelity, than in Christianity; inasmuch as Christians know and answer every objection to the Scriptures.*

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.....NO. III

BY REV. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

"For in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert." ISAIAH XXXV: 6.

With our ideas of a desert, drawn from barren, rough places in our own land, this passage has no strength, or at least but little strength; but with the ideas which were in the mind of the prophet, it is vigorous and full of meaning.

There is a vast desert in Africa, called Zahara, composed of an endless ocean of sand, several hundred miles in extent. In the various accounts which travellers give of it, as well as of the desert of Arabia, it is described as most frightful. No shade to keep off the heat of the sun, it beats down upon the glowing sand with burning power, cracking and blistering the skin. When the winds sweep over this dreary surface of moveable sand, with scorching heat, and laden with fine particles, it forms the fatal simoon of the desert, which oftentimes produces sudden death, and has been known to swallow up whole caravans.—There is no considerable stream on this desert, and but very few springs, and those from four to eight and ten days' journey from each other. This dreary expanse could not be crossed were it not for the camel, which God has so constituted, that it can pass days without water. When a caravan is about to cross the desert, it provides sewed goat skins—these are filled with water, to supply them until they arrive at the first spring. But it sometimes happens, that when a caravan gets into the heart of the desert, it finds that the springs are dry. What a frightful condition! In the midst of burning sands, parched with raging thirst, days of travel from any water, their horses and camels failing in their strength, they could fully appreciate the worth of water, for the owner of the caravan would give all his wealth for one cup of it. But if while they sank in despair, their eyes rolled in terror, their hearts panted in fear, and thirst extreme and unmitigated, gnawed upon their vitals, streams should gush up around them, with cooling waters, to give them renewed energies to roll away towards the ocean, covering those sands with blooming fertility, how great their joy, how strong their gratitude, how full their pleasure, how ardent their returning hopes! Such was the desert to which the prophet alluded; and every person must discover the strength of the figure: "Then shall the lame man leap as a hart, and tongue of the dumb shall sing; for in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert. And the parched ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water.....And the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion, with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

The moral world, in the days of John the Baptist, might well be compared with the desert. It was so dry from the parching powers of sin, it was so swept by the wild winds of error, that men groped over its barren surface without any gushing springs of truth. And while looking upon the simoons of death, and hoping for some cooling waters to quell the faintness of the soul, in view of the gloom of the grave, men sank in despair and departed without hope. But the streams of truth burst out in that moral desert—an angel from heaven pointed the child of error to them—"Fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people, for unto you is born this day in the city of David, a Saviour"—Jesus came; he opened the full fountains of impartial grace, and lo, the glorious river of divine truth, whose streams of immortality, reconciliation, and religion, make glad the kingdom of heaven, burst forth and fertilized the heart. No sooner had an aged Simon beheld them, than he exclaimed, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation"—while Paul burst out in his rapturous song of triumph, "Thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." Multitudes pressed to the banks of that river, and while drinking from the pure and crystal stream which flows from beneath the threshold of the love of God; their hearts were filled with the flowers of justice, virtue, and benevolence; while in the pervading power of Christianity, as it spread forth among all nations, subduing the sinner and saving the ignorant, we perceive the fulfilment of the prophet's figure, "for in the wilderness waters will break out, and streams in the desert."

It is not in this case alone, however, that the allusion is fulfilled. When an individual looks upon the tomb and views it as the prison of the mind in annihilation; when he turns to his own heart and finds that it is thoroughly innoculated with vice, while reflection is guilt of conscience; or when an individual servilely fears his Creator, and when he casts his anxious eyes around his family, and views each well-beloved form, his soul shakes with affright, lest they may be separated from him through the limitless ages of eternity; surely we can say that they are in desert grounds; the thirst of vice and the hunger of error, whirl storms of sand over the happiness of the mind, and dry up its sources of refreshing consolation. But let the skeptic stand by the tomb from which the Lord of life emerges, radiant in all the honors of immortality; let the sinner hear the hallowed beseechings of his Saviour, and exclaim, "Lord, be merciful to me, a sinner;" let the fearing soul view the compassionate love of God, reaching all creatures; and they will find the waters of truth, which will wash away their unbelief, their sins and errors, remove every desert of doubt and ignorance, while they experience the truth of the Saviour's declaration, "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him, shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life."—John iv: 14.

"I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear; and anoint thy eyes with eye-salve, that thou mayest see." REV. iii: 18.

"Gold tried in the fire." When gold comes from the mines, it is not pure; but by the operation of fire, it is separated from every foreign substance. Our Saviour may have alluded to this fact, but the more probable allusion is, to the indissolubility of gold by common fire. An excellent writer on the mineral kingdom, remarks, that "a quantity of it [gold] has been kept for thirty weeks in a melted state, in a glass-house furnace, without the loss of a single grain, and without any change in its nature."—Penny Magazine, vol. iv, page 110.

"White raiment." There is no dress so pleasing and neat, or more an emblem of innocence, than pure white. Perhaps we can understand what our Saviour meant by white raiment, by reference to another place. Of the Saviour's bride, the Gospel, John says, "And to her was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white; for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints."—Rev. xix: 8. What allusion can be more striking.

By the gold is meant divine truth. From its very commencement, it has been perpetually tried in the fire. It was tried by the persecuting opposition of the Jews, by the fierce enmity of the Romans, by the cumbrous errors of the dark ages, and the determined fault-finding of skepticism; but it has not altered one grain; it has come out brighter from the fires of the crucible. We are counselled to buy this truth; for without it, though we may roll in the wealth of the earth, yet we are poor in a moral sense; but with truth, heavenly riches, we can be exempt from the poverties of error and death. But this is not all: when our eyes are weak, we see things as they are not; every object is clouded and distorted. So error clouds the mental vision; and through it, we can no more see truth, than a man can judge of a statue when his eye has almost lost its power. Therefore we must have the eye-salve of truth, to remove the disease of erroneous impressions, and to see God and his dear Son, as they are. We have something else, however, besides the gold and eye-salve of truth. We must put on the spotless white robes of righteousness; they are glorious garments to wear and to behold—made from the cloth of pure religion, washed in the purifying dews of benevolence and good works. How interesting they make an individual appear, because they adorn every natural grace of the heart, and make the creature lovely in the eyes of all. How excellently do the aged appear with such garments. As Solomon says, "The hoary head is a crown of glory, if it be found in the way of righteousness."—Prov. xvi: 31. Well was it said, "if it be found in the way of righteousness." For what sight is more chilling, than an old man with a white head, whose words are foul, whose conduct is impure and licentious? But what more excites respect, than age with virtue and pure words? Well might it be said, "the hoary head is a crown of glory, if it be found in the way of righteousness." The garments of righteousness make youth appear beautiful and interesting, and adorn every natural grace. We may think that the sight of a youth amid throngs of the gay, and full of pleasure, is an attracting sight; but there is one more attracting yet—it is that of a youth ministering to the wants of his parents, and smoothing their downward journey to the grave. In fact, the garments of righteousness make all people virtuous, and fill them with peace.

REFLECTIONS ON ANNIHILATION.

BY J. S. KIBBE.

Notwithstanding much has been said and written against this system of philosophy, (if philosophy it can be called,) which disclaims all revelation, and plunges the whole race of mankind into the pool of forgetfulness; yet, may I not be pardoned for offering a few reflections upon this subject. It is a system which has obtained some adherents in the world, and its advocates have made no small stir to render it popular, and have also endeavored to urge it upon the public, as a system of sound and philosophical reasonings.

Annihilation is the legitimate offspring of atheism, and they are so inseparably connected, that the one, in accordance with the common acceptation, is dependant on, and the natural result of the other. And since this seems to me to be the case, the reader will not be at a loss to understand the meaning, when either term is used, or a term which may signify both or either. Although this system may not have been destitute of advocates or votaries, either before or since the introduction of the Mosaic writings, and the prophecies, which the Jews received as containing the law and the testimony; or since the introduction of the teachings of Christ and the apostles, which the Christians did at the time, and do still receive, together with the writings forming the Old Testament, as containing both the law and the Gospel, and teaching the final destiny of all intelligent beings; nevertheless, since the days of the Messiah, it has had but few followers where the sacred writings are known and promulgated, in comparison with those who have received these writings as a revelation from God.

But the fact of its having but few adherents, does not prove it true or false—it only shows the singularity existing between this and most other systems, whether pertaining to the final destiny of man, or to matters of a different nature. And I think that I may safely say, that no notion or opinion, however absurd and ridiculous, (and especially such as relate to the ultimate end of mankind,) that has been proclaimed for half a century, as extensively as this, but can boast of more followers than this notion of the dreamless sleep of annihilation. So natural is it for the most of mankind to believe that there is a future state of existence, and that they shall live beyond the confines of the grave, that it seems to be of little consequence, with many, whether that existence shall result in the happiness of the whole human family, or in the misery of a large portion of it. For evidence of this fact, we need only look abroad in the earth upon the various systems and creeds growing out of the Christian religion, and we shall see it fully verified.

If our existence ends with this life—"if in this frame no deathless spirit dwells," or naught that shall survive the wreck of time—if we sink down into the tomb to rise no more—whence is this longing for immortality, this holy desire to live when time shall be no more, this happy thought that our existence shall be prolonged through eternity? Alas! the question I can not answer, and I leave it for those who may be wiser than myself. Now, why is this system held with such utter abhorrence by the generality of men—why does the mind shrink back and stand aghast at the thought of that eternal sleep which knows no waking? Is it not for this reason?—it robs mankind of the blessed hopes of immortality beyond the dark valley of death, without rendering, nay, without even promising them "an equivalent." Hence they look upon it with suspicion, and regard it as a system which, instead of yielding them peace and consolation, is calculated to render them more miserable; instead of lighting up the pathway of their earthly existence, is designed to destroy their fondest hopes, and scatter darkness and doubt in their way. For what does it offer to its votaries? or what does it hold out as an inducement for mankind to become acquainted with it? Ah! it promises as a compensation, to hurl the whole universe of intelligent beings into the gulf of oblivion. How different, yea, how widely different, is the result of this system from that which promises to the children of mortality, endless felicity in another mode of existence! Not a glow of radiance does it throw over the dark portals of the tomb; not a balm does it afford for the wound which death inflicts; not a ray of hope does it leave the afflicted mourner, when called to part with those whom he loves, and by whom he is beloved; not a loop is there left whereon is hung a beam of joy, springing from the bright anticipation, that when we shall have done with the things of time, and our bodies have gone to the place appointed for all living, we have immortal spirits, which are capable of enjoying endless fruition; but as we see our relatives sink into the cold embraces of death, and hear the last expiring groan, the thought comes rushing to the mind, that death is an eternal sleep, and that faint murmur is the last farewell! It is utterly impossible to conceive how a sentiment so uninviting, so repugnant to the desires of the human mind, should find a place in the bosom of a rational being. Mankind may become persuaded that there is no reality in their hopes of eternal life; they may become acquainted with all the wisdom and knowledge that this speculative philosophy can furnish, and their days will be spent in sighing that their wisdom had not revealed to them an object worthy the adoration of their exalted minds, and their nights in unavailing regret, that the knowledge of their philosophy should make cheerless the lives of its votaries. And to conclude, let me say, if the Christian religion is a fable—if the Christian's hope be a delusive dream, like the "flowery Arcada," which "exists but in the poet's" creative vision, or like radiant forms that flit through the imagination, let me surrender myself to it, soul and sense, and thus, beguiled by its blandishment, pass my days without an awakening. And may not the Christian be pardoned for deceiving himself with a dream (if a dream it is) which affords him so much pleasure and enjoyment?

A FRAGMENT.

Night gently spread her sable curtain over the landscape, and all was peace. Animate and inanimate creation seemed to welcome with silent gladness, the periodical return of the season for refreshment and repose. Application had exhausted the vigor of a mind, which too eagerly sought to bear the richest treasures from the storehouse of knowledge. The sacred volume unconsciously dropped from my hand, and a sweet revery absorbed my thoughts. Happy, indeed, said I, is he who walks in the counsels of this blessed Book. Wisdom and truth enlighten and enliven his pathway through life. A heavenly radiance encircles his youthful footsteps, brightens the joys of his manhood, and crowns his old age with the blessed consolations of the Gospel of peace. Oh! glorious source of immortal hope—fountain of unbounded joys!—I would that thy hallowed teachings were received and cherished in their primitive purity, in every heart—till affliction's last sigh shall be lost in rejoicing, and the triumph of truth be universal. But, hark! the solemn bell bursts upon the startled ear; that sound, once so welcome, so gladdening, but now no longer the harbinger of peace to the bosom of the disconsolate. Again the deafening peal sends its chilling influence through every fibre of sensation, and wakes to activity the last dormant energy. A voice seemed to whisper, "Go up thither." Hastily throwing my cloak about me, I joined the multitude which was congregated around that fount, from which naught flowed but the dark waters of bitterness. There was the aged father, with countenance swollen, and eye dimmed with grief. Here sat the decrepit mother, whose heaving bosom and half suppressed sighs, told the horror which filled her soul. And then arose the mingled groan, and the piercing shriek of frantic youth, adding new terrors to a scene already past description. Great God! I exclaimed, from the fulness of my heart, are these the followers of Him "who went about doing good"? Alas! far from it. The meek principles of Christianity abide not in the whirlwind and the tempest. No, they are seen in the kindly extended hand of relief to the suffering and the afflicted; they are heard in the soft whispers of peace to the troubled heart of the wretched and the despairing; they are felt in all the charities of life—changing the widow's grief into joy, and the orphan's lamentation to consolation and hope. Let these soul-cheering principles extend their genial influence through every land and every clime, until they shall ultimately bind up the bereaved heart, and wipe the last tear from the eye of anguish.

NEW MEETING-HOUSES.—The Universalist Society in Danby, are erecting a neat and commodious house, to be devoted to the worship of the true and living God.—The friends in Brimfield, O., are erecting a new meeting-house, which they expect to have completed and dedicated the present month.

NEW SOCIETIES.—A Universalist society was organized, a few weeks since, in Nassau, under very flattering prospects. They have raised funds sufficient to support preaching one-fourth part of the time. May the blessing of God attend them, and prosper them in their undertaking. A new society was also formed in Warsaw, on the 3d inst. Three new societies were formed under the ministration of Br. Beals, in the month of May, in Pa., viz: in Cassawago, North Chenango, Crawford county, and in Elk Creek, Erie county. Brs. Beals and Billings are laboring in that section with great success.

GENESIS III: 15

Br. VAN ALSTINE—In a recent number of the Magazine and Advocate, you have published an article relating to the above passage of Scripture, that does not accord with my views respecting it. I design, therefore, in the present article, to state my views, and the reasons for entertaining them; and to offer some strictures upon your article.—What I say will not be offered for the purpose of controversy, but, as you say, "to know, and to have known, the truth."

I am in the habit of referring to Gen. iii: 15, as teaching the sentiment that "the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." This sentiment you say is erroneous. I believe it is not. Now for the reasons.

The passage, you know, in the common version, reads thus. "And I will put enmity between thee and the woman; and between thy seed and her seed: it shall bruise thy head and thou shalt bruise his heel." You suppose that the pronoun it, in the phrase "it shall bruise thy head," refers to the enmity previously spoken of. And I confess that (laying the original aside) the supposition is a natural one. But the original term (hoo), though it will bear such a rendering, does not require it (nay, I think, forbids it) in this place. The Hebrew language has no neuter pronouns, and in their stead, it employs the masculine and feminine.—In this place the pronoun is masculine, and, I think, obviously refers to the seed of the woman.

Besides, the construction of the text seems to require that it be so understood. The two things placed in contrast or opposition, on each of which an injury was to be inflicted, are the serpent and the seed of the woman. And in the context, the seed of the woman was to bruise the serpent's head, and the serpent was to bruise his heel.—Each was to inflict an injury upon his antagonist, and each was to suffer an injury.

Now this construction is opposed to your view of the subject. You make the two antagonists to be the serpent and enmity. Hence while enmity is to bruise the serpent's head, the serpent must of course bruise enmity's heel! And how you could refer the pronoun in the phrase his heel to enmity, I know not. I think, Br., that you kept your eyes so firmly fixed on the word it, that you did not see the equally important term his. I think you will find it more difficult to refer the pronoun his to enmity, or to any thing else but to Jesus Christ, than to refer the pronoun it, to the seed of the woman.

Again, it is difficult to conceive how enmity, abstractly, could accomplish any thing towards bruising the head of the serpent, especially as half of that enmity must be supposed to belong to the serpent, being divided, according to the text, "between" the two. If you were to see a serpent winding itself around the neck of a beloved child, your enmity would arise; but it, of itself, could do nothing towards rescuing the child. And if it could, the enmity of the serpent, being equal to, would counteract the efforts of yours.

On the whole, is not the following the most natural and obvious construction of the passage?—1. The woman means Eve. Perhaps there was an allusion to the immediate mother of Jesus Christ. 2. The serpent represents the evil desires of the heart; or, in other words, "lust," by which James says "every man" (and I suppose he means every woman, not excepting mother Eve) is tempted, "when he is drawn away and enticed." See James i: 14. 3. The seed of the woman means Jesus Christ. You say you think it does not mean Christ; but you do not tell us whom it does mean. But to whom it could refer, except to Christ, I know not. It certainly refers to some noun in the masculine gender, for the masculine pronoun his is used. It must also refer to one person; for both the noun seed, and the pronoun his, are in the singular. "He saith not, and to seeds, as of many; but as of one, and to thy seed which is Christ." Have I not as much reason to infer (inspiration aside) that the seed of the woman is Christ, as Paul had that the seed of Abraham, was Christ? The language in both cases is the same. But if you can not allow sufficient importance to this reasoning, to admit that Christ was meant by the seed of the woman, will you have the goodness to inform me who was referred to? 4. The seed of the serpent is sin. "Lust, when it hath conceived bringeth forth sin." James i: 15. The offspring of the serpent therefore is sin. Wicked persons are also called the children of the devil. "Ye are of your father the devil, (said Christ to the Jews,) and the lusts of your father ye will do. He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own: for he is a liar and the father of it." John viii: 44. He also calls them serpents, and a generation of vipers. Matt. xxiii: 33. Wicked men, however, are not the natural, but the characteristic offspring of the serpent. The natural offspring is sin.

We will now show what is meant by the seed of the woman bruising the serpent's head. This language is used I think with reference to the manner sometimes observed (perhaps anciently more than now) in killing serpents, viz., by treading repeatedly upon their head with the heel.—The individual who should thus destroy a serpent, while brusing its head, would necessarily get his heel bruised in return. For illustration, let the following passages be considered. Paul says to the Romans, "And the God of peace shall bruise satan under your feet shortly." Our Saviour said to the seventy disciples, "Behold, I give unto you power to tread on serpents, and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy." Luke x: 19. The Lord Jesus came into the world to remove the cause, and all the consequences of sin. He came that "through death, he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil." Heb. ii: 14. By destroying the devil, he will of course destroy the works of the devil. See 1 John iii: 8. This is the work our Saviour came to perform, but in doing it, it became necessary that he himself should suffer. While bruising the serpent's head beneath his heel, his heel must of course be bruised in return.—Hence the prophet says, "it pleased the Lord to bruise him." The Lord was the first and primary cause of this act, as he is of all things; but the immediate cause was the serpent. If you object to this view of the subject, by saying that Christ could not bruise the head of the serpent, with his heel, so as to destroy him, I would reply that the serpent, alluded to in the text, was not Adam Clarke's ourang-outang; nor the Revelator's "red dragon with seven heads and ten horns." Nor was he so poisonous as to make it dangerous for Jesus Christ to attempt his destruction. With all his poison, the Saviour can overcome and destroy him. In this sentiment, Br. Van Alstine, you and I can rejoice together, though we differ as to the meaning of the text. I have offered my views and you have offered yours. I have pointed out wherein I think you err. Please do the same to me. Or if you prefer to let the subject drop, let it drop. Yours in the bonds of the Gospel.

A WORD ABOUT GOING TO CHURCH.

Reader, did you ever go two or three miles to church, and after sitting an hour or more, waiting for the minister, learn that he was not coming?—and how did you feel about it? Were you pleased, and satisfied, and good-natured? No; but you were sadly disappointed, rather out of patience, and more than half resolved not to go to church the next Sabbath. Well, suppose you were to go three and four Sabbaths, and no preacher came, would you not be discouraged, and accuse him of unfaithfulness to the charge committed to his trust? But if his only excuse should be the weather—it was too hot or too cold, too wet or too dry; or that he had labored so hard during the week, that he wished to stay at home and rest—would not your wrath wax hot, so much so, as to dismiss him immediately? Yes; and methinks, ten chances to one if you did not leave off church-going entirely.

My friends, do you ever think of these things when the Sabbath comes, and you neglect the temple of praise and thanksgiving? These are plain, simple facts, and such is the situation in which he who ministers in "sacred things" at the altar dedicated to the worship of the living God, finds himself too often placed. Regularly and statedly, rain or shine, Sabbath after Sabbath, he repairs to the church, where he expects to be met, and encouraged, and sustained, and cheered by his brethren and friends; but how often are the seats unfilled, and he subjected to the mortification of wasting his energy, time, and talents, upon naked walls. How discouraging to a man of refined feelings! how palsying to a noble nature! how mortifying to a good heart!—one that has felt the redeeming influence of the Gospel, and believes it the grand panacea of man's moral nature, which is destined to exalt and assimilate it to the perfection of angels. But he must not complain, though "subject to like passions as other men," for people do not like to be found fault with, when they pay the preacher, whether they go to meeting or not. How self-sufficient we poor mortals are! We may freely express our opinion of his conduct, but if he presume to reciprocate the favor, we are not always quite so well pleased with it. Brother, it is not enough that you pay your preacher—you may give him ten thousand dollars a year, and neither benefit yourself nor your neighbors. It is your good practice, your faithful example, your steadfast zeal, your regular attendance upon his ministrations, that will support him, benefit you and your children, and spread the knowledge of the Gospel. If we give to religion only a "lip-service," and have no life corresponding thereunto, of what avail is it to a wanting, sin-suffering world? Watch, then, and be faithful, lest vice and immorality, and infidelity, shall be emboldened and encouraged by your inactivity. If Christians slumber, unbelievers will awake—shall Christian apathy, then, be their watchword? Please think of these things, good reader, and if they profit you, perchance at some future time, you may hear again from a SISTER.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;

ROMANS XII: 1-16.

The student of the New Testament, when engaged in endeavoring to understand the epistles, should always ascertain what were the circumstances of the people or persons written to, for what purpose, and upon what occasion the epistle was written; for without an acquaintance with these, the letter must be unintelligible—equally so with some of the "dead letters" at the post-office general. Indeed, ignorance of these things is the chief cause of obscurity in these ancient writings, a principal cause of the erroneous interpretations which have been given of them, and also, of such errors finding any reception among religious inquirers.

The importance of an acquaintance with these circumstances is chiefly demonstrable in what is called the argumentative or doctrinal portion of the epistles. But, it were easy also, to produce, from what is called the practical portion of these apostolic letters, instances of passages which can not be comprehended as originally intended without a knowledge of the circumstances of the people addressed. As the greater part of the passages selected for meditation and illustration, during the remainder of this year, are taken from the practical portion of the apostolic epistles, we would recommend our fellow-inquirers after scriptural truth to employ all the research in their power to come to the knowledge of the circumstances of the people written to. They will be rewarded for their trouble by the additional intelligibility and interest which the epistle, or any detached portion of it, will assume after making such an investigation successfully.—We would refer the reader for the results of such an investigation to the 7th volume of this paper, pp. 218-220.

It will have been observed by every attentive reader of Paul's epistles, that he usually divides them into the argumentative and practical departments which we have above noticed. The latter portions are generally much more easily understood having less reference to the peculiar state of opinion or sentiment among those addressed; and on this account, also, are more generally applicable to us and all Christian disciples. Accordingly, our remaining selections are chiefly from the practical department of the epistles.

The practical portion of the epistle to the Romans commences with the 12th chapter, and it may be observed that the conjunction, therefore, in verse 1 shows that there is a connexion between this and the former or argumentative portion of the letter.

Verses 1, 2. The meaning of these two verses appears to be this: "I have now endeavored to show you that the new revelation from God by Jesus Christ is a free unmerited gift to all mankind, to all, Jew or Gentile, and that it is an highly excellent gift, inasmuch as it contains motives sufficient to turn all men from the practice of wrong-doing, and make them love and practice universal holiness or virtue—inasmuch as it presents to all men, in the hour of trial, persecution, and temptation, ample encouragement and consolation; and inasmuch as it is evident that, though the Jews as a nation are for the present rejected from their previous covenant condition, they are yet to be restored. Seeing, therefore, these compassionate kindnesses of God to all of you, whether ye be Jews or Gentiles, I beseech you to show your gratitude for such a gift, by making an offering, not as ye have been wont, of various animals, but of your own selves, body and soul, to God, to forward his will, and his plans in the world. This offering will be more sacred, more well-pleasing to God than any sacrifices you have formerly offered, as well as more rational than your former mode of worship. And as a farther proof of gratitude for this great gift, allow not yourselves to be conformed to the present manners which are exceedingly corrupt, both among Jews and Gentiles, but be changed men by exercising your understandings so as to perceive and approve that the will of God, in his requisitions, is really good, really agreeable to our nature, and calculated to carry you from one degree of perfection unto another." Our gratitude can not show itself in any better way.

Verses 3-8. These verses are occupied with exhortations to a discreet use of the various talents, natural or extraordinary, which each of them possessed. We have now, no supernatural powers; but these verses may remind us that we have individual and distinct spheres of usefulness, and these to understand and employ ourselves in, enables us to fulfil the purposes of our earthly being, to communicate and enjoy the largest share of happiness possible. Were any one sincerely desirous to know his proper sphere of exertion, to ask me how he was to discover it, I should answer him in the words of Fox—"Search your own hearts; know yourselves, your capabilities and tendencies; study your relations to society, and the view will open upon your soul, and your path be as the light." I would caution him against vain regrets and vain wishes. "O! the vanity of spending life in wishing for that which can not be realized, and battling with that which can not be vanquished. How many are ever aiming at that which they can not be, and neglecting that which they might be! What would not the slave do, if he were but master; and the poor, if he had but wealth; and the circumscribed, if he had but extended influence? As if slavery, and poverty, and circumscription, and obscurity, had not their mission for scattering most precious blessings among those about them, to be measured back into their own bosoms." There is, on this subject, an excellent article in Bulwer's "Student."

Verses. 9-16. These verses are occupied with exhortations to the practice of various Christian virtues. These may be considered an amplification or illustration of what the apostle intended in his general direction in verses 1 and 2. Were Paul addressing us and employing the English language, these verses might probably have been written thus:—"Let your professions of kindness be without flattery or false compliment. With equal firmness, abhor all that is evil, and cleave to all that is good. Let your affection for each other be ardent as that of brother to brother.* Let each of you strive to outdo his brethren in mutual respect. In whatever business you are engaged, be not backward to diligence, but let activity of spirit characterize you, and a discreet availing yourselves of opportunities.† Instead of indulging in enervating dejection, let a hopeful confidence inspire you with cheerful activity; even in tribulation be patient and yield not to despair.—Maintain, in aid of these moods of mind, an ever-prayerful spirit. Relieve the brethren in their necessities, and be prone to hospitality. To those who rail at you or persecute you return good words; give good words and curse not. Envy not the prosperous, but rejoice at their successes; endeavor to relieve the sorrows of the afflicted, having the same disposition towards others as to yourselves. Covet not elevated stations, or the company of the great, but condescend with men of lowly minds, who are 'weaned from the world.' Be not puffed up with a conceit of superior wisdom." Such, we think, might have been the language of Paul had he written in our language, and at the present day. Let us think of these things.

P. P.

*"Love a brother Christian with the affection o a natural brother.—WAKEFIELD."

†A very small variation in spelling the Greek word makes the difference between the common version—"serving the Lord"—and the present—"serving yourselves of the opportunity." The latter appears the most suitable to what precedes and therefore we agree with Mill, Classius, Wakefield, and others who think the latter the original reading. P. P

MINUTES

Of the proceedings of the Mohawk River Association of Universalists, for 1838.

Met in Eatonville, Herkimer county, on June 13th. Appointed Br. POTTER, Moderator, Brs. WHISTON and ASPINWALL, Clerks, and Brs. Waggoner, Eaton and Arnold, a committee on public services. Ministering brethren were invited to take part in the deliberations of the Council.

2. Heard the report of the committee on discipline for last year. No cause of complaint.

3. Appointed Brs. Potter, Waggoner, and Aspinwall a committee on fellowship and ordination. Brs. N. Dibble, L. Eaton, and J. A. Aspinwall, a committee on discipline for the ensuing year—and Br. J. A. Aspinwall, ministerial, and S. Coe, N. Dibble, laymen, delegates to the next State Convention, with power to appoint substitutes and fill vacancies.

4. Voted, That Brs. Marsh and Dibble of Salisbury, and Brs. Weden and Keeler, Middleville, be invited to take seats in this council.

5. Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to inquire and report whether any minister, holding the fellowship of this Association, has neglected to perform his public ministerial duties.

6. Appointed Brs. J. Golden, L. Eaton, and C. Johnson, said committee. Reported that John B. Wakeman has neglected to preach for the last three or four years.

7. Whereas, It appears from the above report, that the said J. B. Wakeman, in omitting the public duties of the preacher of the Gospel, has violated the constitution of this Association: Therefore,

Resolved, That he be no longer considered in fellowship with this body.

8. The following preamble and resolution in accordance with the recommendation of the last New-York State Convention, was unanimously adopted.

Whereas, In some cases, letters of fellowship have been granted to persons whose moral characters were not sufficiently known, or who could not preach to the acceptance of any of our societies: Therefore,

Resolved, That candidates wishing the fellowship of this Association, be required to signify their intention to preach, which intention shall be entered on the minutes, or otherwise published, if thought proper; and that the committee on fellowship be required to ascertain that the candidate has preached and conducted to the acceptance of the people among whom he has labored, and possesses a good moral character, before they report in favor of granting him a letter of fellowship at a subsequent session of this Association.

9. Appointed Br. Aspinwall to preach the next occasional sermon, with power to appoint a substitute.

10. Voted, That Br. Aspinwall prepare the Minutes for publication, accompanied with such remarks as he may deem expedient.

11. Adjourned to meet in Salisbury, Herkimer county, on the second Wednesday and Thursday in June, 1839. J. POTTER, Moderator.

O. WHISTON, J. A. ASPINWALL, } Clerks.

Sermons were preached by Brs. Boden, C. S. Brown, Belding, Roberts, Whiston, Aspinwall and Potter.—Addresses by Br. Potter.

LAY DELEGATES PRESENT.—D. Brayton, J. Golden, L. Eaton, Eatonville; E. Kibbe, J. Parshall, Oppenheim and Manheim.

MINISTERING BRETHREN PRESENT.—J. Potter, O. Whiston, and J. Boden, Cooperstown—C. S. Brown, Upper Lisle—J. D. Hicks, Springfield—H. Belding, Fort Plain—W. H. Waggoner, Watertown—J. A. Aspinwall, Leyden—O. Roberts, Lakeville—W. Wilcox, Sand Lake—A. R. Bartlett, Utica.

REMARKS.—I think I but speak the minds and feelings of all present upon this anniversary of the Mohawk River Association, that it was an interesting and joyful occasion. The preaching was generally well adapted to the wants of the people, and listened to with much apparent interest and sincerity; and we have much reason to belive it will result in good to the upbuilding of Zion's kingdom in that region. Harmony and good will characterized all the proceedings in council. We have only one thing to regret; and that is, the different societies in this Association were not all careful to send delegates to represent them in this body. This is wrong. We confidently hope that a similar remissness on the part of societies will not again be a subject of regret. Per order. J. A. ASPINWALL.

SPIRITUALITY OF THE GOSPEL....NO. I

Amid the altars of the heathen and the symbols of the Jew, the Gospel appeared with its pure and spiritual system. Rejecting the complicated mysteries of the one, and the burdensome ceremonials of the other, it proclaimed religion, to be a matter and exercise of the heart. It removed the veiled and outward, and revealed the true glory. It exhibited its precepts as pure and vital—widely different from the external though splendid religion of the Greek and the Roman, and the cold, lifeless formality of the carnal Pharisee! The mythology of the first, distracting and intricate in its teachings, with the goodness and the materiality of its worship, had no power to ennoble the soul—to enlighten and lift it up in the proper sphere of its action; and the ritual law of the other, although, at the time of its dispensation and operation and in its original and proper form, wisely instituted, was not calculated for the enlarged mind—was not fitted to be the guide and instructor of the soul forever. But the teachings of the Gospel were moral teachings, addressing the moral sentiments—instructing man of his destiny and his duty—removing his eyes from the perceptible and the palpable, to the immortal and the spiritual.

To the Samaritan woman Jesus said—"the hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain nor yet at Jerusalem worship the Father."

"But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth." In the sermon on the mount, he teaches the spirituality of his doctrine, also. He came "not to destroy the law and the prophets, but to fulfil." The righteousness of his disciples must "exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees." The ritual law, was the letter—the moral law, the spirit. To use an illustration—the Mosaic law was the body, discovering the motions and intentions of the soul by outward signs; the Gospel was that soul itself, casting aside the fleshly frame-work of ordinances and existing in its own lofty, independent and immaculate grandeur.

Christianity, it is true, is doctrinal; that is, it has its articles of belief, the reception of which is necessary to constitute an individual a Christian; but the mere assent to these articles will not. They are not to be merely gazed at abstractly, with the cold, hard eye of speculation. The heart must be opened to them, and then its depths will warm, and expand and vivify under their blessed influences.

For instance—Christianity, like all other systems of religion, acknowledges the existence of a Great First Cause. But this truth viewed through the medium of the Gospel, is eminently calculated to have a quickening and an energizing effect upon the heart of the disciple. We are told, that the Athenians, afraid of omitting any, reared altars to unknown gods. And the doctrine of an Intelligent, Self-Existent Creator, appears to have been received, if received at all, by them, with the same heartless apathy with which they received doctrines concerning other "strange gods." Hence, when Paul addressed them from Mar's Hill, the truth which he uttered gushed upon them like some supernatural light, dazzling them with its sudden and superior brightness. How hollow and formal were the teachings of their religion, compared with the interesting and soul-cheering truths presented by the apostle! Classic, and beautiful, and time-hallowed, the drapery of their mythology was calculated to please the taste, attract the eye, and to excite superstitious and prejudiced veneration—but when the great missionary of the truth had torn it aside, how artificial and unsatisfying was it, contrasted with the glorious reality which he revealed!—Why did they decorate their temples, and ornament their victims, and pour their libations? Were these calculated to have that deep and beneficial operation which the spiritual nature of man truly needs? No!—and the apostle told them, that God, the true and only object of adoration, "dwelleth not in temples made with hands; neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed any thing, seeing he giveth to all life, and breath, and all things; and hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed and the bounds of their habitation." But let our readers turn to the seventeenth chapter of the Acts, and read the whole of that eloquent oration, and behold the simplicity and yet the loftiness and spirituality of its doctrines. Had the assemblage which listened to Paul admitted and acted upon these truths, they would have removed every adored statue from its station. And had they done more, and permitted these truths to beam full upon their hearts, what penitence for sin, what exultation, what throbs of gratitude would have been theirs! So vast was the difference in effect, between the doctrine of a Creator taught by the Gospel, and the same idea (though exhibited as acting by various divinities) when presented by the heathen mythology! If we would be followers of Jesus, we must believe, surely, in the existence of the Supreme Being—but we can not rest in a mere speculative belief. With such a vague knowledge of Him—an assent of the intellect, merely, we might properly inscribe upon our hearts—"To the unknown God!"—But the Gospel in declaring His existence, says—"In Him we live, and move, and have our being"—it reveals to us duties to be performed towards Him and our fellow-men, which spring from the very fact of His existence.

Again—Christianity professes to be a revelation from God. In order that it may have its full effect upon us—in order to be fully a Christian, it is essential to believe this. But if from an examination of its external evidences we are convinced of its truth—or from a course of philosophic reasoning discover its purity and its adaptation to human nature, and here rest, giving the assent of our understanding merely to these, we are not Christians. We must, if we would follow its dictates, as rational and obedient creatures, unlock and open our souls, not only to the intellectual authority of these truths, but the full tide of their spiritual influences. What are the characteristics of some of its claims to divine origin? Its miracles—are they slight of hand exhibitions—do they look like jugglery? Oh! no—they are invested with an originality, and were performed in such an unceremonious and open manner, that they are distinguished, as the light from the darkness, from the silly and puerile tricks done, or pretended to have been done, by schemers or impostors. And then its precepts speak to us as having authority, and not like the creeds of men. They are no complicated revelations. They shew that they could but have proceeded from the Author of nature, from their similarity to natural objects—they are simple yet inimitable, like the blue heaven or the sunshine. The system of the Hindoo rears gorgeous temples, and makes innumerable idols, and its worship is abject and mysterious. There the mother unnaturally abandons her infant to the mercy of the waters. There flames the funeral pile, wrapping the living with the dead in one horrible conflagration. There rolls the dreadful car, crushing out the life-blood of deluded thousands. The doctrines of the Arabian impostor, are vividly embellished, agreeably to the impulses of an eastern taste, and with all the gorgeousness of an eastern imagination. And examine and see what sensual and vitiated ideas are in his religion! Now these two great systems are calculated to bewilder, and confound, and terrify, or to dazzle and excite wonder. But how pure, how plain, how instructive are the teachings of Jesus! By contrasting his religion with others, we have its peculiarities thrown in clear light—we discover its special and original claims. And some of those very claims—its miracles and its precepts, are evidences in their very nature for the Divine authority of the Gospel.

We may see, then, by these things, that while it is necessary, in order to be Christians, that we should believe in the divine origin of the religion of Christ, the very reception of that belief, involves with it and imparts to us, a requirement to open the heart to its instructions. That is, we believe Christianity to be truth from Heaven, and, aided by external evidences, we receive it on account of its purity and spirituality. It is these which have appealed to our souls, and found there an acknowledgment of their celestial power; and this same appeal bore with it a deep call to duty.

Christianity is doctrinal, therefore, because, before we can become one of its disciples, we must believe it to be a revelation from God. It is doctrinal, also, because it requires a belief in the existence of a Supreme Being. And we might proceed and take others of the essential doctrines of Christianity for illustration, but we have used enough for our purpose, which was to show the spirituality of the Gospel. We say, then, it is doctrinal, but all its doctrines are of practical efficacy. This we have seen. They are not used merely to build up and support a system—they are not used for tinsel and ornament, for pomp and show, for mysteries to terrify and bewilder. They have an application to the soul, and all rituals but dimly shadow forth the worship and the exercises required of that. It exhibits to mankind, certain great truths—it calls upon every one to believe them—but this is not all. Our moral nature as well as our intellectual, must be instructed. Then we shall learn, that although these doctrines are few and simple in our first survey of them, they are connected with vast results—with high destinies. They call up innumerable and blessed associations—they unveil to the spiritual vision, things hidden from the physical eye, and they move and set in operation, holy and powerful energies—all the good that humanity is capable of performing. They are not, as they appear to the distant and indifferent, twinkling orbs set to beautify and adorn—but radiant suns, which kindle where they shine, and enlighten and vivify worlds, and systems of wonder and of beauty inexpressible!

LOVE THY NEIGHBOR.

"Who is my neighbor?"—Luke x: 29.

This was thought to be a very important question by the Jews, and still more so by the lawyer, by whom it was propounded. He had, like all the Jews, been taught to believe that none were his neighbors but those who believed in the Jewish religion. And, accordingly, when Jesus told him to love his neighbor as himself, he attempted to "justify himself," by saying, "who is my neighbor?" meaning thereby to intimate, that he did love all those who were entitled to that appellation.

But the Jews are not the only people who have attempted to restrict the application of that term. Some people have an idea that none are their neighbors, but those who have rendered them some important service; and hence all their liberality is expended upon those who can do very well without it. They will assist the wealthy, study to anticipate their wants, and to surprise them by the munificence of their presents. This would be well enough, if they did not stop here. But the wants of the poor man, who has never conferred a favor upon them, and, indeed, who has never been able to, are disregarded. They seem to forget that he is their neighbor.

There are, also, among religionists, a class of men who regard none as neighbors, who disagree with them in matters of faith. They love their brethren in the church, it is true, but those who are out of the church they hesitate not to slander and abuse most bitterly.—But do they not in so doing, regard those most, who, themselves being judges, least need it. We shall see. They believe that those generally who are within the "pale of the church" are heirs to immortal felicity, and perfectly safe, so long as they continue in the faith, both as it regards their temporal and eternal welfare.—While on the contrary, those who can not adopt their sentiments, they consider liable to the most excruciating torture and unmitigated wo. Now, although the last mentioned dogma is inadmissible, still I must say, that if they are sincere in their belief, they ought to consider the latter class of men as equally their neighbors, and to manifest in their works, more love for them, than for the former. Although they should love all alike, there is more room for the exercise of that love with sinners than with saints. However, I that Partialists believe have some good reasons for confining their love and pity to their own denomination; viz. because they are the most unfortunate, and require more temporal consolation, to make up for what they lack in the spiritual.

But these errors, these discrepancies between theory and practice are owing to a misunderstanding of the question, "Who is my neighbor?" All are willing to admit that those whom they love, are neighbors in the scriptural sense. But this is not enough. All men are our neighbors. The poor and the rich, the saint and the sinner, the benefactor and the oppressor—all are entitled to our love. True, they require different modes of treatment, but it must all be given in love. If we censure, it should be given in tones of Christian kindness; if we commend, it should be in sincerity, and with a desire to encourage the deserving, and not for the sake of flattering.

But if we will give heed to the answer which our Saviour gave to this question, we shall discover a very important truth. From the earnestness of manner, with which our blessed Lord enforced the observance of the second great commandment, I am inclined to think that he meant to teach us, that the unfortunate and friendless are in a special manner our neighbors.

Let me exhort my brethren, then, to ponder well the answer of Jesus to the lawyer's question, especially, the latter part of it—"go thou, and do likewise."

If all men are our neighbors, and we are bound to love our neighbor as ourselves, can mankind yield obedience to the commandments of the Saviour, and at the same time be happy in the belief that one soul will be eternally lost? If it be answered, that men are happy in that belief, is not that happiness a positive proof that its subjects are not Christians? inasmuch as they do not comply with the commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

But if it be answered, that the Christian is miserable in view of the consequences of his faith, does it not follow, either, that the Christian will always be miserable, or that all will be restored to happiness, or that all will cease to be Christians, by ceasing to love their neighbors as themselves. "I pause for a reply."

ERROR THE CAUSE OF IMPIETY

Go to the disobedient and erring child who believes his parent to be a severe, capricious being—who deems that in his father's bosom there is no love, no affection for himself, and who, therefore, has despised the paternal laws, grown weary and dissatisfied with his home, and has wandered away in guilt and shame—go to this weary and wandering son of humanity, while all these errors press upon his mind, and beseech him to return again to his parent's roof and government, without removing the errors that drove him away—and will he do it? No—he is too cold and dead to every sentiment of affection for such a parent—too hateful to such a government, soon to return. Perhaps, as with the Prodigal Son, he may remember the bread, and, driven by famine, may return for the sake of the food which his parent can bestow. But this is not returning in joy and gladness—coming before the parent with praise and singing.

Precisely so, I conceive it to be with the sinner. He has mistaken the character and the government of God. He has deemed God to be stern and cruel, his government to be a selfish despotism, and has believed he could do better for himself. Now, before you can induce him to return joyfully and gladly, you must remove the errors which drove him away—you must convince him that God is his best friend, and that the divine government is his best preserver from misery and ruin. Go, tell him of the goodness of God—assure him that God is now, ever was, and ever will be his Creator and Parent—that he is, though strayed, still a sheep of the Great Shepherd's pasture. Call to him, "Enter into God's courts with thanksgiving, and into his gates with praise; be thankful unto him, and bless his name: for the Lord is good; his mercy is everlasting, and his truth endureth to all generations." Convince the sinner of this message, and you touch his heart with penitence, and melt it into love—and you draw him by the silken cord of affection and self-interest, to the courts of God. For he now feels the delightful emotion of gratitude—he now knows how sweet it is to praise God—he now knows God as he is, and his government like unto himself. Yes, God is good—the earth is full of his riches—all ages overflow with his grace, and all seasons with his bounty. Even the ills and afflictions of life, are but blessings in disguise—bitter buds which shall bloom in sweetest fragrance, and ripen into richest fruit. And his mercy is everlasting. Forty-two times is this assertion made in the Bible—eight times is it declared that God's anger, wrath, etc., shall not endure forever, or be everlasting—and never is it once written, in the whole Book, that his wrath, anger, fury, vengeance, etc., shall endure forever. Why, then, if God has not revealed everlasting wrath, should we preach it to sinners? If he has eight times declared it shall not be forever, shall we say God has erred eight times, by asserting that it will last forever? And if God has forty-two times revealed everlasting mercy to sinners, shall we not preach to them the same? My friends, we may talk about demoralizing sentiments as much as we please, yet God is wiser, and knows better what will reform sinners, than we do—and if he has revealed everlasting mercy, impartial grace, and universal goodness, I will preach it. What God reveals to man, is surely best for man to know. And God's truth endureth to all generations. He never changes, nor does his truth. He has given us eternal life in Christ before we existed, save in his purpose, and all we can do, can never make the record false nor God unfaithful.

Let, then, the wandering sinner no longer stay away because he deems his heirship gone, and his sonship lost—but let him return to our God, and he will abundantly pardon and bless him.

NEW VOLUMES.

The Trumpet commenced its Eleventh Volume last Saturday—ably edited, and well supported by some of the best writers in our order as correspondents, as well as handsomely executed, it is an able and valuable co-worker in the cause of truth, and deserves a steadily increasing patronage from the public.

The Knickerbocker, decidedly the best monthly in the United States, if not in the world, commences a new volume next month. Subscribers had better commence now—if they can afford to get some of the back volumes, their money will be well laid out—if not, let such as need such a work, not delay till the future becomes the past. Such a monthly visitor is doubly welcome when it comes in season. Clark and Edson, publishers, New-York.

The Lady's Book, published by L. A. Godey, of Philadelphia, an excellent work, specially devoted to the fair sex, is also worthy of patronage. Let any gentleman who wishes to furnish a sister, or wife, or daughter with a constantly recurring Souvenir, send her a periodical of this kind. If this is his choice, Mrs. Hale, Miss Leslie, and Miss Sedgwick, the fair Editors, will see that his taste is not rendered questionable with the fair reader.

A. B. G.

ELY AND THOMAS.

The theological discussion between these gentlemen, though widely circulated by being published in many of our periodicals and in the Philadelphian, has already passed through four editions in the book form. A fifth edition is now published by Br. Price, of New-York, and we anticipate for it a ready sale. It is the best, most candid and temperate discussion of human destiny, that has ever yet appeared from the press, and no man who feels an interest in either side of the question, should neglect to peruse it. He will find much to instruct and entertain, and nothing to offend his literary or religious taste and feelings. No theological library should be without it—no Universalist family has done its duty to its reading members, that has not provided a copy for their perusal, and for the perusal of their Partialist friends and neighbors. Let all who can, buy and peruse a copy—even those who read it some years ago, can read it again with pleasure and profit. I know some who declare they have read it several times with much satisfaction. It is, and long will be, a standard work in our denomination.

A DISCOURSE ON DUELLING,

Is the title of a sermon, written at the request of his friends, by Rev. I. D. Williamson, and now for sale at this office. The abominable and disgraceful practice of duelling, is met with boldness, and its reckless defiance of the laws of God, exposed with clearness and decision. The infamous advocates of this crime, (and certainly those are its advocates who practice it,) deserve to be held up to the contempt of a virtuous public, wherever they go—not even the halls of Congress should screen them from the odium which they deserve. They have dared to violate the express declaration of the divine Ruler, "Thou shalt not kill"; and let those who are anxious for the spread of righteousness, brand the criminals with merited infamy.

The exertions of those concerned in the late affair at Washington, to stifle popular inquiry, should determine every follower of Jesus, and every lover of his country, to be still more diligent in his opposition to duelling. And the attempt which they have made to justify themselves, by the plea that public opinion has compelled them to commit a cool-blooded murder—this circumstance alone, should arouse the public to haunt the aggressor with the spectre of his own contemptible character, until he shall see and abhor the evil of his ways. Let those, then, who are determined to expel this dreadful practice from the land, procure the above named discourse—ponder it well—see that they do not give the indirect countenance to duelling therein portrayed—and let them circulate it freely. It can not but have a beneficial tendency.

RETURN HOME.

After an absence of three weeks, during which (accompanied by Mrs. Grosh) I visited Oswego, Lewiston, Niagara Falls, Buffalo, and went as far as Mayville, in Chautauque county, I have returned home by Batavia, Avon, Auburn, etc., and find my family in usual health. Of the doings of the Niagara and Genesee Associations, and of the prospects of our cause in the western part of the State, our readers may expect to hear at another time. At present, many matters engage my attention—letters, business, etc. All shall be brought up "square" in due time.

UTICA BEREAN INSTITUTE.

TO THE PUBLIC.

The managers and members of the Berean Society, respectfully solicit your attendance on the evening of Tuesday, 3d July, when the following question will be discussed:—

Would the immediate abolition of slavery in the Southern States, be a benefit to the Union?

Affirmative—Messrs. HALLOCK and MCADAM
Negative—Messrs. YOUNG and MARSH.

"VOICE TO YOUTH."

We are now prepared to furnish any quantity of this excellent work, in various kinds of binding, to suit the taste of purchasers. We presume all who have perused the last and present volumes of the Magazine and Advocate, agree with us that the "Voice to Youth" ought to be in the hands of every young lady and gentleman. If so, will they please recommend the work to their friends who have not perused it? Even those who have perused it in the paper, will find it very convenient for their libraries in a volume by itself.

We have put some up in handsome morocco, with gilt edges, for the accommodation of those who may wish to make a present to a young friend, of something that will please the eye as well as improve the mind.

For sale also by P. Price, 130 Fulton street, New-York, and A. Tompkins, 32 Cornhill, Boston.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

EARTH'S SCENES ARE FADING; HEAVEN ALONE IS TRUE.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

How frail a thing is man! The gorgeous band
Of delicately tinted flowers, that spring
Up from the tangled vale, or deck the green
Fresh carpet of the meads, or gaily climb
The alcove roof or trellis'd garden bower,
And fling their perfume on the zephyr's wing,
Like vestal incense on the hallowed shrine
Of pure devotion; the soft mists, that rise
From the clear bosom of the azure deep,
And hang their purple folds along the sky,
When days stupendous king retires, to rest
His foaming steeds, within the sea green halls;
The coral caves, and fret-work palaces
Of hoary Neptune; the gay piles, that rear
Their amber columns in the bright'ning east,
And melt away as Phœbus wheels her car
Swift up the eastern hills; are not more frail
Than man, the boasted lord of this terrene.
But there is one, whose throne of power is set
High on the eternal hills, whence living rays,
Beam through the vast profound of boundless space
In bright effulgence: whose creating hand
Spangled with living gems, the dazzling seas
Of azure light, and set upon his throne
The flaming day-god; whose reflected beams,
When evening's smiles trac'd on her star-gem'd halls,
Like the veil'd glory of Immanuel,
Shows forth the might and wisdom of their King.

His hand upholds us, when in life's young morn
We first look out upon earth's flower-clad plains,
Whence perfumes rise like grateful incense, up
To Him whose emerald car, in splendor wheels
Swiftly o'er burnished plains of mellow light.
When health her heavenly viands spreads for us,
'Tis God himself, the grateful relish gives.
When sickness darts its madd'ning pangs, along
The shrinking nerves, till the worn wearied frame
In languor sinks; calmly the spirit rests,
Safe in the circling arms of boundless love.
And when grim death his paralyzing hand
Lays on the warm life-fount, and earth's lov'd scenes
Are fast receding from the glazing eye—
When we stand shivering o'er the black abyss,
Dreading the cold rush of the fearful surge—
Oh! then unclose the mental eye, bid faith
Her glass present, and on the distant shore
Of immortality, in fadeless bloom,
Behold unnumbered millions tune the lyre,
And strive to catch the seraphs lofty notes.
There, angel and archangel, bending low
Before the great Eternal, raise the chant
Of high dominion, glory, honor, power,
To him who died to conquer. There, again,
The shining host, who once o'er Judea's plains
Unfurled their dazzling piniors, raise the song
Of "glory in the highest!" Shall we dare
To launch our frail bark on death's stormy frith,
Since at the helm, our heavenly Father sits
To guide us home to glory? See, afar
The heavenly city's pearly gates unfold,
And sun-eyed cherubim, with golden car,
Stand waiting to receive our trembling souls:
And list! what soothing numbers gently swell,
Like harp-tones from the diamond crested spheres?
'Tis but the echoes of the lofty strains
That peal along the hyacinthine bowers,
Till seraphs join to raise the blissful song,
And heaven's high arches with the music rings.

CHRIST A RECONCILIATOR.

The characters ascribed to Jesus of Nazareth in the writings of the sacred Scriptures are numerous and various. He is called the Lamb of God, the Redeemer, the Saviour, Prince Emanuel, the Messiah, a Witness, Leader and Commander, the Prince of Peace or the Reconciliator. None of these several designations, however, in my estimation, present him in so beautiful and lovely a light as the one last named, viz. that of a Reconciliator, or which is synonymous—the Prince of Peace. Can you, dear reader, imagine to yourself a more beautiful character than this? How much do we admire it in man? I look with a peculiar delight upon that individual whose every endeavor is spent in adjusting differences between his fellow mortals, and promoting the holy cause of "peace on earth and good will among men." I look upon such an one as endowed with the genuine Christian spirit; and however much I may lack in this particular point of duty myself, I can not repress, (nor would I) my admiration of those to whom this talent has been committed. But how infinitely enhanced is my admiration, and how enlisted to adoration is every better thought and feeling of the heart, when I turn me from the Adamic man to the contemplation of this glorious trait in the man "Christ Jesus."

The world was estranged from the Father; all had erred, and like lost sheep gone astray, notwithstanding the innumerable testimonials of the Father's love to them. Kindness unbounded seemed to have made them forgetful of its source, ingratitude followed, they became unreconciled. Instead of beholding the Creator as formerly, in the character of a parent, they now viewed him through the false medium of their own perverted narrow-mindedness, a Judge—their enemy. And viewing him thus, they banished every thought of him from their minds and wandered yet the farther away into the mazy labarynths of error and iniquity. This was but a natural course; the farther we can get away from our enemies, either real or supposed, the better we like it; we desire no intercourse with them. Thus it was with the world of mankind—there was need of a third person to adjust differences (so to speak)—to convince those in error of their error, and to open to them the true character of their supposed enemy. And just at the very time when such a personage was most needed, there appeared upon earth the Reconciliator—the man, Christ Jesus. And forthwith he commences the duties of his mission.

Behold him on the mount—heaven's preacher in nature's pulpit! See him then and there portraying the character of his and our God—how? As our implacable enemy, a wrathful, inexorable judge? As hating those very creatures whom his love only could have prompted him to create? Hear those beauteous words, so full of eloquence and love, bursting from his hallowed lips—"What man is there of you of whom if his son ask bread, will ye give him a stone? or a fish, will ye give him a serpent? If ye then being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him." Yea, if ye frail erring creatures of the dust, being evil know how to bless your offspring in ministering to their wants, how much more (eternity alone can solve the question) shall your heavenly Father who is love, and whence flows all that we behold of love upon the earth, bless with "good things" each and all of his dependent children.

It is worthy of remark, that Christ in this his first discourse of which we have any record, devotes very considerable space to this one particular point, upon which the world has so widely erred, viz: the character of God. He seems to have been particularly anxious to impress upon his hearers the importance of correct views on this subject, considering it unquestionably as it should be, the foundation of all doctrines respecting the future state of being, and indeed of all religion. It is on this that I build my hopes, not only of immortality, but of a happy immortality, and it seems so to have been considered by the sacred writers. What is the reason assigned that God will save all men with an everlasting salvation? Because he is God—because he is the God of love. He will do it because it is his pleasure—the pleasure of his love. "He will swallow up death in victory; he will wipe away tears from off all faces, and the rebuke of his people will he take away from all the earth." Why? "For the Lord hath spoken it." List to it all ye opponents of Universalism. Hence the importance of sending a reconciliator into the world to reconcile estranged man to his Maker, and to enable him to see him as he really is, "altogether lovely and the chiefest among ten thousand." It was not indeed important that this should be done in order to ensure this great salvation, but for man's present enjoyment and the pleasure of the Almighty in delivering his offspring from degradation and misery here, to behold in prospect their ultimate emancipation from all the trammels of the earthy nature into the immortal and incorruptible constitution. "Be ye therefore reconciled to God."—Union.

MARRIAGES.

In Mendon, May 24th, by Rev. H. Roberts, Mr. REMSON VANDERHOOF, to Miss HENRIETTA HUGHES, daughter of Joab Hughes.

In Warsaw, May 31st, by Rev. W. E. Manley, Mr. BENJAMIN BLAKELEY, of Perry, to Miss MARIA WALKER, of Sheldon.

In Perry, May 23d, by the same, Mr. JOHN S. WRIGHT, of Stafford, to Miss OLIVA A. SPAULDING, of Castile.

DEATHS.

By drowning in the Delaware river, in Hamden, May 3d, Mr. CHARLES B. ELLS, son of Mr. Samuel Ells, of Walton, in the 24th year of his age. He had been assisting in getting off a raft which had been stuck in the river, and in returning to the shore in a boat, in company with another person, the boat upset and they were thrown into the water, but his companion succeeded in getting upon the bottom of the boat and was saved. Mr. Ells commenced swimming down the river, and continued his exertions until he sank. When taken from the water, the vital spark had fled forever. His funeral was attended in Walton, on the 5th ult., and a discourse delivered by the writer; to whom it is a gratification to know, that a large majority of the relatives of this youth, are believers in that Gospel which is so well calculated to console us under affliction. That they may enjoy its blessings, its promises, and its hopes, is the prayer of their brother in Christ. E. E. GUILD.

Union please copy.

In the town of Brighton, on the 25th ult., WM. BILLINGHURST, aged 56. Br. B. was a firm believer in the final restitution, and died reconciled to God. He has left a widow and ten children to mourn his loss.—The funeral took place on the 27th, at which time his remains were taken to the Presbyterian church at Brighton village, and a sermon delivered by the writer.

In Leicester, May 10th, of consumption, Mrs. SALLY FERRIS, wife of Mr. William Ferris. In the death of Mrs. Ferris, her surviving partner and numerous family are deprived of an affectionate wife and kind mother. The funeral was attended on the following Sunday in the Baptist meeting-house in Perry.

In Upper Lisle, April 5th, Mr. EPHRAIM HOLLENBECK, aged 80 years. For the last 40 years of his life, Br. H. was a believer in the restitution, and found it to be his greatest consolation in the hour of death. Sermon, 1 Cor. xv: 24-28, by C. S. B.

In this village, (Waterloo,) on the 21st of May, Mrs. ELIZABETH G. MOON, (eldest daughter of John Sholes) aged 26 years, 10 months and 15 days. We enjoyed the happiness of an acquaintance with the amiable subject of this while living. She was the idol of many, and the friend of all. None knew her but to admire her goodness; none mentioned her but to exalt her virtue. Her death will be universally lamented, for envy or malice never exerted their power to claim her as a victim. She died in full belief of a Saviour, and the promises of a Father's grace. She met the king of terror without a murmur, or a fear. Deeply, very deeply, do we sympathise with the parents, relatives and friends of the deceased; and fervently do we pray that the rich consolation of the Gospel of peace may be theirs.—Seneca Observer.

In Ohio city, June 9th, ANDREW, infant son of Br. J. Whitney, aged eleven days. The spirit of innocence, took but a hasty glance of earth's scenes, and fled back again to its Father and its God. "Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

In Hamilton, March 11th, Mrs. PATIRNCE FORBES, wife of Asa Forbes, in the 38th year of her age. Mrs. F. was a victim of the fell destroyer, consumption.—Formerly she was a member of the Episcopal church; but withdrew from it, having become a believer in the restitution, which faith was her comfort and strength in the hour of death. Sermon by Br. Williams.

In Denmark, May 19th, ALONZO D., youngest son of Gilbert, and Ilona Van Vetchten, aged 5 years. Funeral services the following day by the writer. J. F.

In Hownsfield, on the 9th inst., of consumption, THOMPSON PHELPS, aged 28 years. Br. Phelps was in faith and in practice a Universalist. Precisely one year previous to the death of Br. P., his only brother was torn from the embraces of his friends by the same disease.—Alas, for the ravages of this dreadful disorder. How many once happy families have been made to mourn by its desolating breath. J. F.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS....NO. IV.

BY REV. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

"Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I am come not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household." MATT. 10: 34, 35, 36.

In view of this language, it is in amount said, that such a notion or principle can not be divine; that to wield the sword and make divisions in families, is wholly contrary to any correct views of the character of the Deity, as well as subversive of all moral right: consequently, the person who uttered it and the revelation which contains it, can not be divine. This objection we admit to be well founded, provided it can be shown that the direct object of Christ was to induce war and create divisions. But if this can not be shown, then the objection must fall.

There is one fact to begin with, which is worthy of consideration. Whoever attentively peruses the various conversations of our Saviour, must be convinced that he inculcates many admirable moral principles, which, if practised by all men, would absolutely destroy contention, war, and bloodshed. The simple but golden rule, "whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them," of itself is sufficient to beat every sword into a ploughshare, unnerve every arm of revenge, subdue every passion, and make man the friend of his brother. Can it be possible, then, that the mild and benevolent Saviour, a highly moral and virtuous individual, even according to the confessions of some skeptics—can it be possible that he avowed it as his determination to foment wars and break up the peace of families, even when the members of the social circle are earnestly besought to cultivate affection and good will, in many places of the Christian system? The thing is not reasonable.

The Jews supposed that the Messiah whom they expected, would establish the most perfect peace among them. But our Saviour assures the disciples that such would not be the first effect consequent of his system; for it would not be peace on earth, or the land, as Clarke affirms that it should be rendered, but contention and division. The key to an understanding of this statement, is found in the fact, that a good man or a good system, inculcating every virtue, may at the same time be made the occasion of evil, without at all being guilty of that evil. For instance: political liberty is an excellent principle; yet liberty has been fought about, and rivers of blood were shed in its name during the French revolution. Liberty is not, however, the cause of such evils, but simply the occasion. When Saul, king of Israel, cherished the malignant determination to murder David, no person will affirm that David was the cause of that determination, because he was the occasion of its existence. There is another illustration which is directly to the point. The principles which we, as believers in the Restitution, profess, uphold love towards all men, and kindness among families in particular. Yet we know, that when one member of a family, who has long been fixed in opposing points of faith, embraces our principles, the rest of the family oppose him, and thus dissension is introduced into that family. But the principles can not be charged with said dissension; they are simply the occasion of the evil; for instead of the principles being the cause of dissension, the dissension arises from a want of them: if the family all received the principles, they would live in peace, for they would be taught love and good will.

So with our Saviour's system—although it teaches every possible act of goodness, yet the Jews quarrelled about it—not because of the influence of its principles, but because those who did not believe it, were determined to persecute those who did believe it. Hence it was the occasion, but not the cause of the evil. I know that our Saviour, in alluding to it, represents himself as sending a sword and creating divisions; but the critic is aware that the secondary cause is often spoken of as the primary cause, in the Scriptures. For instance, in the first council held in Jerusalem, James remarked, "For Moses of old time hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every Sabbath-day."—Acts xv: 21. It will be discovered that Moses is put in place of his system; for, reading Moses in the synagogues, simply means that the first four books of the Bible, of which he was the author, were read. So our Saviour puts himself in place of his system, which, in its establishment, was made the occasion of contention. When Christ said, "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I am not come to send peace, but a sword," he meant that such would be the effect of promulgating Christianity in its early periods—not that a belief in Christianity would cause contention, but that those who did not believe it, would make it the occasion of persecuting those who did believe it, as was before remarked. Facts fully justify this conclusion. A majority of the Jews did not receive the Gospel; for they not only rejected it, but they crucified the Redeemer with the most aggravated cruelty. For this wickedness a sword was sent among them—a sword which belonged to the Roman mistress of the world, and which was not withdrawn until they were swept from the family of nations. Thus the Gospel was made the occasion of a sword being sent among the Jews, the unavoidable consequence of the violent conduct of that people of bigotry.

The Gospel was also the innocent occasion of contention in families then, as it is at the present day. It is well known that the Israelites were so opposed to Christianity, that they cast every one from their synagogues who owned the Saviour.—Consequently, when the member of a family embraced Christianity, all the other members, still holding to the law of Moses, were opposed to him; so that, literally, the father was against the son, the son against the father, the mother against the daughter, and the daughter against the mother.—Hence Christ, being made the occasion, but not the cause, might well suppose that his coming would then produce contention in families, and that they would quarrel about him.

Indeed there are preachers now, who upon first visiting a place, could with propriety openly say, "I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law; and a man's foes shall be they of his own household." He might come preaching love to God and all men; he might in burning eloquence describe the necessity of peace and good will; and yet he might repeat the language of our Saviour. It is true that such principles could not of themselves produce contention; but coming in contact with the prejudices of the people, those who did not believe them, would oppose those who did, and thus war be the consequence, even in families. These considerations, we believe, must show that the language of Christ does not affirm that he loved war, or that his system encouraged contention, but simply that the intense bigotry of the Jews would make him the bone of dissension among them.

Indeed, the Gospel itself does not teach persecution, bloodshed, and contention. Can that system which taught William Penn to love even the wild Indian of the forest—which sent John Howard among prisons, to show his noble mercy for the sons and daughters of sin—which armed the apostles with a Heaven-born desire to enlighten and Christianize the world—which represents its Founder as uttering a God-like prayer of forgiveness even for his murderers—which shows us the divine love of the Deity, flowing in its tide of blessings to every creature, until it shall have washed away every sin and all error, and fitted man and woman for the peerless glories of heaven—can it be that the Gospel which inculcates such large liberality, such active uses of reason, teaching man that he must read for himself, and form his own faith by proving all things, making the Bible alone his source of information concerning spiritual things—can it be that such a system aims at war and dissension? No!—its aim is to rob the world of nothing but its sins, its errors, its passions, its worship at the altars of ambition and tyranny; and to give in return, justice, virtue, love, faith, hope, and pure religion, the concentration of all that is good. And only let the Gospel once unfurl its banner in every family and nation of the earth; let an altar for the worship of God, be erected in the heart of every creature, and the noblest consequences will be produced: the warrior will become a peaceful citizen, the tyrant become a philanthropist, the dishonest man virtuous, and all be Christians whose acknowledged Father is God, whose acknowledged Saviour is Christ, whose creed-book is the Bible, who wear the noble diamond of universal love toward men, adorned with the sister-gems of forgiveness, purity, and charity.

MYSTERIOUS RELIGION.

BY REV. E. O. WILLIAMS.

"Where mystery begins, religion ends." This was the very pertinent and sensible observation of an English dissenting clergyman, who lived and wrote during the early part of the eighteenth century. In a sermon on the subject of mysteries, he undertook to show "that there are, properly speaking, no mysteries in religion." All the secret or mysterious things, that have any relation to religious subjects, belong unto the Lord; and those, only, which are clearly revealed, and which are, therefore, plain and intelligible, belong to us. So far as our faith, our happiness and religious obligations are concerned, we have nothing at all to do with mysteries. Though there may be many things comprised in the religious system of our Redeemer, that once were mysteries, yet we are not required to believe and practice any principle or precept that is still a mystery. Every thing which was once clothed in a garb of mystery, and which it is now our duty to believe, has been fully unveiled, and brought within the reach of our understanding. Indeed, "to believe doctrines that are still mysteries, is to believe without ideas." And if revelation is comprised in general propositions, which we do not understand—embracing some truth disguised under unintelligible terms—it is in reality no revelation; it leaves things in absolute darkness; it only shows men their own ignorance, but affords them no light by which they may be directed to their duty and their happiness.

Such was the train of reasoning pursued by a divine, who was somewhat distinguished in his day and generation, as a candid and moderate, yet powerful defender of Christianity, against the attacks of its adversaries. And though it may bear with great force against some parts of the religious systems adopted by many Christians at the present day; yet its correctness can hardly be disputed. The fundamental principles of the Gospel, are, in no point of view, abstruse and unintelligible—beyond the reach of the human understanding. However mysterious they may have been in ages past, before the appearance of the great "light of the world," they are now clearly revealed, and fully explained. He, then, who adopts a mysterious religion, or who connects mysteries with his religious system, departs widely, both from the religion of nature and the pure religion of Jesus Christ. He assumes a degree of wisdom far above what God has seen fit to reveal, and, in truth, he "believes without ideas." And if he endeavors to enforce his unnatural and unintelligible notions upon others, he not only violates the rights and prerogatives of reason, but also departs from the requirements of revelation; for, as remarked by the divine above referred to, "if we examine the doctrines of the Christian religion, we shall find in fact, that as we can not in reason, so we are not obliged by revelation, to carry our faith one jot beyond our understanding."

If these principles are correct, what can be said of the doctrines of the trinity, the incarnation, vicarious atonement, and all the mysterious notions connected with that unintelligible system, which usually passes under the name of Orthodoxy? Do these belong to the true religion of the Bible? And is it indispensible that they should be believed? It is a just remark, and ought always to be remembered, that "where mystery begins, religion ends." The moment a man steps beyond the line of clear and intelligible revelation, either in respect to his hopes or his duty, he departs from the principles and precepts of true religion. Those principles, then, which are acknowledged to be mysteries, and are embraced because they are mysteries, form no part of revealed religion. And no one surely ought to maintain, that we are obligated to believe or practice any religious principle or precept which is not revealed.

Men, however, in all ages of the world, have had a remarkable fondness for mysteries and impossibilities on religious subjects. A religion that is easily understood and easily put in practice, has seldom satisfied their curiosity, or their desire to perform meritorious actions—actions regarded the more meritorious as they are the more difficult to be performed. This proneness has driven them beyond the bounds of reason into superstition, and the most wild and extravagant vagaries. Reason, indeed, has been condemned as an unfaithful and even dangerous and delusive guide; the understanding has been puzzled and confounded by the multiplicity of incomprehensible mysteries, and men have become unreasonable on every subject connected with religion. The great volume of nature, and the principles of divine revelation, have been altogether too plain and easy; and hence, a mysterious religion, more obscure, and more difficult to be carried into practice, has been invented to supply their place. And in the very bosom of these mysteries, infidelity has sprung up, and been nourished, and taken its deepest root, to the declension of public morals, the undermining of human hopes, and the injury of pure religion.

Those, then, who desire the advancement of Christian principles, who are lovers of God and their fellow-men, and who wish to promote the pure worship of the former, and increase the happiness of the latter, should throw aside their mysteries and unintelligible notions, and confine themselves to the plain doctrines of divine revelation—doctrines that are valuable as presenting precepts, the best that have ever been presented for the regulation of human conduct. Mysteries are always liable to mislead and bewilder; but plain matters of fact, simple and inteligible truths, are neither apt to be misunderstood, nor liable to misdirect the mind, and lead it into faults and errors. Hence, if safety, or the "safe side," be any thing of an object, and if any one has a desire for "two chances," he will certainly find the two in favor of a plain, intelligible system, to one in favor of a mysterious religion, and, consequently, the greatest safety when there is the least degree of mystery.

THE EXISTENCE OF GOD.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"Whence come I here, and how? so marvellously
Constituted and conceived? unknown! this clod
Lives, surely, through some higher energy,
For from itself alone it could not be"—RUSSIAN ANTHOLOGY.

"If you search the world, you may find cities without walls, without letters, without kings, without money; but no one ever saw a city without a Deity, without a temple, or without some form of worship."—PLUTARCH.

Two modes of reasoning have been adopted to prove the existence of an all-wise and perfect Being. One is called a priori, the other, a posteriori. The former consists in reasoning from cause to effect; the latter, from effect to cause. The utility of all reasoning a priori, has been questioned by many eminent men: among whom may be found Dugald Stewart, whose writings well deserve a place in every library. Dr. Samuel Clarke, of the last century, has sustained the a priori mode of reasoning as well, probably, as any writer who has ever appeared.*

But the proofs of the existence of a Supreme Being, are so numerous that it is difficult to select the most convincing. The celebrated Locke contended that the existence of man alone, was sufficient to prove the existence of a God. The truth is, we may take any single faculty of man, and prove that he had a Creator. Fenelon said, "that the eye of the meanest animal surpassed the skill of all the artisans in the world." The idea of a supreme, invisible Power has existed among all tribes and nations. Stewart, in his moral philosophy, says, "however contaminated with error, however deluded by the follies of superstition and credulity, the belief of the existence of supernatural and invisible things presiding over human affairs, will be found to be inseparable from the human mind." Aristotle, alluding to the support which universal assent gives to any fact, presents the following excellent observation: "What seems true to most wise men, is very probable, what most men, both wise and unwise assent to, doth still more resemble truth; but what men generally consent, is both the highest probability, and approaches near to demonstration, so near that it may pass for ridiculous arrogance, or for intolerable obstinacy and perverseness to deny it." It has been seriously doubted whether there ever was a real Atheist, but it is well known that it has been openly avowed. Man may profess Atheism, but he cannot believe it. It requires far greater effort and strength of mind to reject and overlook the evidences of the divine existence, than to search out and assent to them. God has manifested himself in every thing. That being the case, it is our duty to form right views of his character, to love and adore him as the Lord and Parent of the universe.

QUERIES

ADDRESSED TO THOSE WHO THINK.

BY REV. W. S. BALCH.

1. If all men were Universalists in principle and practice, would they continue in sin?

2. Was the inquisition established in the spirit of love, to send poor sufferers to heaven?

3. Did John Calvin procure the death of Michael Servetus, because he believed that God loved him with an equal love, and would make them kneel side by side before the throne of heaven, and together sing the praises of a common Saviour!

4. Did the Puritans hang witches, whip Quakers and banish Baptists, because they believed God would pardon the follies and faults of human weakness and save them by his grace?

5. Is the devil pleased with a doctrine which circumscribes his power, liberates his captives, demolishes his murky kingdom, annihilates his very being, and obliterates every trace of the power of evil?

6. Will God, and Christ, and angels, and saints, be satisfied with any thing short of the salvation of all men?

7. If you believed that a most perfect reconciliation should take place between you and your enemy to-morrow, would you seek his injury to-day? How, then, can a belief in the holiness of all men be licentious? Can love work ill to its neighbor?

8. Limitarians have reported that the Hon. J. Cilley, who lately fell in a duel, was a Universalist. Admit it, and what follows? Did that doctrine tempt him to this fatal act? Had he believed that one day a most perfect union would exist between him and his challenger, that in heaven they would be eternal friends, could he have aimed at the injury of a brother, under the influence of such a spirit of fraternal love?

9. When thou commitest sin and hatest thy fellow, dost thou realize that he is thy brother, and a joint heir with thee to an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled and that fadeth not away?

10. Dost thou profit by all the instruction afforded thee, and always walk in the light and spirit of thy doctrine? If not, who is in fault?

11. To be a Universalist is to believe in a wise, benevolent and almighty Father, to love him with all the heart, to love and do good to all men. What is it to be a Limitarian?

12. What doctrine gives the highest glory to Deity, the greatest perfection to his works, and the largest amount of happiness to his creatures?

VALUE OF RELIGION.

"Religion refines our moral sentiments, disengages the heart from every vain desire, renders it tranquil under misfortune, humble in the presence of God, and steady in the society of men."

The advent of Jesus Christ, commences an era in human records, highly interesting to the great family of mankind. The doctrines that he taught had never before been promulgated, and had an equal bearing upon all classes and conditions in society. He was emphatically the bearer of "good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people."

Men have built up theories, and planned out systems, but all have failed to equal, in importance and durability, the invaluable superstructure which has been established by the Christian religion. If its spirit is properly cultivated, those principles are instilled, which are dictated by no other institution, that is or has been in existence. Do we ask for an instance of the doctrine it teaches, we have only to look at the history of Jesus Christ. What nobler example of disinterestedness—what superior excellency can elsewhere be found, than he displayed whilst on this earth! That religion, or the principles of religion, which are one and the same, is necessary for our guidance here, must be acknowledged; for if we look into our constitution—into our nature—we find that unless we have some beacon light to guide us through the tempests of this life, we are liable to be wrecked on inhospitable shores, where the vulture of skepticism and infidelity will prey upon our very vitals, whilst hope and happiness, finding no kindred elements, leave us to our own wild musings. The religion of Jesus furnishes this beacon-light, and it is the only one that has been presented to the world, that has stood the test of time and experience. It is the only thing that can guide us through life's stormy sea, with the prospect of reaching a secure haven. Without it, we should have but a miserable existence.

* Dr. Clarke's work is of great value, but is now quite scarce. It is worth reprinting. It is entitled "A demonstration of the being and attributes of God: more particularly in answer to Mr. Hobbes, Spinosa, and their followers; wherein, the notion of liberty is stated, and the possibility and certainty of it proved, in opposition to necessity and fate."

Time was when the fountain of religion was obstructed—when its crystal waters, which had flowed on in their meandering course for ages, fertilizing human intellect, had become the putrid waters, issuing from a more impure source. Then the bright and burning sun of Christianity was nearly eclipsed by the superior and more deadening influence of a superstitious and infatuated age. The history of the dark ages, is replete with the fanaticism of mankind. Deep and deplorable was the worse than Egyptian darkness, in which ignorance and superstition had enveloped the whole human family. Who that has contemplated the works of misdirected zeal, but is sensible that without some rule of action, based upon the principles of religion, all our efforts, no matter how well directed, are worse than useless. We have ample historical evidence to prove that all other institutions, (Christianity excepted,) no matter how grand and noble their design, have ultimately failed. And for what reason? We can assign no other, unless it is the frailty of our nature, and the destructibility of all our works. These, time, with his remorseless surge, has whelmed in oblivion; whilst religion, the offspring of Deity, has withstood flood and tempest, the edicts of emperors, and the curses of apostates, and still remains as unshaken as when the Almighty first gave to men the rule of rectitude. It demands of the creature no act which he can not perform, no duty which is against his interest. It would not make us stoics, monks, nor sour and flaming fanatics; but serves to make us better and happier, and calls forth a proper response to the Giver of all good, for his mercy and kindness towards us. It teaches those lessons of love and kindness to our fellows, which are so necessary to social happiness; it opens to us at one view, the mercy and benevolence of our Creator, and commands from us the highest meed of praise and adoration for his goodness. It is not repugnant to any individual in society, but offers alike to all who practice its doctrines—to the king on his throne, and the mendicant in the streets—the same degree of happiness. Deity alone could have given us so valuable a rule of instruction, as that contained in the Christian Religion. Let us pay unto Him devout reverence, spurning alike the dogmas of the learned, and the insipid and boisterous ravings of fanatics and mountebanks, and let us embrace the truth as it is in Jesus, and rely for strength upon the counsels of the Most High. CALUMNY.

No evil can be selected from the train that besets mankind, so pernicious and so destructive as calumny. Conceived in the exuberance of malice, cherished in the cradle of revenge or the lap of personal or party interest, it lives and spreads its cursed and cursing influence over the fairest prospects of earthly enjoyment. As relentless as the tiger, gorges its malignity upon the innocence and happiness of its victim, and then, with demoniac exultation, rejoices over the consummation of his ruin. Virtue and morality, so far from affording security to their possessors, are made the targets for the aim of calumny. As the fairest flowers allure the attention of the wanton gatherer, so the fairest reputations are doomed to suffer by its shafts. Personages, who, with unremitted perseverance, have climbed the rugged hill of renown and gathered laurels from its "dangerous steep," have had them blasted by the poisonous breath of calumny. The youthful maiden, whose amiable deportment and unsullied virtue endeared her to the wise and good, has writhed within its venomed fangs; and the sons of poverty, whom fortune cast unaided on the world's wide waste, in one short hour has seen his expectations withered by this blighting curse. It has intruded its unwelcome presence in circles where the most perfect harmony prevailed, and discord and division have invariably ensued; and wherever dissension and wrangling disturb the empire of enjoyment, there this "green-eyed monster" holds his fiendish revels, exulting in the triumph of malignant passion over those endearments that render society desirable, or life a blessing.

But worse than all, and most to be deprecated, is a species of religious calumny, which has an extensive influence in the religious world. Respectable societies of Chrisians are often basely calumniated, and by those too, whose professions should forbid it; by those whose pretensions, in the view of the multitude, are the pledges of veracity; by those whom the religious world holds up as paragons of perfection. Such, are often the originators and propagators of slanderous reports—reports subversive of the good order of society, and detrimental to the interests of Christianity. The credulity of the people, throws the sanction of truth around the grossest defamations—for to question the truth of reports coming from so high a source, were almost sacrilege.

This species of calumny is the direst curse that has ever fallen to the lot of man. Bigotry, that foul and hell-engendered plant, inhales nutriment from its breath, and prejudice is bedewed by its malignant vapors. J. M. E.

OHIO CITY INSTITUTE.

This institution is now completed. It commenced its operations on Monday, 18th of June, conducted by Mr. Dinsmore, who has been some time in waiting for this purpose. He is an able and competent teacher, well calculated to give general satisfaction, and we think that our friends in this State, and some parts of Pennsylvania, cannot find a school better adapted to advance their sons and daughters in the several branches of literature.

The building is situated on a pleasant eminence, in full view of Lake Erie and the city of Cleveland, and is of sufficient capacity to accommodate two hundred pupils. Our infant society in this place, have found much difficulty in raising a sufficient amount of money to complete the work. I am sorry to say, there are many individuals of liberal sentiments in this section of Ohio, who have done nothing as yet, to help us along. The lot upon which the building is placed, has been given to us for this purpose, and as it is abundantly large, and the wants of the community require it, we contemplate the erection of a much larger edifice, to be used for a male department exclusively. Though considerably in debt, and though we find ourselves under the necessity of procuring apparatus for chemistry, philosophy and music, we are resolved to have a permanent establishment that will promote the well being of community, by the diffusion of useful knowledge.

This institution is to be free from that narrow and intolerant spirit, by which the most of our literary institutions are controlled. It is to be established on the broadest principles of liberality; and a thorough and systematic education can be obtained without the intermeddling of religious bigots, or the imposition of religious creeds. All will be allowed to think for themselves, in regard to the concerns of religion, because the fountain of truth and means of information will be open to all.

It seems that a powerful phalanx of opposing Christains have long been laboring to monopolize the formation of the youthful mind. With them, it is an ordinary practice to prevent inquiry, and to throw around the subject of religion a mysterious and gloomy aspect. And a course like this, cannot fail to prevent the improvement of the intellectual and moral powers. It is not only a bane to the cultivation of the mind, but it is a means of infecting almost every literary production which is placed before us. Could the religion of Christ be separated from its corruptions, the human powers would soar to the highest summit of refinement and moral excellence. The soul would expand with proportionate satisfaction, and with gratitude to the divine Author of our being.

Pure religion cannot be found in rites and ceremonies, nor should it be taught by the introduction of such things into our schools of learning. To attempt the formation of a correct moral deportment, by compelling the observance of religious solemnities, has a powerful tendency to make mockers of religion; for when a constant routine of duty has been enforced upon them, they can feel but little of that involuntary aspiration, which hallows the idea of a Supreme Being and the subject of spiritual devotion.

Brethren, the time has come for us to arise and stand forth as the friends and defenders of religious liberty. We have too long been folding our hands together, supposing that our spiritual taskmasters would fetter us no more. The schemes of Orthodoxy are deeply laid, and dangerous in their tendency. And many of us have contributed largely to erect their engines of ecclesiastic oppression. There is but one remedy, and that is, to come out boldly and renounce this time-serving policy. We ask you not to treat an opposer with violence, but we ask you to abandon this puerile timidity and with one united voice, declare you will no longer contribute to support those institutions of learning which are made subservient to the dogmas of men.

I think it a correct maxim, that "union is strength," and by the permanent establishment of an institution free from sectarian influence, we become so united as to oppose successfully, and defend ourselves against the dangerous schemes of our spiritual foes, and thus promote the cause of virtue amongst our fellow men. Spiritual wickedness cannot be effectually met, except by concert of action among the friends of liberal Christianity; it is therefore, important that the friends of civil and religious freedom should arise in their strength, while they have the means in their own power; that they awake to a sense of their danger and duty before the night of darkness shall come upon them.

Think not that we are intolerant; no, we are perfectly willing that our opposers should enjoy their own sentiments unmolested, and support their own institutions of learning. These are privileges we claim in common with all others—but we are not willing to bow down to ecclesiastical establishments that would bring us to their standard of worship and deprive us of our money to aid that which we disbelieve, and which already threatens the prostration of our dearest rights.

What ought to be done, and what can be done to secure our liberty and improve our condition? It is for us to patronize all those literary and scientific institutions which are conducted on liberal principles, entirely free from sectarian power. The one which we have now established in Ohio City is of this character; and no pains will be spared by our friends in this place, to gain for it a permanent footing.

We have written enough, and now it only remains to put the question plainly, will you help us in this enterprize? For a number of months we have been struggling in this place to accomplish what is now before you, and we trust you will not be offended at this appeal. Say, brethren, will you help? I am going to travel through many parts of Ohio and Pennsylvania, to preach the Gospel and aid the funds of this institution. You are requested to bear this subject in mind until I give you a call for this purpose. If any of you should be prepared, and will remit to us by letter, it will save me the trouble of calling at your house to obtain it. J. WHITNEY.

Mankind too frequently wed opinions, and having taken them "for better or worse," conceive it a point of honor to maintain them ever after; though Reason and Truth sue for a divorce.

Charity should begin at home;—true; but it should not end there. It may reasonably be suspected of those who are fond of quoting this adage, that their charity is no great traveller.

FULNESS OF THE GOSPEL.

BY REV. SAMUEL GOFF.

A few weeks since, I made a few remarks on the unsatisfying nature of all earthly things. Towards the close of that article, I had occasion to remark, that although every thing of an earthly nature, would fail of satisfying the ardent and longing desires of the mind, yet in the Gospel we should find a fulness for each, a fulness for all, and a fulness forever more. In this communication I design to make a few remarks in illustration of this last proposition.

The term Gospel literally signifies "good news." Now let us see how well this agrees with the testimony of the Scriptures. Let us notice the circumstances attending the birth of Him, who was to establish the Gospel kingdom in the earth. The shepherds are watching their flocks upon the lonely plains of Judea, in the still and contemplative hours of night. "When, lo! the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them, and they were sore afraid." But what is the message of the heavenly visitant? Does he increase their fear, and overwhelm them in sorrow and grief, by fearful denunciations of the wrath and vengeance of the Almighty upon helpless and dependent man? Ah, no. Far different is the message from God to man. Listen to the heavenly tones, the mild and gentle accents, and the sweet and thrilling voice of the messenger of mercy, "Fear not." Oh, the soul-cheering, the heart-inspiring, and the spirit-stirring joy that fills their heaving bosoms at this unexpected announciation—"Fear not."—Why? why should they not fear? "Fear not: for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be unto all people. For unto you is born, this day, in the city of David, a Savior which is Christ the Lord." Ah! why should they fear, when the angel proclaims "good tidings of great joy which shall be unto all people"! Why should they fear when all heaven is shouting for joy! For "suddenly," after the angel had delivered his heaven-taught message, "there was with him, a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God and saying, glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward man." In Matt. i: 21, we read, "And thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins."

From these two quotations, we learn that the introduction of the Gospel dispensation was good news, inasmuch as it proclaimed the birth of a Savior, who should "save his people from their sins." Having, then, learned that the Gospel is indeed "good tidings of great joy," let us inquire more particularly into the extent of this good news. The angel said it should "be unto all people"; but as some seem to doubt the correctness of his testimony, we will see if any other witnesses agree with him, for "by the mouth of two or three witnesses every word shall be established." By a reference to the Old Testament dispensation, we learn that God made a covenant with Abraham, saying: "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee, and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Here we have the promise that "all the families of the earth," (which certainly means "all people,") shall be blessed in the seed of Abraham.

This promise was first made unto Abraham, then renewed unto Isaac, and confirmed unto Jacob. See Gen. xii: 3; xviii: 18; xxii: 18; xxvi: 4, and xxviii: 14. Now we have the testimony of St. Paul for calling this promise the Gospel. Gal. iii: 8. "And the scripture foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the Gospel unto Abraham, saying, and in thee shall all nations be blessed."

And St. Peter, Acts iii: 21, calls it "the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Hence we discover that all nations, families, and kindreds (Acts iii: 25,) of the earth have the promise of being blessed in Christ, the seed of Abraham; (Gal. iii: 16,) and this is the Gospel; "the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began."

Our next inquiry is, will this promise be fulfilled? Will Christ ever "see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied?" He "gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time." Will "the ransomed of the Lord" ever "return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads"? Will they ever "obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing flee away"? Jesus our Savior "tasted death for every man." "Shall all the ends of the world remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations worship before him"? He is set for salvation to the ends of the earth. Shall the "glory of the Lord be revealed and all flesh see it together"?

Dear reader, all this the Lord hath promised; and will he make it good? shall he redeem his word? What saith the Scripture? "God is not man that he should lie, nor the Son of man that he should repent; hath he said and shall he not do it? hath he spoken and shall he not make it good?" Again: "I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall swear; surely shall say, in the Lord have I righteousness and strength." Then let us not distrust the word of Jehovah, "for he doeth his will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth, and none can stay his hand." And we know that the Judge of the whole earth will do all things right; that "he is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works."

Moreover, Jesus the captain of our salvation "hath abolished death, brought life and immortality to light," and said "I, if I be lifted up from the earth will draw all men unto me." These testimonies from the sacred oracles, are sufficient to satisfy any candid mind, that what God has promised, he will also perform. "Let us hear then the conclusion of the whole matter."

Since all the nations, families, and kindreds of the earth are to be blessed in Christ, the seed of Abraham—which St. Paul calls the "Gospel," and St. Peter, "the restitution of all things"—since the Gospel brings life and immortality to light; since God hath been pleased to "make known unto us the mystery of his will, which he hath purposed in himself, according to his own good pleasure, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one, all things, in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth;" since he hath "made peace by the blood of the cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself," and since he "worketh all things after the counsel of his own will": we come to the grand, the glorious, sublime, and joyful conclusion, that all mankind—every son and daughter of Adam's posterity, whether Jew or Gentile, bond or free, will eventually be purified from sin and cleansed from all iniquity; have their robes made white in the blood of the Lamb, and be made partakers of the enjoyments of the saints in light; that they will meet around the dazzling throne of Jehovah, to chant the praises of redeeming grace and dying love; sing the song of Moses and the Lamb, and bask in the beatific delights of immortal glory throughout the ceaseless duration of eternal ages! In anticipation of the introduction and glorious consummation of the Gospel kingdom, well might the multitude of the heavenly host shout, "glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." And well may we "rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory"! Such, kind reader, is the conclusion in which we are warranted, by the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. In it we find a complete fulness. It begins in love, carries us joyfully and triumphantly through the turmoils and troubles of this mortal existence, and ends in immortal joys and endless life. This is a result which will satisfy the most ardent and longing desires of the mind. It is a result for which Christians of all denominations pray, which every new born babe in Christ most ardently desires to see accomplished, and which the word and faithfulness of Almighty God are pledged to perform. Oh! then let us believe, love and cherish the "glorious Gospel of the blessed God." Let us bind it to our hearts as "the pearl of great price." Let us take it as the man of our counsel, as a guide to our feet, and a lamp to our path, which will make our journey through life's rugged and uneven way, cheerful, bright and happy, light up the darkness of the tomb, and point the earth-worn pilgrim to scenes of unfading glory and celestial purity beyond the shores of time, to immortality and endless life for all the children of God.

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

LUKE X: 38-42.

There is scarcely any phrase more current among a certain class of religionists, than the one borrowed from this paragraph of Scripture—"There is one thing needful." This frequent occurrence in books and in pulpit addresses, of the phrase, "the one thing needful," is founded upon a mistranslation and misinterpretation of the original narrative. If we listen to some oral expositions of this passage, or turn to some usually received commentaries, we will find some such language as the following employed:—There is one thing absolutely necessary, and of infinitely greater concernment, than any merely domestic or secular cares, even the care to have the soul instructed in the saving knowledge of the way that leads to eternal life, and to secure a title to it. The favor of God is the only thing absolutely needful to our final happiness; the salvation of Christ is the only thing needful to us poor sinners. One thing is needful, even this that Mary hath done, to give herself up to the guidance of Christ. Serious godliness is a needful thing—it is the one thing needful; for nothing without this will do us any real good in this world, and nothing but this will go with us into another world. Such is the amount of the expositions we hear of this passage, in Orthodox pulpits—such the views presented us by the generality of Orthodox commentators. Dr. Doddridge, a very celebrated writer of this class, thus speaks of this view:—"This is one of the gravest and most important apothegms that ever was uttered: and one can scarce pardon the frigid impertinence of Theophylact and Basil, who explain it as if he only meant, one dish of meat is enough." Dr. Adam Clarke, notwithstanding this Orthodox denunciation, has the hardihood to espouse the interpretation of Basil; and in reply to Doddridge, thus expresses himself:—"Many eminent commentators, both ancient and modern, consider the text in the same way I have done. But this is termed by some, 'a frigid method of explaining the passage'; well, so let it be; but he that fears God, will sacrifice every thing at the shrine of TRUTH. I believe this alone to be the true meaning of the place, and I dare not give it any other."

Let us now examine whether the frigid or the flamingly pious commentators convey most exactly the meaning of Jesus; and having ascertained his real meaning, let us draw therefrom some useful lesson for ourselves.

Our Saviour seems to have been a frequent visitor at the house of Martha, Mary, and their brother Lazarus, in the village of Bethany. Being only two miles out of Jerusalem, it is probable he went out there frequently to spend the night when attending the three great festivals of the Jews in that city. It is supposed that Martha was a widow, and the mistress of the house. While Martha was busily employing herself about preparing for the entertainment of Jesus, Mary was so engaged with his conversation, as to neglect to assist her sister in cooking. This Martha seems to have thought neglectful, both to herself and their distinguished guest, and in this spirit appeals to Jesus, or perhaps apologises for the slowness of having something prepared for him, by alleging that Mary had left her alone to do every thing. According to the frigidists, this is his reply: "Martha, Martha, thou art troubling and perplexing thyself about many dishes, when only one is needful: now Mary hath chosen for herself that good portion of the entertainment which shall not be taken from her."—(Wakefield.) According to the pietists, we have the reply of Jesus in the words of the Common Version, and in the above common interpretation of them. At first sight, it is evident that the former reply is the more relevant, the most to the purpose of the two. We have examined the original also, and we think it is better expressed by the frigid than the pietist translation. These being the only two tests which we know, by which to try these rival versions, we must class ourselves with the "goodly company" of the frigidists.

We frequently think of this scene, and of the words of Jesus, when we witness people giving themselves great concern to prepare rich and varied food for the entertainment of their visitors, and when we see at the same, a lamentable lack of exertion to make their conversation interesting and profitable. We think with Jesus, that health and real enjoyment would be better secured by a simpler fare, and that instructive, rational conversation, is the better part of all social entertainment. Frequently it happens that the more the table is loaded, the less there is of a mental feast. To be contented with simple food, and to employ our social hours in profitable conversation—this, we think, was the lesson Jesus meant to enforce at Bethany, and we wish his professed disciples would imbibe it, and recommend its adoption throughout the length and the breadth of this highly favored land. "I speak as unto wise men, judge ye what I say." P. P.

UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATIONS—FOR 1838.

Minutes of the Niagara Association.

Met according to adjournment, in Lewistown, June 6th and 7th. Chose Br. C. Hammond, Moderator, and Br. N. Sawyer, Clerk. In the course of the session, made the appointments and transacted the business here named:

Appointments.—Br. C. Hammond, Royalton Centre, Standing Clerk. Brs. B. Cook, J. Fairbanks, and Tomlinson, to arrange the public services. Brs. Tomlinson, Hammond, and J. A. Zimmerman, Committee on fellowship and ordination, for the year ensuing; and Brs. Tomlinson, T. D. Cook, and W. Mudgett, on discipline, for the same term. Brs. T. D. Cook, N. Sawyer, (ministerial,) Elliot Lewis and W. Mudgett, (lay,) delegates to the State Convention, with powers to appoint their own substitutes, if necessary. Br Tomlinson to preach the next occasional sermon.

Adopted the Constitution drafted and submitted by Br. Hammond at the last session; and the report of the Committee on fellowship and ordination, in favor of ordaining Br. N. Sawyer at this session, and Br. T. D. Cook at the Conference in Gaines, in the ensuing week.

Resolved, 1st. That we earnestly recommend to our brethren and sisters, every where, but especially in this Association, to cherish and cultivate the social religious feelings, by the establishment of Sunday schools, Bible classes, and weekly conferences, wherever practicable. 2d. That the Standing Clerk of this Association, be requested to furnish, and cause to be published, a statistical report of the cause of Universalism in this Association; and that the Clerks of the several societies be requested to furnish, immediately, to the Standing Clerk, such information as may be necessary to make such report. 3d. That the several societies within this Association, be requested to take up a collection to defray the expenses of delegates to Association and Conventions, agreeably to the recommendation of the New-York State Convention, at its session in 1837. 4th. That when this Association adjourn, it adjourn to meet at Lockport, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in June next; but if inconvenient, the Standing Clerk be authorized to alter the place of adjournment, and give public notice of the same.

Order of the Ordination Services.—1. Reading the Scriptures, Br. K. Townsend. 2. Hymn. 3. Prayer, Br. T. D. Cook. 4. Hymn. 5. Sermon, Br. Grosh, 2 Tim. ii: 15. 6. Anthem by the Choir. 7. Ordaining prayer, Br. D. Pickering. 8. Charge and delivery of the Scriptures, Br. C. Hammond. 9. Right Hand of Fellowship, Br. T. P. Abell. 10. Music by the Choir. 11. Concluding Addresses, Br. D. Pickering.

Adjourned to meet agreeably to vote of the council.

Remarks.—The business of our council was conducted in harmony and peace. We regret to announce that some of the ablest societies in this Association, were not represented in our council, especially as the proceedings were of great importance to the welfare of Zion. We shall offer no apology for this neglect of an acknowledged duty, but would simply remark, that the new Constitution, adopted at this session, makes it incumbent upon societies in fellowship with this Association, to represent themselves hereafter in our council, either by letter or delegate, or lose their fellowship. Let not the world have occasion to apply that text of Scripture to us, which says, "The priests bear rule by their means; and my people love to have it so." A majority of the Committee of discipline did not appear in our council, and consequently we received no official report.

Several important resolutions, relating to the prosperity of our common cause, received the sanction of this Association. The establishment of Sunday schools, to instruct the young and tender mind in the first principles of the Christian religion, and to imbue their hearts with the love of virtue and truth; and the formation of Bible classes, for the mutual instruction of adults in the Holy Scriptures; and, weekly conferences of prayer and praise in our religious societies, to bind heart to heart and soul to soul, were unanimously recommended to our brethren and sisters, every where, as consistent with our social natures, and important to the interests of Zion.

The clerks of the different societies in this Association, are requested to furnish, as early as convenient, the necessary information to the Standing Clerk, of their present prospects and condition, as compared with last year, that he may publish with some degree of accuracy, a statistical report, to show whether Universalism is actually on "the decline," or not, in this Association. At present, we indulge the belief that our cause is gradually and permanently onward.

The recommendation to the societies to contribute to defray the expenses of delegates to Conventions, seems to be nothing more than an act of justice. It should meet with prompt attention.

The religious services of the sanctuary, were listened to with profound attention. Five discourses were delivered in the following order, by Brs. N. Sawyer, K. Townsend, C. Hammond, D. Pickering, and A. B. Grosh, which, we trust, may do some good in the name of Immanuel. Per order, C. Hammond.

Minutes of the Genesee Association.

Met according to adjournment, in Morganville, June 20th and 21st. Chose Br. J. Chase, Moderator, and T. P. Abell, Clerk. The following appointments were made, and business transacted, in the course of the session.

Appointments.—Br. W. E. Manley, Warsaw, Standing Clerk. Brs. Skeele, B. Caryl, and Dr. W. Stoddard, Committee on Discipline, for the year; and Brs. Manley, Skeele, and Kelsey, on Fellowship and Ordination, for same term. Br. Pickering to preach the occasional sermon. Br. Grosh to prepare the Minutes for publication in the "Union" and "Magazine."

Adopted the report of the Committee of Discipline—"no complaint"; and that of the Committee on Fellowship, granting a letter to Br. A. Kelsey.

Resolved, 1st. That the Standing Clerk record on the Book of Minutes, a full list of the societies in fellowship with this Association, and their location, and that said list be read and referred to by the Moderator, at future sessions, for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are duly represented. 2d. That we earnestly recommend to the Universalist community generally, and to the societies in this Association especially, the institution of Sunday schools, Bible classes, and Conference meetings, in all places where it is practicable, and thus cultivate the social religious feelings among them. 3d. That an article be prepared by Br. N. Sawyer, and published in our periodicals, recommendatory of Sunday schools, Bible classes, and Conference meetings. 4th. That the next session of this body be held in Gainesville, on the third Wednesday and following Thursday in June, 1839.

Sermons were preached by Brs. Andrews, Barnes, Chase, T. D. Cook, Grosh, and Pickering. Addresses by Br. Grosh. Prayers by Brs. N. Sawyer, Grosh, Skeele, Manley, and Flagler.

Lay Delegates.—Asa Cutter, Cyrenus Pond, Alabama; H. B. Torrance, Buffalo; Frederick S. Jones, Boston; S. Langworthy, Fordis Bannister, Stafford; James Sprague, Jun., Amasa Waite, Pavilion; J. H. Bolton, Almon Hart, Perry; Parmena Simpson, Esquire Emmons, Weatherfield.

Remarks.—The congregations were as large as the house could hold, and very attentive to services, which, it is humbly believed, were satisfactory to all, and beneficial to many, present. Our friends in Morganville, though few in number, manifested great hospitality, and we pray God they may increase more and more, in numbers and in faith, hope, and charity, under their beloved pastor, Br. Spaulding. The deliberations in council were calm, courteous, and affectionate—differences of opinion were not made differences in spirit, and we trust that each one has been benefited, and that the cause at large may be much prospered thereby. The right spirit is among our brethren of the Genesee Association—increase of social union—co-operation in the right means, and prudent, steady, united action must, if adopted, crown the wishes of their souls, with speedy fruition. Per order, A. B. Grosh.

Minutes of the Black River Association.

Met according to appointment, in Ellis village, June 20th and 21st. Chose Br. P. Morse, Moderator, and Br. W. H. Waggoner, Clerk. The following appointments were then made, and business transacted.

Appointments.—Brs. Persons, Jones, and Mendall, to arrange the public services. Brs. Waggoner, Morse and Persons, Committee on Fellowship and Ordination, for the session—C. B. Brown, Morse, and Jones, for the year; and Morse, Persons, and Cheevers, on Discipline, for one year. Brs. S. Jones, P. Morse, (ministerial,) D. Stearns, R. Fitch, (lay,) delegates to the State Convention. Br. Waggoner to preach the occasional sermon, also to prepare the Minutes.

Voted, to invite ministering brethren of other denominations to take part in the deliberations of the council—to adopt the report of the Committee on Discipline, "no complaint"—to recommend the several societies to take up collections for defraying the expences of delegates to the Conventions—that Conferences be held in Constantia, on the second Wednesday and Thursday in September next; in Denmark, on the last Wednesday and Thursday in December next; and in Antwerp, on the last Wednesday and Thursday in February, 1839.

Received the First Universalist Society of Denmark—do. of Henderson—do. of Constantia, into fellowship.

Adjourned to meet in Washingtonville, on the third Wednesday and following Thursday in June, 1839.

Lay Delegates Present.—Hiram Convers, Watertown; A. Sylvester, R. Meyers, Denmark; E. Palmer, I. Mendall, Ellis Village; R. Fitch, H. L. Miller, Constantia; N. Howe, A. Fobes, Sandy Creek; J. Ingalls, Wilna; C. Harris, I. Matterson, Henderson; E. Pease, T. A. Granger, Champion and Rutledge; Sanford Douglass, Mexico.

Ministers Present.—W. H. Waggoner, Watertown; P. Morse, Henderson; C. G. Persons, S. Jones, Ellis Village; J. A. Aspinwall, Leyden; J. French, Denmark; A. Williams, Hamilton; J. Britton, Carthage; G. S. Ames, Sheshequin, Pa.; W. Sias, Mansville; W. Martin, Constantia; O. Wilcox, Fowler.

Sermons were preached by Brs. Brown, Wilcox, Aspinwall, Martin, Britton, Waggoner, and Morse—the other brethren took part in the services.

Remarks.—The heavens were clear, and one thousand persons were privileged to meet and hold sweet communion together. The Gospel was preached clearly and powerfully, and the seed fell on good ground. Our hearts were warmed, and our souls filled with joy unspeakable and full of glory. Much gratitude is due to our kind friends in Ellisburg, for their hospitality—May theirs be a rich reward, and may every lover of the truth as it is in Jesus, prove faithful to Zion's cause. W. H. Waggoner.

MINUTES OF THE WESTERN GENERAL CONFERENCE

Met in second quarterly session, in Gaines, on June 13th and 14th, 1838. Appointed Br. S. Dutcher, Moderator; Br. T. P. Abell, Clerk; and Brs. T. D. Cook, J. Proctor, and W. W. Ruggles, a Committee on Public Services. After the ministers present had reported progress in carrying out the resolutions of the last session,

Resolved, 1st. That we recommend to the next session of this Conference, the discussion of the question—Is the observance of the Eucharist obligatory upon the genuine Christian? 2d. That we earnestly solicit of our friends and brethren a serious reconsideration of the resolutions passed at our last session. 3d. That we heartily recommend the spirit of the resolution passed at the late session of the Niagara Association, advising the formation of Sunday schools and Bible classes.

Voted, That Br. Abell prepare the Minutes for publication in the "Magazine" and "Union."

Adjourned to meet in Warsaw, Genesee county, on the third Wednesday and Thursday in August next.

Sermons were preached by Brs. J. M. Cook, Kelsey, N. Sawyer, Abell, and N. Brown The ordination of Br. T. D. Cook, took place on Thursday afternoon, as follows:—Reading select Scriptures, and introductory prayer, Br. Sawyer. Sermon, Br. Tomlinson. Ordaining prayer, Br. Abell. Delivery of Scriptures and Charge, Br. Tomlinson. Right hand of fellowship, Br Abell.

Ministers Present.—R. Tomlinson, Ridgeway; N. Sawyer, Medina; T. D. Cook, Gaines; A. Kelsey, Pavilion; N. Brown, Henrietta; James M. Cook, Chili; T. P. Abell, Rochester; S. Dutcher, Gaines.

Remarks.—Our meeting was a pleasant one. The attendance on the first day was not large. But there were worshippers enough gathered to claim the promise. The worship of the multitude is not always the most acceptable. The mingled devotions of a few congenial hearts, finds its way to heaven.

On the second day, many repaired to the house of God. And they listened to the word spoken. More than once we saw the tear of gratitude and filial trust brightening the eye of the child of God. And we deemed it was good to be there.

Br. Cook was ordained. The season was interesting. Many a heart was lifted heaven-ward in behalf of that young Herald, as he pledged his faithfulness before the altar of his Father. Long and effectually may he tell of that Father's love, even to an unpurged world.

The spirit of Universalism was in the council. No bitterness was there. We met and conversed in love. We parted in peace. And now we ask the lovers of truth and virtue, the friends of our holy cause, to bestir themselves in aid of suffering and misguided humanity, and in vindication of the character of a kind and compassionate God. Per order, T. P. Abell.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JULY 5, 1838.

INDEPENDENCE DAY.

Every American heart beats high in reviewing the deeds of the past, which have signalized this day above all others in the memory of a nation—of lovers of freedom. With its recollection are blended deeds of heroism and enterprize, physical and moral, whose splendor is not rivalled on the historic page—and trials of sorrow and of grief blend with the brighter portions of memory's picture, to soften their brilliancy and give greater effect to the causes for rejoicing and gratulation. Ames, Adams, Jefferson, Monroe—the eloquent, the learned, the wise, the philosophic statesmen of the pastage—this their day of departure, brings them renewedly to mind, and mingles afresh the mourning of a nation with our rejoicings—the requiem with the te Deum laudamus. We survey the past, baptised in blood and tears, and purified with the earthquake's fires of revolutionary war—and weep for those who fell. We look at the present in comparison, and by analogy trace the spread of the knowledge and practice of the glorious truth, that "All men are born free and equal," rolling its flood tides of freedom and blessedness over the barren desolations of despotism and tyranny in the future, and rejoice that the period is surely (however slowly) approaching, when man will every where, not merely be born, but exist free and equal. Clouds and darkness may intervene—troubles and sorrows may separate between us and that glorious period, but it will, it must come, sooner or later.

To the Christian, however, there is a higher and more glorious prospect opened in the revelation of God—the Declaration of a world's independence—the Gospel of Jesus Christ. The principle that God "hath made of one blood all nations of men," and "is the Father of them all," throws into one spacious arena heaven and earth, time and eternity, and exhibits the flood tide of divine truth overflowing the future with the cheering light and warmth of God's unpurchased and ceaseless love; drowning all hatred and malice, overcoming all ignorance and sin, and sweeping away every vestige of misery and anguish, until all shall be redeemed from the bondage of sin and error, and be made free—wholly free in the glorious liberty of the children of God—in the freedom of the resurrection to life and immortality.—Then shall all bondage, spiritual and earthly—social, religious, and political, cease, and cease forever. Then shall the perfect law of liberty have its uncontrolled dominion over every soul in the universe of God, and God be all in all.

Let, then, the day that is past have its proper weight on our minds—let it lead our souls upward, and still upward, in holy resolutions to combat and destroy all unlawful dominion over our souls and minds, until we are enabled, in coming years, to celebrate together, in heart and soul, not only our political, but our spiritual independence. A. B. G.

ENDLESS WO AND NATURE.

I suppose the believers in the doctrine of endless sin and misery, are so accustomed to their gloomy and revolting doctrine, that they do not always perceive or realize its paralyzing incongruity with the beauty and sublimity of God's works around them. Such may, I had almost said, must be the case, or they could not perpetually foist it into glowing descriptions of the most sublime, beautiful, and soul-cheering of God's works.—Just think of contrasting the cheerful music of ten thousand airy warblers, hymning their bountiful Creator's praises in the sunlight of a Sabbath morning, reflected in rainbow hues from the leafy woods, richly spangled with dew drops—contrasting this with the groans and shrieks of damned myriads in the murky gloom of an endless hell, reverberating from its dismal depths and smoke crusted sides! Why, if it is not downright impiety and blasphemy, it is so near akin to it, that a sensible and pious mind can scarcely tell the difference. It is worse than mingling the tones of marrow bone and cleaver—the filing of a hand saw and the creaking of rusty hinges, with a strain of soul-entrancing music, on a moon-lit lake, at midnight's silent hour.

Such thoughts were awakened in my mind, by reading a description of Niagara Falls, by a Partialist divine in which he said that the roar of the boiling and foaming waters in their vast abyss, brought to his mind the damned groaning in hell—and the rising spray reminded him of the smoke of their torments ascending up for ever and ever! Verily, thought I, you must have had extatic pleasure in viewing this wonderful work of God—in hearing this whisper of the Almighty's voice, speaking to his children of their Father's wondrous goodness, majesty, and might! I know not how it may be to others, but I would not have such a cruel and revolting creed, to mingle its scenes of endless agony and sin with the purest and holiest feelings of adoration and joy I ever felt, while viewing the Falls, for all the honors of this world, for all the enjoyments of fancied endless superiority to my fellow-beings that spiritual pride could ever yield. If a benevolent soul, the Partialist amid such scenes of wondrous beauty and majesty, must be rendered wretched, indeed, by his torturing creed; for oh, contrast it but with the emotions a Universalist must feel amid the works of God, and how vast the difference! The glorious bow—the sparkling spray—the rolling snow-white foam—the flashing waters surrounded by brightest flowers and greenest verdure—the awe-inspiring sound filling the air above, beneath, around, with the melody of almost oppressive majesty—the rock-girt abyss—the bounding waves of the rapids, leaping in freedom and shaking their white crested tops high in air, as they rejoiced to run their race—all—spoke but to me of a Father in heaven, who poured these tokens of his loveliness and beauty, his all-affectionate majesty and might around me, that I might the better feel him in my mind, and reverence and adore him in my inmost soul with all subduing tenderness and love. And (in humility I say it) he who has not felt these emotions devoid of the terrors of endless wrath and cruelty, has had a lethargy or a poison in his soul that gangrened his vision and obscured the greatest beauties of the lovely sight. UNIVERSALISM IN WESTERN NEW-YORK.

Some dissatisfaction exists among some of our good brethren in the section through which I travelled lately, in regard to various articles published in this paper, representing the cause there as in a declining state. Not knowing what was the state of affairs there some time ago, my observations did not enable me to judge whether any decline existed or not. The places languid now, may always have been languid—those where our friends are numerous and active, may now be less so than formerly. I can only say, that in many places a want of energy does exist, as well as in this region, and that there are too many who are professed Universalists, who manifest it not by any action, not even by attendance on public worship in their neighborhoods. Some whole societies, that might have preaching statedly, as well as not, have none even occasionally, except at the expence of the preacher! These things exist there, as well as here, though it gives an honest and warm-hearted Universalist the heart-ache to mention them; but on the whole, considering the state of pecuniary matters, the reaction in business, and the great emigration of many of our best friends in many sections, to the "Far West," there appears to be much room for approbation—more, probably, than for censure—every where. I incline to believe that in the Genesee Association, our cause is more prosperous than in the Niagara—and that in the Chautauque, with a few exceptions, it is in a better state now than it has been for some years. But of this, time alone must be the test. When the present depression of business and misfortunes shall have passed away, I think it will be found that our cause will again revive there, and flourish better than ever. A. B. G.

THE RECORD.

Conventions.—The Massachusetts Convention of Universalists, met in Salem, on the 6th ult. Br. H. Ballou, 2d, was appointed Moderator, and Br. Isaac Brown, Clerk. Fifty-eight clergymen and a large number of delegates were present. During one service, it is said there was not less than twelve hundred persons present. Letters of Fellowship were granted to five brethren, and one was ordained.

The Illinois State Convention met at Henderson, Knox county, May 11th, and chose Br. E. Mann, Moderator, and Br. A. R. Gardner, Clerk. The Convention was well attended, and eight sermons were preached during the session.

Associations.—The Merrimack River Association of Universalists, met in Hopkinton, N. H., May 30th, and chose Br. Robert Bartlett, Moderator, and Br. J. P. Atkinson, Clerk. Br. R. Bartlett is the Standing Clerk of this Association.

The Somerset (Me.) Association of Universalists, was convened at the Academy in Anson, on Wednesday, May 30th. Sermons were preached by Brs. F. W. Baxter, D. D. Smith, G. Smith, and C. C. Burr.—Br. D. Forbes continues as the Standing Clerk.

Removals.—Br. H. W. Morse, from Milford to West Scituate, Mass., where he wishes to be addressed. Br. J. P. Atkinson, from Meredith Bridge to Weare. Br. S. P. Landers, from Prompton to Bethany, Pa., where he wishes to be addressed. Br. J. Gilman, from Concord, N. H., takes charge of the societies in Tynsboro' and Dunstable, Mass. Br. J. Potter has taken his residence in Fort Plain, where he wishes to be addressed until further notice.

Ordinations.—Rev. J. P. Harris, of New Portland, Maine, was ordained to the work of the ministry of reconciliation, in Anson, May 31st Br. H. was a short time since excluded from the fellowship of the Orthodox Congregational church in Waterville, for believing in a world's salvation. Br. Stillman Barden was also ordained on Thursday, the 7th ult., at Salem, during the session of Massachusetts Convention.

INSTALLATIONS.—Br. M. H. Smith was installed on Wednesday, the 6th ult., as pastor of the Universalist Society in Salem, Mass. Br. H. Ballou, 2d, was installed pastor of the Universalist Society in Medford, on the 20th ult.

NEW LABORER.—Rev. Sydney A. Turner, a Congregational clergyman in Maine, has renounced the sentiments of that order, and embraced the faith every where spoken against. He is represented, even by his former friends, as a worthy and talented man.

NEW MEETINGHOUSE.—The first Universalist Society in Boston, have taken measures for erecting a new church, to be built upon the site now occupied by the old one. What must gratify our friends in Boston, and all others who possess the spirit of Christianity, is, that the Unitarian societies under the care of Revs. Messrs. Robbins and Parkman, have offered their houses for the use of the Universalists on the Sabbath, at such hours as will not interfere with its regular occupants, while the new house is building. Will our opposing brethren in this region, examine themselves in this mirror?

CONVENTIONAL SERMON.

The following letter from Br. Montgomery will speak for itself. The error was copied by our printers from the proof sheet of the Union, of course, and not noticed by the person who read our proof in my absence at the West. I can fully sympathise with Br. M. in the grievance, having had some experience in the matter myself.

Auburn, June 26th, 1838.

Br. A. B. G.—Did you ever bestow great pains upon a sermon—read it a dozen times, to know that it was perfectly fitted for the press, then have it printed and sent to 14,000 subscribers, with one of the most ridiculous blunders, made at the hands of the printer, which ever vexed a poor author? If you have, then you know how I feel.

In the manuscript of my Conventional Sermon, I did not write out some of the passages, but put down the chapter and verse, and requested Br. Price to quote them. In section 2d, third column, page 2 of the Magazine, Romans xiii: 9, 10, occurs—but instead of quoting Romans, they quoted Acts xiii: 9, 10—and it has gone out so, to all the subscribers of both papers. Truly, I have a great mind never to send another sermon to publish. I need not say, for you can tell how mortified I feel. The evil can be repaired in a small degree, by a notice. Ever thine, G. W. MONTGOMERY.

Will each one of our readers turn to the paper containing the above named sermon, and cross out the words there quoted? If skilful enough, they can paste over them a slip of paper containing the proper words of Romans xiii: 9, 10—"For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, thou shalt not kill, thou shalt not steal, thou thou shalt not bear false witness, thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. Love worketh no ill to his neighbor, therefore love is the fulfilling of the law."

THE EXPOSITOR

Br. H. Ballou, 2d, Editor of this valuable periodical, apologizes for the delay in appearance of the number now due. He has been disappointed in expected copy, and has, of course, to delay its appearance for a few weeks.

This failure of copy is a great and very annoying evil attendant on works wholly made up of original and labored articles, as I happen to know by a very little experience acquired in conducting the Christian Visitant. But surely, among so many talented and literary men as may be found in our order at the East, there can be no sufficient cause for such an evil. The brethren there, too, all seemed anxious to have the work go on—where are the productions from the pens of these anxious brethren, the most of whom have leisure enough to furnish such articles? Look over the two numbers already issued, and where are they? Look for the present number, delayed for weeks for the want of a few articles, and where are they? Echo answers, Where?

Though not entitled by my past labors thus to write, yet believing that I have some reasonable excuse for not having furnished an article, I would thus stimulate our Eastern brethren to good works—even provoke them to jealousy, if I could. Look, then, over the pages of the Expositor—deduct what has been furnished by brethren in this State, and by its industrious Editor, and what meagre evidence do they furnish of the zeal of our able brethren at the East in favor of the work! Come, brethren, these things (or rather no things) ought not so to be. A. B. G.

TO PRINTERS AT THE WEST.

The following is from an aged brother—a revolutionary pensioner—and I could not refuse it a place, for I hope it may do his aged heart much good. Will some friends at the West see that it is copied into the papers published in the places named in the advertisement? It will be but a trifling trouble to them, though an important matter to our aged brother. A. B. G.

INFORMATION WANTED.

James Montgomery Prescott was married in Louisville, Ky., some ten or twelve years ago, to Hannah Eaton, daughter of Moses R. and Rebecca Eaton—Rebecca being the daughter of Samuel and Hannah Rogers. They left Louisville the year next after their marriage, for St. Louis, or the lead mines, and their parents and grand parents have not heard of them since. The mother of Mrs. Prescott (said Hannah Eaton) is now dead, and two of her sisters are now here with me. We wish to ascertain the residence of Mr. Prescott and his wife, if yet living—or their fate, if dead. Letters containing such information, will be thankfully received. Address to my name, at Dunkirk, Chautauque county N. Y.

SAMUEL ROGERS,
Grandfather of said Hannah Eaton.

☞ Printers in St. Louis, Galena, Du Buque, etc., are respectfully requested to copy the above.

BOOKS.

A large assortment of various Universalist, Unitarian, and miscellaneous books have lately been received at our Bookstore—among which are Br. Paige's Questions for Sunday Schools and Bible Classes; Br. Balch's Lectures on Language (or English Grammar) Anti-Phrenologists Unmasked, by Dr. Caldwell; Greene's and Bartlett's Addresses; Christianity and Phrenology, by Dr. Epps; Poyen's History of Animal Magnetism; Dr. Alcott's works, consisting of The Young Wife, The Mother in her Family, and the Young Housekeeper—besides a great variety of other books, pamphlets, stationary, etc., etc., most of which are well worthy extensive circulation and perusal.

It is our aim, besides keeping such books as will sell, to keep such as should sell, and to urge their sale as much as we possibly, reasonably and modestly can; for to do good in this way is as much our duty, when in our power, as in any other way. We endeavor also to make ourselves acquainted with the character of all works kept on hand, and will not sell those which we believe to be pernicious on the whole. This must be our apology, if any is needed, for occasionally noticing books in this way in our paper. A. B. G.

THE REGISTER AND ALMANAC.

From present appearances, our generous brethren will supply us with ample and correct information for this work, so that the number for 1839, will be an improvement on former numbers. The time is too short for us to make it all we wish to have it; but what there is of it, will be as correct, probably, as such a work can be made—thanks to our brethren East, South, and West, who have aided us. It will be out in August.

WM. S. SIMONDS, formerly of Ridgeway, Orleans county, who owes this office $10, is, probably, somewhere in Jefferson county. Some agent who may chance to learn his present location, would confer a favor by informing us where he is, and a still greater one by collecting the amount.

Br. Tompkins—Credit S. W. Carpenter, and Sarissa Murdock, (new sub.,) Le Roy, Genesee county, each $2—Joseph Pond, Oakfield, Genesee county, $2—Br. L. L. Spalding, Morganville, (Stafford,) same county, $3—Mrs. S. H. Morse, Miss Rhoda Warner, (new subs.,) both of Henderson, Jefferson county, each $2—R. B. Gibson, Detroit, Mich.; John McCrea, Natchez, Miss.; and Miss Elizabeth Merrit, Sherburne, Chenango county, (all new subs.,) each $2—and Miss Susan Hayden, Merrickville. U. C., (new sub.,) $1—and charge G. and H.

Br. Price—Credit S. B. Murdock, Ridgeway, $2—S. T. Slade, Darien Centre, $3 25, and discontinue at close of time paid for—and charge G. and H.

☞ Subscribers to the "Union," "Repository," "Trumpet," etc., are informed that we do not always order credit, etc., to be given to them in the above manner; but whenever it is convenient, we send on their orders by private letters, in preference. Br. W. H. W.'s was so forwarded. G. and H.

NOTICE.

The unexpected and urgent demand for my ministerial labors in this place, (some account of which, will be seasonably given in this paper,) and some considerations relating to the health of my family, have rendered it my duty to relinquish my intended western tour, at least for the present. I have arrived at this conclusion with some reluctance, on account of the disappointment which it has been to myself, and which must be produced in those places in which our Christian friends have had reason to expect me; though it is a great privilege to continue with those with whom I have long been intimately acquainted.

To have refused to remain here, notwithstanding the expression of my design to visit the western country, would have been to shrink from duty providentially and clearly pointed out. If I have raised expectations which must, at least for the present, be disappointed, I have done it in good faith, from a sense of duty, and on account of the circumstances in which I have been placed. "A man's heart deviseth his way; but the Lord directeth his steps." P. MORSE.

FRAGMENT OF A STORY.

One Summer eve, in olden times,
When sprites and fays were known,
And elfin tricks and merry ways
Were common talk in town—
A troop of faries, ripe for fun,
To earth in haste did glance,
And lighting on the dewy sward,
Swept off the mist, to dance.

And soon with happy laugh and shout
They flew on moonlight beams,
And wildly frolicked on the grass
And filled the air with screams.
At length, one little, panting fay,
Fatigued almost to death,
Hid close within a small rose-bud
To catch a moment's breath.

And as it, sighing, lay and rocked,
It reached a tiny arm
And begged the rosebud's "smallest leaf
For a fan," it was "so warm!"
The waving of the fresh-plucked leaf
Drew forth a sweet, faint breath,
That slowly rose and sailed away
O'er silent wood and heath.

Upon the heath it gladly joined
Some zephyrs, sleeping there.
And playing with the drowsy reeds,
Gave music to the air.
And stronger now it hastened on,
But just at break of day,
It stopped upon a lady's bower
Precisely in its way.

It revelled there, well pleased to stay
'Mid sweets a few short hours;
But soon it rose and flew away,
Filled with the scent of flowers.
It paused a moment o'er a brook—
Kissed a bright lake's fair face—
And up a mountain's rugged side
It pressed with quickened pace.

Upon the top, eternal snows
Chilled the soft breeze's breath,
And down it rushed to warmer climes
Among the vales beneath.
With hurried flight, o'er rivers broad,
And o'er the groaning wood,
It touched the light waves' snowy foam
And waked still solitude.

And now, with scream and sullen roar,
It sweeps the ocean's breast,
And furious to the murky skies
Heaves up the billow's crest.
The gallant vessel meets its wrath
And like a bird is tost;
Her snowy sails, her giant frame,
Are rent—she's wrecked—she's lost!

And thus, the sigh a rose leaf raised,
That scarce a leaf could wave,
Ere coming of another dawn
Sweeps thousands to the grave.

MORAL.

This moral on the mind impress—
"Your smallest action scan"—
For much oft flows from things as slight
As the flirt of a Fairy's fan.

THE LOVE OF READING.

We recommend to all parents who have at heart the best interest of their children, to infuse into them in the earliest years, a love of reading. The advantages, says an eminent writer, are great: and it exercises an influence over the destinies of the future man, which few, without reflection would suppose. The effects even in childhood are beneficial and evident to the most careless observer. The reading child is superior in temper, docility and knowledge to his book-hating companions: he is not so fond of mischief; and he does not contract so many bad habits. He takes, at school, a stand higher than his fellows; and when grown to manhood outstrips them in most of the rivalries of life. Every father, especially every father in the country, should provide himself with a library of entertaining books, taking care to add to it according to his means, such new productions as are really of value. A few dollars laid out, and dear as books are supposed to be, a very small sum will produce an excellent little family library, will bring him a better interest, if he can look for it in the advancement of his offspring, than if vested in the most gainful of stocks. From the nature of farmers' occupation, and their distance from towns, the education of their children must be defective; and to them books will prove more valuable, as they are actually more necessary, than to the children of any other classs.

EXTRAORDINARY INSTANCE OF GAMBLING.—It is well known upon the western waters, that the firemen and other hands employed upon the boats spend much of their idle time in playing cards. Of the passion for gaming, thus excited, an instance has been narrated to us upon the most credible authority, which surpasses the highest wrought fiction of the gambler's fate. A colored fireman, on board a steam boat running between this and New-Orleans, had lost all his money at poker with his companions. He then staked his clothing, and being still unfortunate, pledged his own freedom for a small amount, losing this, the bets were doubled, and he finally, at one desperate hazard, ventured his full value as a slave, and laid down his free papers to represent the stake. He lost, suffered his certificates to be destroyed, and was actually sold by the winner to a slave dealer, who hesitated not to take him at a small discount upon his assessed value.

If religion, says law, in his "Serious call to a Holy Life," commands us to live wholly unto God, and do all to his glory, it is because every other way is living wholly against ourselves, and will end in our shame and confusion of face.

MARRIAGES.

In Hartland, March 18th, by Rev. C. Hammond, Mr. WILLIAM S. FENN, of the firm of Dunlap and Co., of Middleport, to Miss EMILY MARIA SPALDING, of the former place.

In Shelby, March 28th, by the same, Mr. WM. BARKER, to Miss ELEANOR SANDERSON, both of that town.

In Royalton, April 18th, by the same, Mr. JOHN DAY, to Miss CATHARINE WATSON, both of that town.

In the same town, April 19th, by the same, Mr. GEORGE MORSE, of the firm of Calendar and Co., to Miss PHILENA RICHARDSON, of that town.

In the Universalist meeting-house in Clarendon, Mr. HENRY KIRBY, of Charlton, Saratoga county, to Miss CAROLINE FIDELIA ANDREWS.

In Champion, June 7th, by Rev. J. Britton, Jr., Mr. PERLEY BLODGETT, to Miss LUCINDA EARL, both of that place.

DEATHS.

In Hamilton village, May 14th, Mr. JAMES MOSHER, aged about 46 years. May the rich consolations of mercy comfort the surviving friends and relatives, that they may not mourn as those who have no hope. Sermon by Br. Williams.

In Marshall, on the 15th ult., Mrs. ELIZABETH HEWETT. She lived 65 years, 4 months, and 11 days, during which time she became the mother of a large and respectable family. They appreciate her worth and revere her memory: and tell to the world, in their prudent walk and conversation, the virtuous nature of her life and influence, and her meetness for the inheritance of the saints in light. A holy confidence in the living God, is a spring of peace in life, and a rich source of consolation in death. Trust in him all ye people. Funeral services attended by J. G. McADAM.

In the same place, 17th ult., MINERVA ANN GEER, daughter of Mr. Amos Geer, aged 2 years and 7 weeks. Of such is the kingdom of heaven. Funeral services by J. G. McA.

In Groveland, (Scott's Corners) May 11, Mr. WM. VIBBER, aged 38 years.

In Springfield, Erie county, Pa, May 19th, after a short but severe illness, Mr. OLIVER SMITH, aged 71 years. He lived a firm believer in the doctrine of impartial grace, and died in the hope of a glorious immortality beyond the grave.

In Canisteo, in March last, HELEN, consort of Phineas Stephens, and daughter of Uriah Meribah Upson, in the 19th year of her age. Thus were this happy pair who were married in February previous, doomed to be separated by the cold unfeeling hand of death.

In Bath, April 20th, EUNICE, consort of Asahel Mathewson, aged 65 years. She had many friends and died much lamented. She lived in accordance with the doctrine which she believed, and died in the triumphs of that faith which embraces a lost world in the arms of omnipotent Goodness.

In Cohocton, April 30th, PHEBE CHAPMAN, daughter of Eleazer and Elizabeth Tucker, aged 21 years.

In Independence, Allegany county, May 29th, LEONARD HAZLETON, aged 45 years. He died as he lived, an unwavering Christian and firm believer in the salvation of the world.

In Bath, May 20th, SARAH MARIA WALKER, aged 14 years. She was truly a pattern of virtue, and a believer in an all-sufficient Saviour, and gave up her life with all the resignation which could be expected in riper years.

In Cohocton, June 12, LOUISA, daughter of Peter and Adah Haight, aged 14 years. Sermons were delivered on the above named occasions by the writer, and the consolations of the Gospel administered to mourning friends and relatives. May the God of all peace be with them and give them the "joys which he hath prepared for those who love the Son." M. L. WISNER.

In Henderson, Jefferson county, on the 31st of May, after a painful illness, MRS. DORCAS HUNGERFORD consort of Mr. Seelye Hungerford, aged 54 years. Faithful in all the duties of domestic life, she lived and died a practical Christian, and her memory will be fondly cherished by her bereaved family and many friends.

PROSPECTUS

Of the tenth volume, of the Universalist Watchman, Impartialist, and Christian Repository.

J. WALLACE, E. BALLOU AND J. WRIGHT, EDITORS.

The tenth volume will commence on the 30th inst.—The Watchman is one of our oldest periodicals. [Having been commenced, under the title of the Christian Repository, in July, 1820, by Br. Loveland, in Woodstock, Vt.—making 18 years since its commencement.]

That the Watchman may maintain its present elevated standing in community and be still more interesting to its patrons, the services of Rev. Jonathan Wallace have been engaged to superintend as principal Editor. He will devote his undivided attention to its interests—and from his well known Christian character, and his ability as a writer, having had awarded him, a few years since, by one of our most popular journals, a prize for the literary productions of his disciplined and highly cultivated mind, the proprietor thinks it not unreasonable to expect the continued patronage of all old friends, as well as a large increase to his subscription list.

The Proprietor deems it sufficient to say, that the character of the Watchman will remain unaltered. It will still keep in view the following objects, viz:

1. To defend and illustrate the Gospel of Christ, which brings "life and immortality to light," for the whole human family.

2. To give dissertations, essays and sermons, on doctrinal, practical and moral subjects—explanations of difficult passages of Scripture—notices of changes in the ministry, new works, Associations and Conventions—in fine, every thing of general interest to the Universalist denomination.

3. To furnish the news of the day, intelligence on the sciences in general, new improvements and discoveries.

CONDITIONS.

The Watchman will be afforded at 1.50 per year, if paid within three months; 2.00 if within the year; and 2.50 if delayed until the expiration of the year.

Persons obtaining six subscribers, and becoming responsible for the same, shall receive a seventh copy therefor, so long as they retain their responsibility.

N. PACKARD, Proprietor.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

No. 29.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.

Utica, July 9, 1838.

Dear Sir—in addition to the arguments already before our readers in favor of the final salvation of all men, I present you with the following further scriptural reasons for entertaining this faith.

2. Because David, an inspired prophet of the Most High, declares unequivocally that "all the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee. For the kingdom is the Lord's and he is the governor among the nations." Ps. xxii: 27, 28. Here notice that by the expression, "all the ends of the world," is meant all people in all parts of the earth; and lest the universality of the language should still be questioned, he repeats the substance of it as applying to all nations in still stronger terms; and lest a single soul of the human family should be left out, he says, "all the kindreds of the nations." By the expression, "shall remember," it is implied that they had not yet remembered; and by, "shall worship before thee," is implied ultimate, hearty and sincere reconciliation and devotion. The Psalmist assigns the best of all possible reasons for this result, viz: that "the kingdom is the Lord's and He is the governor among the nations." Had the kingdom been the devil's and he the governor among the nations, no such happy result could have been anticipated; and there would have been some plausible ground for your gloomy doctrine of endless damnation.

3. Because David also declares of Christ, that "He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth"—that "all kings shall fall down before him; all nations shall serve him." Ps. lxxii: 8, 11. What expressions of greater universality than the above, could the Psalmist have used, had he intended to teach the salvation of all men?

4. Because the Psalmist further declares, "All nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship before thee, O Lord, and shall glorify thy name." Ps. lxxxvi: 9. Now as there is no nation but what God has made, and all nations that he has made shall come and worship before him in such a manner as to glorify his name, there is no other conclusion to which we can come but this, that all shall experience a saving conversion and become the participants of salvation.

5. Because God declares by the prophet Isaiah, "Look unto me, and be ye saved all the ends of the earth; for I am God and there is none else. I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear, surely shall say, in the Lord have I righteousness and strength." Isa. xlv: 22-24. Who shall gainsay the irrevocable oath of the immutable Jehovah? His word and his oath are pledged, and "it is impossible for God to lie."

6. Because St. Paul reiterates the same sentiment and applies its consummation to the dominion of Christ. After speaking of the humiliation and obedience of Christ, he says, "Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him and given him a name which is above every name; that at (in) the name of Jesus every knee should bow of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father." Philip. ii: 9-11.

7. Because the same apostle also says, (1 Cor. xii: 3,) that "no man can say that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost." Hence, as all shall confess him Lord, and that "to the glory of God the Father," it is evident that the divine spirit must then be and abide with each and all.

8. Because God promised that in the seed of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, all the nations, and families, and kindreds of the earth should be blessed. "In thee shall all families of the earth be blessed." "All the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him." "In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." "In thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." "In thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed." Gen. xii: 3; xviii: 18; xxvi: 4; xxviii: 14; Acts iii: 25. If there be on the face of the earth a solitary individual who is not of any nation, or any family, or who is not a kindred of the earth, then that individual may not be included in the Gospel covenant; otherwise he must be blessed in Christ, if God's oath and promise be true.

9. Because Christ was the promised seed of the patriarchs in whom this blessing was to be bestowed and shared, and therefore the blessing was of a spiritual instead of a temporal nature, and clearly implied the salvation of those that were to be blessed. "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, and to seeds, as of many; but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ." Gal. iii: 16.

10. Because God has made in Zion, a feast of fat things for all people. "And in this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees; of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the less well refined. And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the vail that is spread over all nations." Isa. xxv: 6, 7. It matters not, so far as the result is concerned, how thick the face of the covering or how dense the vail of darkness that may now obscure the mental vision of individuals or nations. It shall be pierced by the potent beams of the great Sun of righteousness: yea, it shall be utterly destroyed and known no more forever: and all people and nations shall see as they are seen and know as they are known, and thus partake of the feast of fat things for all people.

11. Because Jesus, the promised Messiah, the seed of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, in whom all nations, families and kindreds of the earth were to be blessed, has given "himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time"—"by the grace of God, has tasted death for every man"—"is a propitiation for the sins of the whole world"—and is called "the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world." John i: 29; 1 Tim. ii: 6; Heb. ii: 9; 1 John ii: 2.

12. Because by his death he was to conquer and destroy death, and him that hath the power of death. "Forasmuch, then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil, and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject unto bondage." His triumph over death is to be so complete that the challenge may be triumphantly given, "O death where is thy sting!"- "O grave where is thy victory?" Heb. ii: 14, 15; 1 Cor. xv: 55.

13. Because God hath promised not only the destruction of death and every thing that can disturb or mar the felicity of his children, but also that he will wipe away all tears from off all faces. "He will swallow up death in victory, and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces, and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth; for the Lord hath spoken it." "And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away." Isa. xxv: 8; Rev. xxi: 4.

14. Because God is to write his law in every heart and put it in every mind—he is to be the God of all, and all are to be his people—he is to be with and bless all—all are to know, love and serve him. Jer. xxxi: 33, 34; Heb. viii: 10, 11; Ps. lxxii: 8, 11; Rev. xxi; 2, 3.

15. Because to know and love God and Jesus Christ, as we have assurance that all shall do at last, is life eternal—is equivalent to and synonymous with salvation. "This is life eternal that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." "Every one that loveth is born of God and knoweth God—God is love and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him," and this is salvation. John xiv: 23; xvii: 3; 1 John iv: 7, 16.

16. Because the very judgments, punishments and chastisements, which God inflicts on mankind, so far from being designed to injure, are especially designed for their benefit—to humble, subdue, correct and amend; and therefore can not be in contravention of his numerous promises of universal salvation. "Is the law against the promises of God? God forbid!" "For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. If ye be without chastisement whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards and not sons. Furthermore, we have had fathers of the flesh who corrected us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection to the Father of spirits and live? For they verily chastened us after their pleasure; but he [God] for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness. Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby." "The Lord will not cast off forever; but though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies. For he doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men." "If his children forsake my law, and walk not in my judgments, if they break my statutes and keep not my commandments; then will I visit their transgressions with the rod and their iniquities with stripes. Nevertheless, my loving kindness will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail. My covenant will I not break nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips." Gal. iii: 21; Heb. xii: 6-11; Lam. iii: 31-33. See also Isa. liv: 1-8, and lvii: 16-21, and Matt. xxiii: 34-39; Ps. lxxxix: 30-34. Thus, whatever iniquities may be committed, and whatever judgments or punishments God may see fit to inflict on mankind, they cannot nullify his promise, or cause him to break his oath and covenant, in which he has pledged his veracity to bless in Christ all the nations, families and kindreds of the earth.

17. Because the righteousness in Christ, and the justification of man unto life through him are to be as universal as the reign and condemnation of sin. "As by the offence of one, judgment, came upon all men unto condemnation, even so by the righteousnes of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life. For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many [hoi polloi, the many, the multitude, or the mass of mankind] be made righteous." Rom. v: 18, 19. This you allow to be a proper antithesis, and contend that "the words on both sides are to be taken in the same extent of meaning." How then can you avoid the conclusion that all are to be made righteous in Christ?

18. Because, although sin greatly abounds and subjects its infatuated votaries to great and protracted miseries, yet the apostle declares that "where sin abounded, grace did MUCH MORE abound; that as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign, through righteousness, unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. v: 20, 21. From this testimony it must be clear, that grace shall not only reign as extensively as sin has, that is, universally among men, but more powerfully, more effectually and more lastingly. But if it does not, and if it should not remove and do away all the evils of sin, and bestow greater good than was previously enjoyed, then it cannot be true that grace abounds "much more than sin."

19. Because the same creature, (that is the whole creation,) that was subjected to vanity, frailty and bondage, shall be emancipated into the glorious liberty of the sons of God. "For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope; that the creature (ktisis, creation) itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God." Rom. viii: 20,21.

20. Because Christ is repeatedly called the Saviour of the world—and he cannot be the Saviour of the world if only a part of the world is ever saved. "We have heard him ourselves and know that this is, indeed, the Christ, the Saviour of the world." "And we have seen and do testify that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world." John iv: 42; 1 John iv: 14.

21. Because Christ is the seed of the woman which was to bruise the serpent's head, figuratively representing the destruction of evil; and it is expressly declared of him that "for this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil." 1 John iii: 8.

22. Because Christ prayed not only for his friends and disciples in a special manner, but also for the world, for which he gave himself a ransom, not excepting his very murderers. John xvii: 2, 9, 21, 22, 23; Luke xxiii: 34.

23. Because Christ never prayed against, but in accordance with the will of God, and he declares that he "knew that the Father always heard him when he prayed." Matt. xxvi: 42; John xi: 41, 42; xviii: 11.

24. Because we have the promise of the fulness of the Gentiles coming in, and all Israel being saved. "It is a light thing that thou shouldst be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob and to restore the preserved of Israel; I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation to the ends of the earth." "For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, (lest ye should be wise in your own conceits,) that blindness in part is happened unto Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in: and so all Israel shall be saved." Isa. xlix: 6; Rom. xi: 25, 26.

25. Because the doctrine of universal salvation alone accords with the commands and the teachings of Christ. "I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you, and persecute you: that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven," etc. Now, unless God loves his enemies and blesses those that curse him, etc., there certainly is no propriety in urging mankind to do it that they may be like him. Matt. v: 44–48.

26. Because God is called the Saviour of all men, and his grace is said to bring salvation to all men. "For therefore we both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe." "For [correctly translated] the grace of God that bringeth salvation to all men hath appeared, teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world." 1 Tim. iv: 10; Titus ii: 11, 12.

27. Because God has given to mankind eternal life in Christ, and unbelief cannot destroy it, nor nullify its truth and verity. "He that believeth on the Son of God, hath the witness in himself: he that believeth not God, hath made him a liar: [i. e., treated him as such;] because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son. And THIS IS THE RECORD, that God hath given to us ETERNAL LIFE; and this life is in his Son." "For what if some did not believe? Shall their unbelief make the faith [fidelity] of God without effect? God forbid: yea, let God be true, though every man were a liar." 1 John v: 10, 11; Rom. iii: 3, 4. Thus eternal life is truly the gift of God to man in Christ, whether man believes it or not. And whenever man believes this truth, whether here or hereafter, and not till then, will he enter into the enjoyment of that which is as true without as with his faith.

28. Because the law of God requires all mankind to love him with all the heart, soul, mind and strength, and their neighbors as themselves. "On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." Obedience to these two commandments is the only medium of fulfilling the law and the prophets. Love, and love only, is the fulfilling of the law. And we are assured that not one "jot or tittle of the law shall fail until all be fulfilled." Matt. v: 17, 18; Luke x: 27; xvi: 17. And as "God has spoken of the restitution of all things by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began," both the law and the prophets require the salvation of all men in order to their fulfilment. If one poor soul should remain in endless rebellion and unreconciliation, as much as one jot or tittle of the law would forever fail and remain unfulfilled.

29. Because a universal resurrection of all men to life in Christ Jesus, is plainly and positively declared in the Holy Writ: and furthermore, that "if any man be in Christ he is a new creature—old things are past away, and all things are become new." "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ [not out of him] shall all be made alive." 1 Cor. xv: 22. See the whole chapter, and 2 Cor. v: 17. Here you acknowledge is another perfect antithesis, the words "all men" in both parts of which are "to be taken in the same extent of meaning."

30. Because "every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea and all that are in them," shall ultimately unite in one universal anthem of praise, and exclaim, "Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." Rev. v: 13.

31. Because in that grand and glorious consummation, predicted by the foregoing Scriptures, when Christ delivers up the reconciled kingdom to the Father, God shall become all in all, to each one of his offspring; and when he is in them all and all are in him spiritually, understandingly, and truly, then will all be perfectly holy and consequently perfectly happy. "Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority and power. For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. Death, the last enemy, shall be destroyed. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that GOD MAY BE ALL IN ALL." 1 Cor. xv: 24–28.

32. To the scores of Scripture testimonies here adduced, multitudes more might be added were it necessary. But this I deem unneccessary for any minds, unless it be those deeply imbued with prejudice and obstinately determined in unbelief. On such more would be useless; for many of them would not be persuaded though one arose from the dead. I shall, however, have occasion to refer to a few more hereafter, when I come to notice your two or three last letters. In the mean time I submit to the minds of the candid the following queries:

33. How can all the foregoing Scriptures be true, and yet the salvation of all men not be true? How could that doctrine be expressed in stronger terms than those found in the above passages? If it were true, in what language would you expect to find it expressed? I know of no language stronger than that used. Can these passages, all or any of them, be reconciled with the merciless dogma of endless damnation? I trow not. If the doctrine of endless hell torments be true, why did neither Christ nor his apostles ever teach it? Why did none of the apostles ever threaten their hearers with hell torments in one solitary instance of their preaching on record? Why did the great apostle to the Gentiles never so much as name hell, nor use one word in the original that is ever translated hell, except hades, and then only to show its destruction? 1 Cor. xv: 55. What would be thought of a preacher now-a-days who should travel as far and preach as extensively and as long as Paul did and never once mention hell? What is to become of your endless hell and its subjects when the devil and all his works are destroyed—when sin shall be finished, an end made of transgression and everlasting righteousness brought in—when there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither any more pain—and when God shall become all in all? If the doctrine of endless hell torments be true, why have we no account of its ever having been preached in the Christian church, before the days of Tertullian in the third century? If the doctrine of universal salvation was regarded as so erroneous and pernicious as you deem it, why was it held and openly promulgated by some (if not all) of the most eminent of the Christian Fathers? and why was it never condemned nor deemed heretical in the days of Clement, of Origen, of Gregory, Pamphylius, etc., nor until the fifth century when many of the greatest corruptions had entered the church, that have ever disgraced it and disfigured the pure Gospel of Christ?

Yours in all faithfulness,

LYING.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"I really know nothing more criminal, more mean, and more ridiculous than lying. It is the production either of malice, cowardice, or vanity, and generally misses of its aim in every one of these views; for lies are always detected sooner or later."

CHESTERFIELD.

There is no vice more common in society than lying. It is found among all classes. It becomes, therefore, the duty of every one to point out the enormity of the evil. This may be done in various ways. 1st. By showing what it is that constitutes a lie. 2dly. By pointing out the various kind of lies.

1st. "A lie," says Paley, "is a breach of promise, for whoever seriously addresses his discourse to another, tacitly promises to speak the truth, because he knows the truth is expected." A lie, then, consists in an intention to deceive. Hence, a falsehood may be perpetrated without a word being spoken. Thus, should a merchant close his store, intending to have it understood that he had failed, when that was not the fact, it would be as great a falsehood as if he should declare such a thing to his creditors. Such is the state of society that it will be found that all have, at times, violated the truth. David said, in his haste, "All men are liars." Upon reflection, it will be found too true, though we admit there is a wide diversity in the human character.

2. There are various kinds of lies. First, Polite lies. Second, Domestic lies. Third, Religious lies. Fourth, Political lies. Fifth, Business lies. To illustrate and set forth the nature and tendency of each of these kind of lies, would require a volume rather than an essay.—Suffice it to say, that by polite lies, we mean much of that conversation that exists mostly in what is called the higher classes of society: such as promises of visiting where there is no intention ever to go to each other's houses; flattery, where there is no virtue to be praised. By domestic lies, we mean those that occur in the family circle. A child is sick, for instance. Medicine becomes necessary. The parent tells the child that the most nauseous drug is pleasant to the taste. This is wrong, and like other lies, defeats its end. It may succeed once, but the child will ever afterwards suspect the parent. So, it is not uncommon to threaten punishment and neglect to administer it. By religious lies, we mean all wilful misrepresentations of the doctrine of an opponent; wrong statements respecting the numbers of a sect; unfounded reports respecting the morals of a denomination. By political lies, we mean wrong views of rulers, or of those designed for office. A German Editor once said, that the American people had put up two of the worst men in the country for the Presidency. He judged, probably, from the style of many of the papers of that day.—Had he looked on the other side, he would have found as much reason to conclude that our nation had selected two of the best men. Parties often proclaim a triumph when they ought to own a defeat. By business lies, we mean all that deception which is practiced under the name of trade, where the design is to cheat each other as much as possible: such as ascribing qualities to an article which it does not possess; enhancing the price where the buyer is ignorant; failing, with a design to secure as much property as possible; violation of promises in regard to the payment of debts.

The effect of falsehood upon society might be depicted in glowing colors, but it would be going beyond our present design. The subject, too, is perfectly plain, even to the most unfettered mind. Let every man examine himself, and not rest satisfied till he has entirely driven this vice from his heart.

POINTS OF UNION.

BY BR. J. FRENCH.

Multiform as is the faith of Christians, it is nevertheless an interesting fact, that they are generally agreed in retaining the fundamental principles of the great Founder of their religion; and it is equally true, that those controversies which have rent the church into a thousand fragments, owe their existence, not so much to a rejection of the Saviour's teachings, as to the fact, that a multitude of doctrines, derived from heathen philosophy or human fancy, have been superadded.

As an illustration of this position, I would respectfully invite the reader's attention to the following particulars.

1st. The existence of one God. This is the vast rock on which the whole superstructure of divine truth has its foundation, and it is certain that Christians of all parties are agreed on this point; for although two more Deities have been added, which according to arithmetical rules would make three, yet by the rules of popular theology they are (mysteriously I confess) so amalgamated as to be but one.

2nd. That this one God is infinite in power, wisdom and goodness, is a truth that no Christian will deny, however strangely some may reason, in attempting to describe the nature and final results of the combined operation of these attributes.

3rd. Although many deify and worship the Saviour, yet all allow that he was in reality "the man, Christ Jesus."

4th. While many suppose that the great object of his mission was to reconcile God to men, yet all hold that to reconcile men to God was the great end for which he labored and suffered. If both God and men were equally unreconciled to each other, then both stood in equal need of being changed, however difficult might be the Saviour's task, so far as an unchangeable God was concerned.

5th. After all that has been said by many about the wrath and vengeance of the Deity, yet all confess that "God is love."

6th. No subject has been the foundation of more bitterness and contention among the professors of Christianity, than that of regeneration; and yet who will deny that the peculiar spirit of the Christian, is that he cherishes a more ardent love to God and mankind, than those who have never felt the renovating power of the Gospel?

The reader will doubtless recollect many more particulars which go to sustain the position that Christains are still agreed in retaining what is most important in the Saviour's teachings; and when all shall learn to regulate their tempers, and their lives, by the spirit of these doctrines we shall hear no more of sects, and parties, in Christendom; for all the disciples of Jesus will be one, as the Father and the Son are one.

PARENTS, WHICH IS THE BEST?

"I speak as unto wise men; judge ye."

A Universalist, whose faith is sure and stedfast, was called, in the dispensation of Providence, to part with a beautiful and promising daughter of about eighteen months of age. In the midst of this afflictive bereavement, he was visited by his brother-in-law, who was a strict Calvinist in all the minutiæ, except in the doctrine of infant damnation.

Addressing himself to the Universalist, he said, "I suppose you have a consolation in the belief that your child is happy." "Most assuredly," replied the Universalist, "I have the strongest confidence that this change, however grievous to us, is her eternal gain—that she has gone where pain, sorrowing and crying is forever done away, and that we shall again enjoy her society in the realms of endless bliss." "This," said the Calvinist, "is consolation indeed, and I have no doubt is well founded, inasmuch as your child had not arrived to years of accountability. But, alas," and he wept profusely, "alas! consider my anguish, view the terrors of my mind. I have a beloved son, dearer than life to me, now languishing on the bed of sickness, which I fear will be his last. I have no evidence of his conversion; his dissolution I daily look for, and I fear he must forever be the companion of cruel devils and damned spirits." "But," said the Universalist, with a serene smile, "if you have no hope for yourself, I have hope for you. Permit me to point you to the great I AM--to the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, which were confirmed by the mouths of all God's holy prophets since the world began, and also by the great Captain of our salvation. Here is my consolation. My faith, the anchor of my soul, certifies me that if the earthly tabernacle of your son's house is dissolved, he will be introduced, together with you, myself and a ransomed universe, to the general assembly and church of the first born, whose names are written in heaven, and to Jesus Christ, the mediator of the new covenant, where his sweet employment will be to ascribe "blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, to him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb, forever and ever." The Calvinist dried his tears.

Reader, in the hour of affliction, which faith is the best? WITNESS.

COMING OUT FROM THE WORLD.

There is a common saying with Partialists, that if you would get religion, inherit eternal life, and make your calling and election sure, you must come out from the world, take up your cross, and become a humble follower of your divine Master—as if the laudable things and necessary wants pertaining to man's happiness in this life, stood in direct opposition to religion, and the wholesome and moral teachings of Christ. Would you, then, come out from the world, according to the popular teachings of the day, you must improve the favorable opportunity of falling in with the annual tornadoes of fanaticism, that roll their sweeping and paralysing influence through various portions of our country, impairing the physical, the mental, and the moral health of community, driving some to insanity and suicide—making them twofold more the children of hell than they were before, and filling our insane asylums with deluded and pitiable victims. Renounce and forsake the intimacy of former associates—be kind to those only whose known religious views are in unison with your own—confine your patronage to those of the same order—despise those who would seek the innocent enjoyments and employments of the social and domestic circle—hate whom you believe God hates—wear a sanctimonious countenance—go with your head bowed down like a bulrush, and by a strict adherance to a practical performance of these things, you will "come out from the world."

St. James informs us, that pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father, is to visit the sick, the widow and fatherless in their afflictions, and to keep one's self unspotted from the world. The obvious and brief meaning of which, is, to reduce to practice that which in its effects, will produce the greatest amount of happiness in its recipients, both individually and collectively; and to deny ourselves any and every thing which, in its result, will cause physical or mental pain, either to ourselves or to our neighbors.

How wide the difference between the latter, when viewed in contrast with the former! The latter is full of mercy and good fruits, free from partiality and without hypocrisy, allowing to youth the enjoyment of all innocent amusements and the laudable ambition to pursue honest ends by proper means—and to the hoary head, to wear the smile of reconciliation to God, and peace on earth, and good will to men. While the former is partial, hypocritical, sensual and devilish, full of strife, envying and deceit, carrying with it a zeal without knowledge, prudence or consistency.

Reader, would you come out from the world in the right way? Then, cease to do evil, and learn to do well—follow the teachings of Christ, instead of the modern teachings and creeds of men.

AN ADDRESS TO DEITY.

O thou boundless Deity! thou whose omniscience extendeth above, beneath, around and through, all animate and inanimate objects, that inhabit the known and unknown regions! How mighty is thy power over all created things! Still, unseen, thou guidest every motion. But to me, infinite Deity! I scarce would live without confidence in thy majestic supremacy. By thy plastic hand, nature is beautiful—the unnumbered planets, that revolve in perfect harmony through trackless ether, are held and guided by thee, O incomprehensible Deity! yes, the king that rules over nations, is ruled by thee, O King of kings! The breath of life is not drawn without thine aid. The uncounted flocks that graze upon the lawns and traverse the wild and frightful deserts, look to thee for succor, boundless and benevolent Ruler! The frighted and foaming chamois, that bounds from cliff to cliff, still, on his tedious journey, gallops in the hallow of thy hand, eternal DEITY. Worthy art thou of universal adoration and praise!

West Bloomfield Academy, 1838. W C*.

As all who frequent any place of public worship, however they may differ from the doctrines there delivered, are expected to comport themselves with seriousness and gravity, so in religious controversies, ridicule ought never to be resorted to on either side; whenever a jest is introduced on such a subject, it is indisputably out of its place, and ridicule, thus employed, so far from being a test of truth, is the surest test of error, in those who on such an occasion can stoop to have recourse unto it.—Lacon.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.....NO. V.

BY REV. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

Music.—Founded upon the relation recorded in 1st Sam. 16th Chap.

"But the spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, and an evil spirit from the Lord troubled him." 1st Sam. xvi: 14. When the servants of Saul perceived his condition, they advised him to procure a skillful musician to play in his presence; which advice he followed, by obtaining David the son of Jesse, the future king of the Jews. The effect of the music is thus described—"and it came to pass when the spirit from God was upon Saul, that David took a harp and played with his hand; so Saul was refreshed, and was well, and the evil spirit departed from him." Verse 23. Much has been said to ascertain what was the evil spirit mentioned in this passage—but in regard to it one idea only will now be offered. The Jews were in the habit of attributing many events to the direct interposition of the Deity—even their common victories were called victories of the Lord. May we not suppose then, that the spirit of God was simply a virtuous disposition and a continuance of power to reign? And may we not suppose that the evil spirit was the melancholy lowliness of spirits which sprang from the consciousness of guilt? If this idea may be admitted, then we can at once discover how the music operated upon him, by dispersing his melancholy and restoring him to cheerfulness—but that the spirit, whatever it might be, was dispersed, is beyond doubt. The power of music over the mind is immense, and beyond realization. Music entered into much of the worship of the Jews, and in the assemblies of the primitive Christians, while our Saviour, even in view of the painful contemplations in the garden of Gethsemane and the terrific horrors of the cross, joined with his disciples in singing a hymn just at the close of the last supper—thus celebrating the praise of that Being whose praise is sung by a song of harmonious glory from the heavenly tuned harp of the universe, whose flowing strains unite in fixing upon the heart the great truth, that "God is Love."

That man was a philosopher, if indeed one man conceived the idea, who introduced music into an army, for music excites ardor in the creature, and he rushes fearlessly into battle. Even animals are affected by it. "Music has charms to soothe the savage breast." Dr. Clark records the case of a savage lion in the tower of London, who was actually drawn away from his food by music repeatedly, showing the most unequivocal expressions of delight. In Southey's history of Brazil, we are informed that a Jesuit, having found that the natives were passionately fond of music, met with great success in making converts, by setting the catechism, creeds and ordinary prayers to music, which they readily adopted on account of the music. It has even subdued the raging madness of insanity, cooled the ruffled brow of anger and revenge. And where is the man, while away from home, when in the flowing melody of the human voice, he hears sung;

"'Mid pleasures and palaces, tho' we may roam,
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home;
A charm from the skies seems to hallow us there, has not felt a thrill rush through him like a full tide of joy, has not in imagination seen the distant friends, traced each familiar feature, and visited every friendly spot? Indeed, so powerful is such music, that were a panting pilgrim to fall down in the desert of Zahara without hope, and a voice in the pathless wilderness should sing to him of home and friends, his heart would once more vibrate with joy, his limbs would once more be strung with exertion, and a powerful effort would be made to escape the death which stared him in the face; and if he should again fall down, the last thoughts of his mind, as it fled from its earthly tabernacle, would be of home, never to be forgotten even in the arms of death.
Which, seek through the world, is ne'er met with elsewhere."

But there is another kind of music, besides that of the voice—there is harmony in the world around us, and among the countless wonders of the universe, which continually sing, "great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty." In the operation of the varied machinery of creation, there is praise—the worlds revolve it, the sun blazes it, the cloud pours it, the mind speaks it, the eagle screams it, the flowers bloom it, and reason sustains it. There is harmony in the system of the Saviour, between its power and the wants of the creature—he loved man, and he died for him, to make him the subject of salvation from the discords of evil, and to tune all his powers in praise to God. There is even music in death itself, for like a discord in a flowing song, it may make future scenes more enchanting and pleasant. It is very true that there are some harsh discords of sin and evil which pain the heart and convince us that the way of transgression is hard—but these will not always exist unless we admit that an endless discord of evil and pain shall be set up in another world; an admission which would make heaven itself a place of discordant feelings, for with the purified, ennobled affections of an angel, the wailings of wo would give more distress than to earthly beings. Indeed, the endless perpetuation of evil would as much mar the songs of heaven, as the thumping of anvils would mar the most delicate music.

A great man, when dying, said, "I am going to a world of order." Most true! Here the passions of men create much disorder—but in heaven, all is harmony. No discord of pain, vice or error, shall harshly grate upon the feelings—all shall be beautiful, enchanting, pleasant; while a redeemed world shall unite in singing, "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honor, and power: for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created." Rev. iv: 11. This is a noble truth; one which exhibits the unchanging love of Him who guides all events with skill and wisdom. It should cause our hearts to be melodious with praise, tune our lyres with virtue and our minds with faith, that in the closing scene of our earthly pilgrimage we may sing a song of triumph and victory over death and the grave.

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION OF YOUTH.

BY MISS ANN BARTLETT.

That there is a multiplicity of opinions respecting the all-important subject of religion, as to the effect it has on human happiness and the most efficient means of obtaining it, will be acknowledged by all. It is a subject that has long engrossed the attention of the aged, but it is of recent date that the young have engaged in a work, that bids fair, if rightly prosecuted, to ameliorate and happify the condition of mankind. The light in which religion has too often been viewed, has had a tendency to suppress all inquiry as to its source, nature or object. The Christian's life has ever been represented as a warfare, a thorny maze, a great cross and, in fine, almost every thing except the peaceable fruits of righteousness: whilst the wicked are said to glide smoothly along as if borne on the very wings of happiness, and permitted to inhale the balmy sweets as they rise from the fragrant flowers with which their pathway is strewn—they are said to roll sin under their tongues as a sweet morsel, and, finally, I know of no charm that is said to possess so many attractive and fascinating properties as that destroyer of human happiness, sin. There is no doubt that many a youth has reasoned logically from the above premises, and said, There are seventy years alloted to man, and I see no good reason why I can not as well secure my salvation when I shall have lost all relish for youthful amusement, as now; and by pursuing this course, what a vast amount of happiness I shall enjoy when compared with the Christain. But what say the Scriptures and the experience of every individual on this point? Do they not speak in language that may be understood by all, that the way of the transgressor is hard—that the wicked are like the troubled sea whose waters cannot rest? So, likewise, do they testify that those who obey the law of God shall have great peace and nothing shall offend them.

The different means of obtaining religion are thought to be not less various, than its effects. Some suppose it is effected by some experimental change which they cannot define—others are of opinion that providential occurrences, such as the loss of friends or perhaps property, tend directly to produce a change—others again think religious excitement the most efficient means that can be resorted to; but a large part of mankind agree in one thing, that fear of future punishment is the great machine that stimulates to obedience. But from the last mentioned I shall respectfully dissent. I would say to all parents, guardians and teachers—would you have those who are entrusted to you, respectable, virtuous, benevolent, kind hearted; and above all, would you have them happy, teach them pure and undefiled religion in the very morning of life, whilst the heart is tender and most susceptible of piety and gratitude. I see no reason why children can not be taught the principle on which religion is founded—its source and the benefits resulting from it—with as much facility as many branches of education that are prosecuted advantageously, even by the mere tyro. It may be urged as an objection by some, that it is too intricate and complex to be understood and appreciated by a child—that it requires mature years to fathom its depths. I grant that it requires a long and sedulous life to investigate all its rich and shining properties; but if the seeds are sown in infancy, and nurtured with useful lessons, they will take deeper root and arrive to maturity sooner, than they would were the seed-time delayed until manhood had arrived. Would parents plant a germ in the bosom of their offspring that would produce the golden fruits of righteousness, they would reap a reward that they would not barter for all the hard earned wealth they could amass through a long and prosperous life—they would not only have the satisfaction of discharging the duty they owe them, but what peace and happiness might it not secure to those dear pledges of their heart's best affection! It would be like the beacon's flame that guides the mariner through the trackless ocean.

Many parents excuse themselves, and say they are so engrossed with the cares of life that they have no time to devote to the care and cultivation of those in whom their whole affections are concentrated. But are you not laboring almost exclusively for what you fondly anticipate will add to their future welfare and happiness? I would ask what other boon than religion, you could bestow upon them that would be of such intrinsic worth as to secure to them peace and happiness. It would be a diadem that the wealth of India would be insufficient to purchase. How enviable would be the low and humble cottage of the peasant, where pure and undefiled religion had erected her temple, built her shady bowers, and spread out her rich and luscious repast, crowned with garlands of roses, whose perfume invites the faint and weary traveller that is journeying through the labyrinth of life, to stop and partake of the heavenly food! How enviable, I repeat, would be so blissful an abode, when compared to an eastern palace, where religion had not erected her shrine, nor the affections of its inmates been bound together by the silken cords of love! The voice of reason, as well as the experience of all past ages, speaks as with a mandate from Heaven, admonishing parents to illuminate and strew the pathway of those whom they are in duty bound to protect, with ambrosial flowers, that they may find nothing to allure them from the path of virtue. I have long been of opinion, that if there was as much care and labor bestowed upon the morals, as there is upon the intellect, it would supercede the necessity of all experimental changes whatever—that religion would become constitutional, and all would know the Lord from the least even unto the greatest. The experience of every individual that has been set into the glorious liberty of the Gospel, bears ample testimony that whenever this all important subject is neglected in youth, they lose the most healthy and active part of their lives; and what is still more to be deplored, they are apt to acquire pernicious habits that require more religion and philosophy than is often possessed, to wholly eradicate them.

It is to be hoped that all parents will seasonably impress it upon the minds of their offspring, that God has established fixed and immutable laws in the moral as well as in the physical world, and that happiness consists in a knowledge of, and obedience to them.

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE WICKED.

BY REV. W. S. BALCH.

No sentiment is more distinctly stated or incontrovertibly proved in the Bible, than that the wicked shall be destroyed. This is no abstract truth. It forms a part and portion of the wise and benevolent scheme of justice, which regards the ultimate good of all, and the highest glory of God. It is, in fact, indispensable to the full accomplishment of the grand designs of the Almighty; for so long as wickedness shall abound among men, apparent imperfections and suffering must be the lot of mortals.

There are several important considerations which attach to this subject, and which must be noticed before we can form a correct idea of it.

1st. What are we to understand by the wicked? This word is an adjective, or, etymologically a past participle, from the Saxon verb wican, to slide, to recede, to fall away. Standing independant, it applies to those persons who have fallen away from righteousness, truth and duty. The appellation is characteristically given. We use words in like manner very often—we speak of the wise, the good, and the learned; signifying that the persons so distinguished possess the qualities thus indicated. So when a person recedes from duty, departs from holiness, or in any way does wrong, he becomes wicked. This term is capable of a more general application than all are willing to admit. It attaches to all who do any wrong, and is to be restricted in its meaning according to the turpitude of their guilt. Professions of good form a miserable apology for sins, great or small. Let the term, then, be understood in its widest meaning, applied to all who do evil.

2d. What is meant by destruction? We can hardly agree with those who find in this word, proof of perpetual existence in suffering. It is of Latin extraction, and compounded of two words meaning the opposite of to build, to form, to create. Hence, to demolish, to ruin, to bring to nought, to annihilate, and ruin, demolition, annihilation.

3d. What, then, is signified by the destruction of the wicked? Evidently the ruin, demolition, or annihilation of the wicked—a doctrine most distinctly taught in the Bible. "But all the wicked will he destroy." Ps. cxlv: 20; cxliv: 6. "Behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble, and the day that cometh shall burn them up that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." Mal. iv: 1. The utter destruction, the annihilation of the wicked cannot be doubted by any believer in the truth of Revelation. There are professed Christians whose peculiar sentiment teaches, that, after an adequate punishment, God will annihilate some of his children. Such a sentiment is far more scriptural, rational, and merciful, than the belief that he will prolong their existence only as a means of inflicting tortures upon them without mercy and without end. But before we adopt this sentiment as the truth of God, let us stop and reflect deliberately.

4th. How shall the wicked be destroyed? The surest, best, and most thorough destruction of the wicked, is to make them holy, righteous and good. The most effectual destruction of an enemy, is to make him your true and faithful friend. A nation may be apparently destroyed, their public places be overthrown, and all dispersed; but unless the rebel spirit be subdued, and all inclined to approve and adopt the new government, a little indulgence will give them time to rally, and they may come down with the resistless fury of the Goths and Vandals, and extirpate their former oppressors. On the ground of endless misery, the wicked will never be destroyed, but eternally send bitter curses up to heaven.

The design of God's government is, the good of all its subjects, which can be promoted only by a willing submission to its requirements. God, by the ministry of his Son, will ultimately effect the reconciliation of the world to himself, finish sin, make an end of transgression, and bring in everlasting righteousness. He will "subdue all things to himself," "swallow up death in victory," and "be all in all." When that grand consummation shall be complete, the wicked shall not be found. They have ceased forever, and those who have thus fallen away and sustained this character, have become righteous, and are now forever with the saints in light, enrobed in garments made clean in the blood of the Lamb; and kneeling with every creature in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, and chant the songs of redeeming grace forever.

"See, here an endless ocean flows
Of never failing grace!
Behold, a dying Saviour's veins
The sacred flood increase!
It rises high, and drowns the hills,
Has neither shore nor bound:
Now if we search to find our sins,
Our sins can ne'er be found."

Amen! Alleluia! The Lord God omnipotent reigneth. And let him reign forever and ever—Amen.

PARTIALISM NOT THE BREAD OF LIFE.

BY J. S. KIBBE.

Notwithstanding there is a multiplicity of religious systems extant in the world, they may be reduced under two general heads, namely, Partialism, or such as represent the all-wise Creator as being angry with his creatures, and finally consigning a large portion of them to never ending wo; and Universalism, or such as invariably teach that the Almighty Benefactor is the same unchangeable being—that "he is the Father of the spirits of all flesh," and as such he will ever regard the children of men, with an eye of tender compassion—that he ever seeks the good of his creatures, and his love is as lasting as eternity.

Now, both of the above systems cannot be true, for they stand directly opposed to each other; and, as both are supposed to centre in the Deity, it follows as a matter of consequence, that one or the other is, and must be false. I am, therefore, inclined to believe the former of the two systems untrue, from the following reasons: firstly, we see no partiality manifested, on the part of the Diety, toward the children of men, when we look abroad in the earth; for, he causeth the sun to dispense his blessings on the evil and the good, and he causeth the gentle showers to fall on the just and the unjust—"he openeth his hand and satisfieth the wants of every living creature," and all created beings are the recipients of his parental care. And since his kind providence has ever been extended to us, from the earliest period of our existence to the present moment, and not only to us, but likewise to every living creature, would it not be ungrateful in man to distrust his benevolence for the future, or think that he will be less kind and beneficent in the world to come?

Secondly, we now proceed more particularly to the consideration of the subject which heads this article, although we deem not what has been said altogether out of place. It will be recollected that those professing the system of Partialism, claim for their supposed religion a heavenly origin; but at other times their own words clearly evince that they "spend their money for that which is not bread, and their labor for that which satisfieth not"—that notwithstanding it promises to yield them the peaceable fruits of righteousness, joy, and comfort, it falls far short of it, and so far from making them the recipients of happiness, that they every moment, become more and more estranged from it—that instead of its being unto them a well springing up unto everlasting life, and causing them no more to thirst—instead of its being that bread of life, of which Christ said, that all who eat thereof shall no more hunger, it is the very reverse. Hear them exclaim, (for out of their own mouths do we judge of their system as having no foundation other than the device of men,) "Lord, we have tasted of the bread and do hunger, and we have drank of the cup and do thirst after more." Gentle-reader, have you not heard the above expression, or an expression to the same import? Methinks you have, if your lot has been cast in a place where the system has had any influence.

But how is it with the latter of these two systems of religious faith? Is it capable of yielding more enjoyment to him who is exercised thereby, causing the mighty void in the human mind to be filled with the blessed assurance that he shall one day outride the tempest of adversity, and meet a ransomed universe in the happy regions of immortality to mingle their praises around one common altar—is it susceptible of raising him who is far removed from the path of rectitude, and wandering through the gloomy labyrinths of misery and degradation, to a lively sense of his duty—will it cause the heart of him who is wearied and ladened with cares and troubles, to rejoice in that, "when this earthly tabernacle shall be dissolved, he has a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens"—will it bind up the broken hearted and make the bosom which has long struggled under spiritual bondage, to rejoice and be glad in that salvation wherewith it has been made free—and, finally, is it that bread which cometh from above, whereof all who eat shall no more hunger, and that cup, whereof, all who drink, shall no more thirst; but shall be filled and have abundant cause to exult in that stream which "maketh glad the city of our God"?

Reader, let your own bosom answer, and I trust if it has been warmed by the pure principles this doctrine inculcates, you will be constrained to say, with the utmost sincerity, "Lord, evermore give us this bread."

RELIGION.

The simple, radical meaning of this word is to unite, to bind together again. It has, undoubtedly, more reference to feelings and duties, than to doctrines or opinions. But it has been so perverted in its meaning and usage, that it is commonly applied to any and every system of faith respecting divinity and the eternal world, however absurd or inconsistent with reason or itself, and however illy calculated to bind mankind together in a common union. To go no further, and not to multiply examples, the popular faith of Christendom in the endless wrath of God for a portion of mankind, and the separation of them to all the miseries of an endless hell, is calculated directly to introduce in the present, the division it contemplates in the future—and to turn the theory into fact, so far as this life is concerned. It matters not on what ground this endless division of the human race is ultimately decreed, its firm belief now, and the belief that it is good, wise, just and necessary—that it is our duty to be resigned to God's will in it—is calculated to begin the division now—to regard it as good, just, wise and necessary in the present state of existence—and to be resigned that it should take place immediately as well as ultimately. Such, I say, must be the natural tendency of such a faith, though I well know and rejoice that its believers are not always influenced by it. God has implanted feelings in their hearts that forbid it—and even with this, their creed, are mingled such a view of God's goodness and love, such an exhibition of the compassion of Jesus, and such humane precepts and universally benevolent injunctions, that Partialism is a dead body in their souls—a faith without feeling or action.—It may paralyze the hopes and aspirations of their own souls, and load the wings of their heaven-directed prayers, but their active benevolence shakes off the incubus, and renders them truly religious in spite of their really irreligious faith.

But I can not really call Partialism religion. All there is in it calculated to bind soul to soul, man to man, and humanity to the Divinity—all this, (which is but a part and parcel of Universalism,) is religion; but the doctrine of endless sin and wo, of God's partiality, and of a consequent endless division of the human race, is irreligion—calculated to sunder the ligaments that bind the moral universe together, and divide them into opposing factions, as long as it shall be believed.

Those who believe it may be—I know that many of them are religious—truly religious; but they are not religious because they believe in the endless sinning and suffering of a portion of their fellow-beings, but in despite of such belief. To expect a binding together of mankind, from a belief in the doctrine of endless wo, is to expect hatred to generate love—or sin to cause holiness—or a spirit of discord and strife, to impel us to harmony and union. Our Partialist brethren and sisters may therefore rely upon it, (and if they will carefully search their hearts, they will find it so) that every feeling and principle of true and pure religion they possess and practice, flows from that portion of their creeds which agrees with the doctrine of God's impartial, universal, and ultimately efficient grace, and is directly opposed to all they believe in opposition to this main principle and doctrine of Universalism. And our Universalist brethren and sisters, who are not practical but only professed Universalists, may rely upon it that every act they perform and every feeling they cherish, which is calculated to divide mankind and to lessen human happiness and virtue, flows from their neglect to act up to the principles they profess—from their practice of Partialism in some form or other. Are they deficient in charity (love) to any of their fellow-beings?—So far they are Partialists. Are they cold and indifferent to the spread of the knowledge of God's love and man's final salvation? So far they are Partialists. In short, in every evil deed—in the neglect of every good work they are Partialists. Would to God that more Universalists in practice and feeling were Universalists in faith; and that all professed Universalists would cease to practice the principles of endless sin and wo.

A. B. G.

EXPOST FACTO LAWS.

"Is the law then against the promises of God? God forbid." Gal. iii: 21.

It is a principle in our truly republican system of government, that no right exists to violate a contract duly made—and that no law can be justly passed to affect an action already performed. It is no matter how heinous the crime that may be committed—how unusual, or how strange—the law by which it is to be punished, must have been passed before the criminal committed it, or he can not be considered amenable to the law, nor subject to its penalty. It appears by the reasoning of the great Apostle of the Gentiles, as laid down in this epistle to the Galatians, that a precisely similar principle is acknowledged and acted upon in the government of the universe by our heavenly Lawgiver. Is the principle a correct one—a righteous principle? Consider the question for one moment—not as republicans—not as men attached to our system of government, in which it is recognized and acted upon as if it was right—but consider it as men—as citizens of the universe for an eternity of duration. If contracts can be impaired, annulled, or set aside by a third party, where is the security for property, for happiness, for freedom—even for life? If laws may be passed after the action—who can tell what will be crime to-morrow, or its punishment, the day afterwards? Yea, who can be certain that virtues may not be punished as severely as ever crimes were, within a day after they are performed with applause and admiration? So much in human government with all its imperfection.

Turn we now to the necessity of some such principles in the government of our most righteous Ruler and Judge. Feeble, short-sighted man in adopting these principles, knows that certain circumstances may and probably will arise which will make their observance very inconvenient, indeed. But satisfied of their justice—of the absolute necessity of stability and firmly settled principles in government, and moreover convinced that more good than evil must result from the adoption of right principles, he resolves to abide by them, whatever circumstances may arise or events occur. But our heavenly Lawgiver is not thus straightened. He sees and knows every possible event that can occur to interfere with the practice of these principles. When he covenants, contracts or promises, he knows, certainly, how he can and will fulfil the same; as well as what intermediate circumstances may arise which might seemingly render it desirable to annul the promise.

So, also, in framing the criminal code. Being in himself the standard of all perfection and righteousness, he could at once, and without failure, know what crimes would be committed—the aggravating or palliating circumstances of the criminal, and the punishment necessary. Hence there would be less necessity for violating these principles of government—less evils arising out of their exercise—and more good, than in merely human governments. As to the righteousness or justice of them, in the divine government, no one can doubt.—Without them, there would be no immutability in the standard of right and wrong established for the imitation and instruction of man. Neither could there be veracity in God, and consequently no such thing as placing confidence in him, or depending on his ways.—Universal chaos, doubt, confusion and dismay would convulse the moral universe. Such principles, then, are not only right and just in all earthly governments, but are absolutely necessary in the divine government. To which I will add—human governments become corrupt, decay and change—and thus these principles are frequently violated, perverted and sometimes annulled altogether. Divine government, like its Author and Administrator, knows no change or decay—no corruption or violation of its fundamental principles. Based on immutable truth, it can not ever know perversion or abuse, alteration or end.

There is another principle laid down in our system of government, of which I notice St. Paul admits the existence in the divine government—and that is, that no means employed by the government shall be calculated to annul the end or design of the government. In our imperfect, yet excellent constitutions, the object of the government is declared to be the good, the welfare, the happiness, safety or prosperity of the governed—and no law, calculated to destroy or prevent the object of the government, is allowed to be passed. It is true, that owing to human frailty and error, such laws may some times be passed—but it is admitted that it was in error—in mistake—and that such laws are unconstitutional. It is also true, that owing to the limited wisdom and power of mortals, they are obliged to use imperfect means to attain the end of government—and that, hence, the ends of government are not always attained, as they should be. But this defect is not owing to anything unjust or incorrect in the principle laid down—but in the weakness or folly of those who devise and use means to carry that principle into effect.

Now apply this to the divine Being, and you will readily see that as he lacks neither wisdom nor power to carry the principles of his government into successful operation, and thus ultimately to attain the full end for which he instituted his government, so, of course, that end will be most successfully attained and accomplished. What the end of his government is, will appear from a few quotations of our context. "And the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the Heathen through faith, preached before the Gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed.... But that no man is justified by the Law, in the sight of God, is evident—for, the just shall live by faith—and the Law is not of faith: but the man that doeth them, shall live in them."

From this it appears, that God foresaw the operations of his government at its establishment; and that he established it for the end, that all nations might be blessed in Abraham and his seed—which declaration of the end, and aim, and intention of God's government, is called the Gospel. We are furthermore assured that the operations which should lead to the accomplishment of God's promise, (and which operations God foresaw) were not to be brought about or effected by the Law but by the proclamation or revelation of the Gospel.—For those who live by the Law live by works—whereas the salvation of the Gospel is by faith.

This brings us to the question asked and answered by the apostle. "Wherefore, then, serveth the Law? It was added, because of transgressions, till the seed should come, to whom the promise was made"—namely, till the coming of Jesus. This brings us, again, to another question asked and answered by the apostle. "Is the Law, then, against the promises of God? God forbid!—But before faith came, we were kept under the Law—shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed—wherefore, the Law was our school-master to bring us unto Christ, (or unto the Gospel,) that we might be justified by faith," (and no longer live merely by the works of the Law.) Such, divested of its numerous parentheses, is the reasoning of this great apostle—and that it is clear and conclusive, based on facts and confirmed by reasons strong, no one who will candidly investigate the subject, can doubt for one moment.

Mark the positions we have noticed as having been laid down by the apostle.

1. There is no power to annul contracts in the divine government.

2. No law passed after an action is committed, can take cognizance of that action.

3. God has declared his purpose in establishing his government over man, to be, that he might bless all in Christ. And

4. All that God does—all the means he employs—will be for the purpose of advancing his end and aim in the divine government. Amen. A. B. G.

FACTS.

That man or woman who can not but feel for the distresses of others is a noble-hearted being, because it is one of the holiest principles of our moral nature.—The principle of moral goodness, is the same in all ages, and under all circumstances. It is the spirit of Christian love, and so long as it is felt in the human bosom, it will prompt its possessor to sympathise with the unfortunate, and to desire their happiness. Yea, so strong is this principle, that under its influence we actually participate in the miseries of our friends. These are facts which, thus far, will not be disputed.

Again, the opposite of love is hatred. It consists in the exercise of those animal passions, which are left in full vigor and strength, in the absence of love. Under the influence of such a feeling, mankind are led to rejoice in the misery of their fellows. It may be carried so far, though I rejoice in believing that it seldom is, as to cause a man to rejoice in the distresses of his own child. This also is a fact which none will dispute.

These are two directly opposite principles. I have nothing to do with their particular effects, but I introduce them as principles. Their effects may be various, under different circumstances, but their respective natures can not be altered. Thus, love may prompt a person at one time to smile upon, and encourage the conduct of a man, and at another, to chastise the same individual for his good, but in no case will it rejoice in ultimate misery. On the other hand hatred may prompt a man to do that which would destroy the happiness of his fellow, and at another time do that which would prove an advantage to his victim, but in both cases, alike, the intention is to make the subject of that hatred miserable. Love and hatred, then, are principles. The exercise of the one becomes a virtue, and of the other a vice. Do what you will, you can not change Christian love into a vice, nor malicious hatred into a virtue. One will remain to all eternity a holy principle and the other an unholy one.

These are facts, which, at this stage of the argument, I think will be admitted by all. And I wish, if any has doubts about them, that he would examine them again, and satisfy himself before he proceeds any farther, lest he should find it convenient to deny what he can not controvert, merely for his creed's sake.

Now I ask which, according to the nature of things, is the strongest principle? It will be unhesitatingly answered, love. Why? because it is the essence of Deity. Love, then, being the strongest principle, must finally gain the ascendancy over its opposite, and thus continue, until it shall have completely conquered the principle of hatred, and have extirpated it forever from the bosom of man. This, even the Limitarian will admit to be the case with those who are fortunate enough to be admitted into paradise, although I contend that hell itself would be a paradise to the man who possesses the full and uncontaminated principle of Christian love.—But we yield, for a moment, to the distinction which our opposers would make, and take him at his own admission. All who go to heaven will be in complete possession of unrestricted love. There will be no malice, no hatred, no rejoicing in view of misery, for these things would affect them there as much as here. Now suppose that the father gazes from the battlements of heaven down into the vengeance-illuminated regions of the damned, and there beholds a once beloved child, shrieking in the anguish of flaming despair, we say that if he possessed one spark of love, he would beseech his God to let him fly on the wings of affection to the abode of his son. If he were denied this, his piercing lamentations would go up before the throne of the Almighty, forever and ever. Would there be happiness there, would there be rejoicing, thanksgiving and praise, would there be gratification there? No! the bosom of the congregated host—of every being that was holy, of every being that was pure, of every being that loved, would burn with sympathetic anguish at the miseries of their disconsolate companion.

But says the objector, the saints in glory, will not be sensible of the miseries of the damned. They will be visible to the eye of Omniscience only. Well, suppose we concede the truth of this. Will not the same conclusion be unavoidable still? Is God a worse being than man, that he should look upon the misery of that child with more approval than did that father? I will not suppose that any man will hesitate to answer the question with a decided negative. Then the same reason exists why God should not be aware of the endless suffering of his dependent offspring, which is urged, why the father should not witness the anguish of his child—viz. because purity and love, could never endure the sight. But again; the affectionate father, while upon earth, could never endure the thought of a temporary separation from his children, without anxiety.—The welfare of his loved ones, was always uppermost in his mind. When he returned from his daily avocations at night, to his own fireside, if one of his family was absent he must know the reason, and whither he had gone. And must this holy affection be destroyed, before he can be happy? Must he become wholly indifferent to those whom he loved, and whom God by his word has commanded him to love, and concerning which, he has said, "if any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel." I say must all these things be violated, destroyed, and that father become a fiend, before he can enjoy paradise! It matters not, then, whether that father listens to the groans of his child, or not, that child must be present with him or he can never be happy. And as the whole human family are connected together, either immediately or remotely, it follows that if one soul is finally lost, the whole will be miserable in view of it. Thus the sentiment of endless misery involves too much, for it involves the misery of all the children of Adam.

Partialist brother, throw it away. Feed no longer upon it, for it is not that "bread which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life to the soul," but contains the most subtle poison, and will be sure to corrode and blast every enjoymen , which can arise from the noblest principles of your moral nature. Either those principles must be destroyed, or your doctrine must be false.—Which, dear reader, will you do; cultivate and strengthen the moral powers of your souls or cling to the gloomy shadows of heathen mythology? One you must do, both you can not. Which shall it be? Judge ye.

"UNIVERSALIST BELIEF:

A Friendly Epistle to the clergymen of the various Christian sects who hold the doctrine of endless punishment.—By Jason Lewis, Boston, N. Y.—Utica, Magazine and Advocate office—1838."

"Better late than never," says the old proverb. This excellent pamphlet of 24 pages, duodecimo, was published last Spring, and its merits deserved an earlier notice. It is an enlarged and much improved edition of the epistle originally addressed to our Partialist ministering brethren through the columns of this paper, early in 1837. But although addressed to Partialist clergymen, it is eminently adapted to give a concise view of those things which are most certainly believed among us, with our reasons for so believing, and the Scripture evidences on which that belief is founded. Even well informed Universalists may find their memories much refreshed by its careful perusal. To Universalists and to Partialists, then, we cordially recommend its careful perusal and consideration—and especially to those of our Partialist brethren who minister in the pulpit, and feel it to be their duty to preach against Universalism. There is a lamentable ignorance among them as to what we do believe, as well as why we believe as we do—an ignorance that causes them to grossly misrepresent our views, and prevents them from hitting the mark at which they aim their hardest blows. They should not waste their strength in this manner—this fighting of chimeras, and beating of the air, neither improves their tempers nor ours—neither enlightens their congregations, nor convinces us that we are in an error. Indeed, by such preaching there are ten Partialists prepared to receive Universalism very favorably, when it comes to be properly presented to them by its advocates, while there is not one who believes Universalism, that can be convinced of its falsity by such distorted representations of it. It is for such preachers, and for those who have heard such preaching, that this little work is specially prepared. Universalists should purchase, and send it to all such. Let every Partialist preacher in the State, have a copy forthwith, to begin the work of distribution.

I would remark, by the way, that one worthy and able lay brother in New-York city, was the principal means of having it published in this form, and manifested his approbation of Br. Lewis' labors by taking 500 copies of the work for distribution!

The work is for sale by the Author, and at our Bookstore, at $4.00 per hundred—63 cts. per dozen, and 6 cts. single.

VOICE TO YOUTH.

This work bids very fair to become one of the most popular works of its class, if we may judge from the commendatory notices it has already received from the public press. Not to name our own periodicals, who might be supposed to be partial in their praises of its contents—or the newspapers of this city, who may be supposed to have some interest in advancing the interest of our own city publishers—the New-Yorker, and the New-York Mirror, two of our best weekly literary journals, have noticed it in very commendatory terms. The Friend of Man, whose Editor is a Presbyterian, noticed it at some length, approbating very especially its author's views on theatrical amusements, card playing, dancing, novel reading, etc., and excepting slightly the author's theological opinions, as a matter of course. The venerable and excellent Dr. Rudd, Editor of the Episcopal Gospel Messenger, says of the work:

"This is a neatly executed volume; and though we can not subscribe to the views entertained in it upon religious opinions, we are in duty bound to say, that the manner in which opinions are advanced differing from our own, is kind and modest. So far as we have been enabled to read the volume obligingly laid upon our table, we have found much sensible advice to the young, and many excellent remarks."

MONEY.

Can not some of our brethren who are owing this establishment—especially subscribers who are owing for previous volumes, as well as those who owe only for the present—pay us what is due? We are continually embarrassed for want of the numerous small sums that are owing to us all over the land, and surely some of our debtors might aid us more than they do, in our trials and labors. Let them send on, or pay over to an agent for him to send on to us forthwith what they owe us—it can never come amiss.

G. and H.

Br. Rogers—We forwarded the names of Amos T. Woodbury and Avery M. Backus, of West Winfield, Herkimer county, as subscribers to the Pro and Con, some time since, but they never came to hand. Please forward the numbers immediately and charge $1 for each to

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

In consequence of whitewashing and painting the house, there will be no meeting in the Universalist church in this city, next Sunday.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., in the Baptist church in Maryland, Otsego county, at 10 o'clock, A. M. by Elder N. D. Wright, in defence of the doctrine of endless punishment, and by Br. E. E. Guild, in the same place in reply, immediately after, from the same text. [The above notice was received to late for an insertion in the last paper.] Br. T. J. Smith, in Marshall, (instead of Br. Browne)—Br. L. C. Brown, at Richfield Springs, and at Carver's at 5 o'clock, P. M.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. Waggoner in Depauville—Br. Britton in Watertown—Br. W. H. Griswold in McDonough village—Br. Foster at South Bay at 10 A. M., and at the log school house at 2 P. M.—Br. E. E. Guild, in the schoolhouse near P. Hanson's, at 10 A. M., and at Colliersville at 3 P. M.—Br. D. Biddlecom, at Cold Brook, and at Grove's Hollow at 5 P. M.

There will be preaching on the fifth Sunday inst., by Br. E. E. Guild, in Walton, att 10 A. M.—Br. J. R. Sharp, in Hume, Allegany county, Br. S., will spend three or four weeks in that vicinity, and attend to such appointments as the friends may make. He will also attend to any business for the Magazine and Advocate.

Br. L. C. Browne, will preach in Fort Plain on Wednesday evening the 18th inst.

THE WINDS.

O mighty are the winds!
Omnipotent their sway;
From airy caverns loos'd,
E'en fire and flood obey.
Before their chariot wheels,
Clouds dark'ning, swiftly fly;
Gathering tempests break—
And rush along the sky.

O terrible the winds!
When seas salute the sky,
When sinks the laboring ship,
And gallant seamen die:
When towers of strength give way,
And lofty forests crash;
And hills and mountains quake
Beneath their sweeping lash.

O lovely are the winds!
When gales propitious come,
O'er ocean's sheet of blue;
To waft the wanderer home:
Where fond expectant hearts,
Their mistful gaze extend,
With hopes renewed, to greet
A cherished, absent friend.

O pleasant are the winds!
Their gentle balmy breath,
When Summer's noon-day sun
Comes o'er the fervid earth.
Witness the invalid,
With fever'd cheek and brow,
Welcome the cooling breeze,
To quench the burning glow.

O glorious are the winds!
The waters they command,
Roll them in clouds abroad,
Where nature's wants demand.
When vegetation droops,
And mourn the fields and flowers;
They shake their dripping wings,
And lo! refreshing showers.

God of the various winds!
Of earth and of the sea:
Let all that in them are,
Give praises unto thee.
As far as their career,
Extend thy saving grace
To every living thing
Throughout the universe.

MORAL EDUCATION NECESSARY TO POLITICAL PROSPERITY.

An Extract from Dr. E. Bartlett's Address before the Boston Phrenological Society, January 1, 1838.

Free and liberal governments have thought it their safety as well as their duty, to provide for, and encourage general education. The axiom is, that popular intelligence is the only sure support and safe guardian of popular government. All political institutions, resting, to any considerable extent, on the popular or democratic principle, recognize this relation;—they profess to rely upon it for their stability, and efficiency for good. What I wish to say, is this:—If the education, on which popular government is to rest, be the education of the intellect merely, then it leans on a broken reed. How is it here, at home, in this Federal Republic? Will intellectual culture, alone, perfect and universal as it can be made, secure to us the permanency and the purity of our institutions? Will it keep inviolate the spirit of rational liberty, which pervades and consecrates the written charter of our rights? Will it hold, unbroken, the links of that chain, which binds these States together? Will it prove a sufficient security for national peace, prosperity and happiness? Can we confide to it the keeping of our hearth-stones and our altars? Will it guard us in the business of the day? Will it be round about us—a tutelary presence—in the watches of the night? No! never, never, never! Unless the sense of right and wrong between man and man be ripened to a hardier growth amongst us, than it has ever yet attained,—unless the true and great relation, which every man sustains to all other men, be better understood, and felt more warmly than it ever yet has been,—unless reverence and love for whatever is exalted above us in genuine excellence and glory, be more cherished than it now is,—unless, in short, the moral, social and religious sentiments are made to receive that regular, systematic and general culture, which is now bestowed, almost entirely, upon the intellect;—then, as surely as there is certainty in science, or truth in revelation, shall we come short of our true greatness; nay, more,—then is there, for our institutions, no safety in the present, and no security in the future. What are these institutions? Have they, in themselves, any principle of preservation or of perpetuity? What is this written charter, which we are taught so much to prize and venerate? Is it any thing but ink and parchment? Nothing. You may raise the naked intellect of this whole nation to its highest attainable point, and you only prepare and accumulate the elements, in whose fiery collision this charter shall be consumed like tow. You may surround it with a whole cohort of gallant champions, whose hearts shall be as large, and whose arms shall be as strong, as those of your own great defender of its integrity and its worth—all in vain.

The elements of individual good and of universal good are identical. What is best for me is best also for all other men. If in me evil, confusion, misery and disaster are the fruits of a predominance either of the intellect merely, or of the selfish and animal propensities, or of both, over the higher powers, the same is true of a community, of a people, of the race. All history is a running commentary on this truth. I have no time to dwell, at length, on this great topic, but I can not forbear a short and passing allusion to the age of Louis XV. of France, and to the following revolution. Then, on the largest scale, since the days of the Roman emperors and their successors, the Alarics and Attilas, was the experiment tried, whether a nation could reach and keep any considerable height and degree of social and civil good, by the unaided intellect. That age in France was, emphatically, the age of intellect,—the grand, culminating epoch of cyclopedias and philosophers. But, in that aggregate of mind, then in the ascendant, there was no reverence, there was little ideality, there was no conscientiousnesss, there was no benevolence, there was no recognition of the disinterested and self sacrificing in humanity. The order, which God has ordained as an indispensable condition of individual, and so of general greatness and good, was reversed; the understanding, which was then called reason, was placed above the true kingly powers of the mind, and the issue was what it was, what it always has been, and ever will be, under like circumstances. Here, too, let it be remembered, that the antagonist powers, in the mind, of the animal appetites and the selfish passions, are the higher and essentially disinterested feelings, and not the understanding. And so in Paris, under Louis XV. and XVI., and in Rome, under Augustus, with the highest cultivation of the mere intellect,—there was linked the foulest corruption. In the broad blaze of that cold enlightenment, stood,—unblushing, and unreproved,—nay, worshipped rather,—crowned with garlands as true gods, every possible form and manifestation of sensualism, selfishness and crime. And what was the end? Let the dying wail of the seven-hilled city, mingled with the crash of falling temples, the gusty roar of conflagration, and the fierce clamor of Vandal armies answer. Let that gay capital of intellectual and philosophic France, when her gambling-rooms and her houses of infamous pleasure became the murky gathering places of conspiracy and murder, when her halls of science and legislation were converted into camps and citadels of civil war, when ferocity itself went reeling through her streets, satiate and drunk with carnage, when the guillotine was running day and night, with the blood of the high-born, the learned, and the beautiful,—as the fountain in her Palais Royal now flows with water,—let her, also, answer.

Milton, with the intuitive insight of genius, has not shorn, in the slightest degree, the fallen archangel of his intellectual strength. There was art, too, not less wonderful and perfect in hell than in heaven. Witness that "fabric huge" of Mulciber's which,

> "out of the earth,
> Rose like an exhalation, with the sound
> Of dulcet symphonies, and voices sweet;
> Built like a temple, where pilasters round
> Were set, and Doric pillars overlaid
> With golden architrave:"

and it may not be out of place to observe, that after the dissolution of the "Stygian Council," which had been held in this famous Pandemonium, and the disbanding of the "ranged powers," while most of these endeavored to "entertain the irksome hours" with various frivolous sports and idle occupations, there were others, evidently enough a coterie of the old school metaphysicians, who, as has since been their wont on earth,

> "A part sat on a hill retired,
> In thought more elevate, and reasoned high
> Of providence, foreknowledge, will, and fate;
> Fixed fate, free will, foreknowledge absolute;
> And found no end in wandering mazes lost
> —Vain wisdom all, and false philosophy"

DEATHS.

In Henderson, on the 8th of June, JEWETT D., infant son of Mr. Philo Hungerford, aged 17 months. Like the beautiful flower of Spring, it bloomed to fade and die.

P. M.

In Bronson, Huron county, O., May 9th, Mr. S. SOUTHGATE, aged 64 years. His illness was of the consumptive character and of long duration. It was borne with Christian resignation. He arranged his business, connected himself with the church recently formed in Peru, and departed as he had lived, in the full hope of universal salvation. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to his widow and surviving friends, and to a large concourse of sympathising citizens who deeply deplore his death, by Br. Farley.

Same township, May, 4th, Dr. E. EDSON, aged 24 years—Also, on the 10th, LEVI GROVER, aged 34 years. Both died of a complaint similar to the first named—both were likewise believers in the salvation of all our race, and their funerals were attended by Br. Farley.

In Merrickville, U. C., March 13, NAPOLEON B., son of Dr. B. R., and Mary Ann Church, aged two years and nine months.

In Marlborough, U. C., September 14th, 1837, after a long and distressing illness, RICHARD OLMSTEAD, Esq., aged 67 years. He was one of the first settlers in this part of the country, and in early life became a believer in the Restitution of all things. The comforting influences of this faith, wonderfully supported him in the hour of death. In the full view of death and eternity, he declared, "My faith is stronger—my hope is full—it is as an anchor to my soul—my prospects are brighter and brighter." In this happy frame of mind he meekly fell asleep in Jesus. Agreeably to his request, an address was delivered at his funeral, by the writer, to a numerous and attentive congregation, from Job xiv: 10.

MARY ANN CHURCH.

In Bridgewater, Susquehanna county, Pa., June 4th, after a severe illness of eleven days, ROLLIN GEORGE, son of Alfred and Matilda Peck, aged 3 years and 11 days.

The parents left Fulton, the place of their residence, with their two little children, the son above named and a daughter a year old, to visit their friends in this region, with high anticipations of social enjoyment. But soon after their arrival, the canker rash or scarlet fever, a sickness the most dreadful among children, seized their lovely little prattlers. One deceased on the second week of its confinement; the other still survives. (June 18) but with doubtful prospects of recovery.—Susq. Reg.

In Plymouth, June 22d, Mrs. REBECCA W. MONROE, aged 63 years—widow of the late Col. William Monroe, and daughter of Rev. Dea. Foster, A. M., of Charleston, N. H., an early advocate of Universalism, (see Modern History of Universalism, p. 336.)

The deceased possessed a degree of intellect—a strength of judgment and memory united—with an acute sensibility, which fall to the lot of but few of our race. She possessed an unwavering faith in the great and precious truths of divine revelation, and a firm hope of an immortality of happiness and purity for herself and a ransomed universe. In the relation of parent, friend and neighbor; her Christian virtues and genuine spirit of benevolence, rendered her a bright and shining light in community, and secured the friendship and esteem of all who had the happiness of knowing her. But the loss of her daughter and of her companion, with the care, anxiety, fatigue and affliction induced by these saddening events, gradually prostrated her physical energies and deprived her of reason. In this situation her spirit returned to God who gave it.

A large assembly of sympathising friends and mourning relatives convened on the 22d inst., to pay their last tribute of respect, and evince that the memory of the just is blessed. Discourse by the writer from Ps. xxiii: 1-4.

ON THE BEST PRACTICABLE MEANS OF PROMOTING THE KNOWLEDGE AND PRACTICE OF UNIVERSALISM

BY REV. JOSEPH BAKER, OF SWANTON, VT.

Every truth is more or less valuable, according to its tendency to increase the happiness of mankind, by improving them in wisdom and virtue; and that theory is evidently the best adapted to our wants, which presents to the human mind a perfect model of goodness, and requires continual perseverance in a cause of peace, in good will toward men. Nor can it be denied, that those tenets, which embrace these qualities, possess in themselves the most intrinsic merit; and when these requirements are violated by opposites, the fault is not in the principles themselves, but in the professed voturies, who are led in another course, by the influence of some baser motive at war with those principles, which when followed, lead us in the way of peace and happiness.

If our happiness, as individuals, depends on our peace of mind, and the exercise of a spirit of kindness, and good will, then it must be evident, that the more generally the principles best calculated to produce such results, are diffused, the greater will be our opportunity to increase our happiness; as the means to obtain it will be so much more generally understood. A law, therefore, must exist, which, if obeyed, will be attended with present happiness, as we can only enjoy the present moment; and this law must be known to exist, and the consequences be understood and appreciated; and then, by some means, mankind must be induced to obey that law from choice, for when compulsion is the cause of obedience, there must be misery. This law is evidently love, as this is the only emotion in which the mind can rest. Nor must it be believed that this law is opposed to the character of the lawgiver, thereby opposing the precept to the example, and introducing horrible confusion—as often is done, by representing the Creator as burning with vindictive wrath against his enemies, and hating a part of his creatures with an infinite hatred, and at the same time requiring us to be like him—to possess his spirit, to be god-like and love our enemies, and overcome evil with good; thus rendering it impossible to serve masters so different, and plainly showing that those, in whose hearts the law is, cannot have the spirit they ascribe to Deity, that is cruelty, the effect of hatred and wrath. Hence the example must be in accordance with, and as perfect as the commandment, and it must be known that "God is love," and that "his tender mercies are over all his works." This view of his character shows to mankind that those who are truly god-like, are those who keep the law; and that those who possess his spirit, are those whose minds lead them to practice pure benevolence. These are the elements of Universalism, which teaches the boundless love and goodness of God, and requires the exercise of these principles by mankind. And this doctrine, we conceive to be of inestimable value in improving the moral and intellectual condition of the human race, and thereby increasing their happiness.

But what are the best means of promoting the knowledge and practice of these principles? To answer this question, it becomes necessary to inquire, what are the ruling passions in the human mind? These will be found to be, the love of happiness, and the dread of pain. Happiness we are always pursuing, and misery we invariably wish to shun; and in our endeavors to obtain the former and avoid the latter, we are invariably directed by our opinions. For if an object that, when obtained, will produce pain, is believed to be a source of pleasure, it is as eagerly followed as a real source of joy; and if the way of peace is believed to be laborious and painful, it is as studiously avoided as a real evil when known. But our errors cannot change facts, nor make evil a source of joy, nor goodness painful, by believing them to be so; though by this ignorance of the truth we are deprived of many joys by avoiding the tree on which they grow, and suffer the miserable effects of embracing evils, whose better fruits are unknown until too late to avoid them. Hence the value of truth and knowledge are apparent, and hence it may be seen, that falsehood never can be valuable or useful, as it invariably leads its votaries in the practice of evil, and therefore, when thus guided, they seek happiness in those objects that only afford misery, and shun their only real good. Truth, then, is the guide to happiness; and when mankind are convinced of this fact, they will at once endeavor to obtain it in a pure state. By this means they will be led to investigate creeds and opinions, which, otherwise, would have been received or rejected without examination; and when once an examination commences, it is soon perceived that those opinions which are the source of present misery, can not be true, as the same causes always produce similar effects.—Therefore, the truth of such creeds would secure the endless misery of all who believe them, and it is also discovered that those systems which produce a grateful and pious joy when believed, must be founded in truth, being necessary to present happiness, and consequently the reality is necessary to constitute perfect felicity.

By thus teaching that truth and falsehood produce opposite effects, and that, when we are guided by unerring wisdom, happiness is sure, (for then we invariably choose the course that will produce it,) they will perceive that infinite wisdom alone can devise a law, obedience to which, will continually produce peace and joy; as infinite wisdom alone can see the consequences of all actions. Hence such a law they will expect from infinite Goodness, and when such a law is found, it will be at once esteemed as the most precious treasure, and a willing obedience will follow. The command being good, it will be known that obedience can not produce pain, but must be congenial to our happiness; and that a contrary act must spring from a contrary cause; and as wisdom and truth always lead us in a course of happiness, the causes of misery must be error and falsehood, or, in the language of Scripture, must spring from the father of lies, and lead us in a course contrary to the other—in disobedience, sin and wretchedness.

From this, mankind may be convinced of the inestimable value of God's laws, made known by divine revelation, as they teach us what the wisdom of man never could have perfectly discovered. The Gospel is the very blessing we most need, and may be resorted to as an invariable guide for all who wish to discover the way of real enjoyment, and to prove the Giver a kind and benevolent benefactor. By this light we view the Creator as our friend, who has kindly pointed out to us what are our true interests, and who, in all his dispensations, consults the good of his creatures, and is supremely happy in his own perfections. The original source of happiness being thus revealed, we at once perceive that to be like him, or to possess his spirit, we shall enjoy a measure of the same felicity, as the same combination of causes, although in proportion infinitely less, must produce the same effects in proportion to our capacities. This view of our heavenly Father's character, at once adopts the doctrine of Universalism, as it represents him happy in dispensing blessings even to his erring children, and teaches us that "he is kind to the unthankful and the evil." The belief of this truth produces joy, and is therefore valuable, and the opposite opinion, as Deity is immutable, must be false, and, like all other false creeds, productive of pain, therefore it is pernicious. As we never choose a painful and evil course for a good one, unless we are deceived, it follows that those who believe in the vindictive wrath of their Creator, are deceived; and, as the opinion produces pain, and as anger is incompatable with happiness, it can not exist in the character of Him who is infinitely happy. The plainest arguments are best, being most easily understood; therefore, when it is shown, that error leads us into the way of pain, mankind will look upon painful doctrines as being founded in falsehood, and judging trees by their fruit, will reject them; and when it is known that truth leads us to happiness, they will seek and find rest in those consoling opinions that produce it.

But is it not necessary to teach infinite rewards for obedience, and the most terrific punishments for disobedience, that the mind may be the more powerfully influenced? I answer, no. For, by such a course, confidence in the lawgiver's impartiality and goodness is destroyed, for there never can be an infinite difference in the deserts of finite creatures; therefore infinite rewards would be partial, and to inflict a penalty above the creature's capacity would be cruelty. Again—goodness always opposes evil, therefore Deity can not be good unless opposed to every thing which does not result in good—and endless pain would not so result. Cruelty and tyranny, instead of producing a spirit of subordination and obedience, beget distrust, rebellion and hatred. The mind, which is the spring of action, being thus polluted, disobedience follows, as the history of nations will show. But when rewards and punishments are seen to be the consequences of our actions, and these limited to our capacities and finite like ourselves; and that all blessings above the consequences of virtue, are the gifts of God, confidence, thankfulness and love spring up in the mind, and obedience follows from choice. But when a reward above our comprehension is offered, the mind, like the eye, looking at objects beyond its powers, becomes weary of the effort, therefore such an offer is useless, for who can comprehend infinity? Nor can we be terrified above our faculties of understanding without destroying a just equilibrium of mind and producing insanity; therefore the doctrine of endless, unmerciful agony is pernicious, as it either destroys reason, or paralizes the mind that vainly endeavors to comprehend it.

Man, being finite and limited in his capacities, views all things in perspective: what is nearest, being the most clearly understood, appears the most important, and is calculated to make the strongest impression on the mind, although a trifle when placed by the side of a more distant object. Events which occur within the circle of our own observation, excite us much more, though trifling in themselves, than the most tremendous occurrences which we can not personally witness. The entrance of a stranger will draw the attention of an audience from the most vivid descriptions of infinite wrath, and a congregation will sleep under the most appalling threatenings of eternal misery, when general confusion and alarm would be the consequence of informing the same hearers, that a neighbor's house was in flames! Preachers have wondered at the indifference of hearers, when denouncing tempests of angry fire upon them; and hearers have wondered at the coolness of preachers, and their apparent apathy when describing the tortures of the damned. It is not so much from a want of feeling in either, as from incapacity to realize or comprehend the doctrine; therefore they will jest upon it, when an actual view of misery not a hundreth part as excruciating, would forever drive joy from their hearts and freeze their souls with horror, and, if compelled to view the sight without being able to relieve the sufferers, would drive them to distraction. Consequently, the visible effects of sin, when properly painted out, will strike the mind with the greatest force, and will produce the strongest impressions upon all especially the young; and unhappily, examples of the painful effects of evil are numerous—more numerous, we fear, because the attention of mankind has generally been called to hear effects described which are out of sight, instead of being directed to serious realites. To reclaim the vicious, it will be necessary to bring his attention back to the truth—show him that God has forbidden iniquity, because it is the cause of degradation and misery; and that it is his error of opinion which leads him astray, and teaches him to look for happiness on an evil tree, where it can not be found—show him that infinite wisdom, in kindness and love, has pointed out the way to obtain present happiness, and, that to continually enjoy it, he must seek it in obedience to those laws which are given for our good, and invariably speak truth.

The arguments, by which those who are in the course of duty, are kept from forsaking virtue and listening to the siren song of temptation, must be similar. Point the innocent person to his own breast, and ask why it is that peace and joy thrill through soul—and ask him who feels love and good will rise in his heart towards all men, why he is happy?—and he will say that it is because such reflections and emotions are in themselves pleasant. Then show him that these are rays from the great fountain of happiness, who is Love; and that to love is the fulfilling of the law—that law, given by him who knows every source of happiness, and has, in this law, pointed them out to his creatures. Truth has guided him, and he has thus far walked in wisdom's ways. Let him beware of the opposite course, viz: wrath, the opposite to mercy, and hatred, the reverse of love. The wages of sin is death. It is death to all his present sources of happiness, and, consequently, to all pure enjoyment. Let him know that in the day he eats, or has experimental knowledge of what is forbidden, he must surely die; and let him reject the doctrine of the serpent, which teaches that there is pleasure in sin—that his joys will not surely die, but that it depends on his own agency, whether he will be punished or not.

But there is another class who deserve our most careful attention. Those who are soon to fill that station we now occupy—the rising generation. To cultivate the expanding mind—to lead the child into the way of wisdom, and accustom his feet to tread the path of virtue at first—to guard and fortify the inexperienced youth against the allurements of sin and the examples of the vicious, have ever been praise worthy objects with the philanthropist. But still the most ardent efforts are often unavailing, and those who have had the most care and labor spent on their education, turn out the very opposite of what was intended; and we see others arise, apparently with but little help, far above expectation. The cause of this is, doubtless in a great measure, to be found in a wrong system of instruction. The tutor can not come down to the understanding of the pupil, for his destinies are shrouded in mystery. The learner sees his time thrown away, and his efforts vain—the task is above his strength, and he becomes discouraged—carelessness and indifference follow, or even disgust, as the mind loathes what it is forced to receive, but cannot digest. But the most illiterate person can point to plain facts, and these are the most readily received by the youth. Let, then, the effects of intemperance, folly and crime, be pointed out—show how they have sunk their victims to the lowest depths of degradation and misery—let it be shown that these are the effects of a deviation from the course of rectitude, and that every step in crime is towards the same result—that these hideous masses, like the mightiest rivers, arise from small beginnings, and the argument will be incomparably better calculated to fortify the youthful mind, than metaphysical reasonings which are not supported by facts. Again, what can be better calculated to lead the youth in wisdom and virtue—what can be more effectual than to assist him in tracing happiness to its original source? How will his heart leap for joy when he discovers it to be love—the source of all blessings, and, that "God is love"!

Thus a connexion is kept up between our faith and duty. The great truth is at the foundation of each. "God is love." To know him, and Jesus Christ, whom he has sent, is eternal life; and the practice of this doctrine is the only way to possess what we all seek, that is, the enjoyment of present happiness. This, then, is our duty. "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor, therefore love is the fulfilling of the law."

VIRTUE ITS OWN REWARD.

BY J. S. KIBBE.

Although human virtue is not perfect, yet, the practice of it should be recommended, for the peace and consolation it administers to the mind, when the storms of adversity sweep over it, and affliction beats against it. And perhaps it may be said with propriety, that there is no exercise which yields a greater degree of comfort, than the practice of virtue.

It makes a man happy within himself, and happy in administering to the wants of those around him. It brings forward the most thrilling emotions of joy, that he has been the instrument in promoting the happiness of his fellow-creatures—in adding to their earthly felicity—in alleviating their common misery—in causing them by his precept and example to abandon their folly and wickedness—to break off from their evil deeds by learning to do well—in raising them from the depth of corruption and degradation to the practice of virtue, that better and holier principle of our nature, and thereby securing to them as well as himself the smiles and approbations of a kind and indulgent Providence. It reflects sunshine in his pathway, and raises his affections to that Being who is the source of all the happiness with which he is surrounded; and thus widens out his sphere of pleasures, by uniting intellectual and spiritual enjoyments with the joys of earth. It enables him to look forward with complacency upon the prospects before him, to reflect with the most endearing pleasure upon the path he has been pursuing; and from the overflowings of his heart he is constrained to say, if I steadfastly walk in the road which reason and virtue dictates, and run the race of wisdom that is set before me, "surely goodness and mercy will follow me all the days of my life; and I shall dwell in the house of the Lord forever!"

It is he only, who, with undaunted steps, pressed forward with an eye single to all that is sacred; who with unyielding perseverance, pursues on in the direct road which leads to all that is great and good; and who, with unremitting confidence travels onward, not suffering his feet to turn aside from the path marked out by the handmaid of virtue—he is wise that hears the consoling voice addressed to him, "Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a cheerful heart; for God now accepteth thy works." He that follows in the track, guided and lighted by the lamp of virtue, experiences none of those corroding fears and terrors which perpetually feast upon the pleasures of the wayward and the vicious—he feels none of the dread and horror which continually sap the foundation of the peace and happiness of him who is wandering far from the path of rectitude—he is called to labor and struggle against none of the conflicting passions which distract the minds, and dampen all the joy of the ungrateful and the obstinate; but a serene countenance, enlivened and rendered brilliant by an approving conscience, is his, while he remains in the footsteps trodden by the virtuous; a sweet recollection of the past, embittered by no gloomy thoughts, renders the present truly a season of rejoicing, and gives a double relish to every innocent pleasure with which he is surrounded; a firm reliance upon the will of his Almighty Benefactor, supports him under every trouble, and he is resolved to walk in the path of wisdom and virtue, for he finds that their "ways are ways of pleasantness and that all their paths are peace." And thus he glides smoothly down the stream of time towards the ocean of futurity which is unbounded and shoreless.

With what perfect tranquillity does he look forward to his approaching dissolution, when he shall be called to pass through the dark "valley of the shadow of death;" when life's last flickering hope is glimmering by, and its spirit is hovering around their frail tenement; when in the latest stage of its earthly existence, he is about to bid adieu to the things of time, and go to be clothed in a robe of salvation, washed white in the blood of the Redeemer! What an incentive then have we to follow in the path of virtue, to keep it constantly in view, and thereby secure her reward; for her reward is with her.

DESULTORY REFLECTIONS.

Self-love seems to have been implanted in our natures for a wise and benevolent purpose. It is the propelling power which calls all the other faculties of the mind into action; and the enlightened philosopher and sage is as often influenced by it as the most illiterate barbarian. The one finds true felicity in ameliorating the condition of his species, and reciprocating the blessings of Providence with them, while the other seeks his single gratification at the expense of his fellow creatures. National pride or love of country is very nearly allied to selfishness, yet on so broad a scale as to almost deserve the name of philanthropy. Indeed, there are few minds so degraded, as not to feel strong emotions of pleasure on hearing it observed, that our country is the happiest the sun visits, and that our government is administered with equity and justice. And who does not feel indignant at hearing foreigners speak against the land of his birth? This amour patria is common to all, the good and the bad, the wise and the ignorant.

Ambition, when it has for its aim the good of a nation, is one of the noblest principles that actuates the soul of man. But when, as in the cases of Alexander and Bonaparte, we find him drenching the earth with human gore, and spreading desolation upon its surface to gain for himself an empty name, we turn from it with horror, and hastily conclude that ambitious men are always enemies to mankind. Yet when we contemplate the character of our beloved Washington, we feel assured that he was inspired by a higher and holier ambition than that of self aggrandizement. And could those revolutionary patriots, who fought and fell to gain our independence, have realized the gratitude which unborn nations would feel, would it not have softened the asperity of their sufferings, and lighted up the darkest hour with a gleam of hope?

It is a matter of serious regret to every benevolent mind, that so few good men have been successful, when endeavoring to render the condition of mankind better. And that, when societies have been formed for the best of purposes, there is too frequently a Judas united with them, whose evil genius enables him to defeat all the good intentions of his brethren. And often times, when they are all united to promote some good end, they disagree about the means; and some withdraw their aid because their opinions are not adopted, or because some one is more honored than themselves. These are some of the evils of self love, grounded, too frequently, upon the mistaken notion that our happiness is increased, in proportion as it is contrasted with the misery of others. And hence too, the popular notion which prevails in this world, that the happiness of the blessed in heaven, will be enhanced by beholding the torments of the damned. "O shame, where is thy blush!" Let us suppose there are two individuals, both of them wealthy. The one shuts up his hand of charity, that he may have a keener relish of those blessings he has at his command, by beholding, at the same time, the want and wretchedness of his unfortunate neighbors; while the other is surrounded by happy people whom he has benefited. The fatherless and the widow, the poor and the wretched, bless him with their gratitude. And he is blessed at the same time with the consciousness of having done his duty. Which of these men, think you, is the happiest? JULIET.

THE FOLD OF CHRIST.

"And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold, and one shepherd." John x: 16.

That Christ had reference to unbelievers, when he said he had "other sheep," is apparent, from the following considerations:

1. They belonged not to the fold, which the believers did. "And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold." Of what fold? The fold of Christ, in which were the believers. Then if the believers were in the fold of Christ, (and this, no one will dispute.) those which were not of this fold, must, of course, have been unbelievers.

2. They had not heard the voice of Christ. "Them also, I must bring, and they shall hear my voice." To hear the voice of Christ, is to listen to, and obey his instructions. Those, then, who had not heard his voice, had not obeyed his instructions; and this is true, not of believers, but unbelievers.

This fact being established, it may be well to inquire, if the sheep in the fold, and out of the fold, do not embrace all mankind? At the eleventh verse, Jesus says, "I am the good shepherd: the good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep." Christ being the good shepherd, for whom did he give his life? The Scriptures assure us, that he "tasted death for every man"—that he "gave himself a ransom for all." It is also worthy of observation, that Christ does not inform us, that he had any sheep, excepting those that were in and out of the fold. Consequently, these must embrace every son and daughter of Adam.

We have now paved the way, to ascertain, with precision, how many of the human family are ultimately to be brought into the fold of the great shepherd, Jesus Christ. This is an inquiry of the utmost importance. A subject which relates to our final state, is fraught with deep interest; and should claim our serious and undivided attention.

Now what says Jesus Christ? "And other sheep I have." What other sheep. Why, unbelievers. "Them also I must bring." What! all of them? All these unbelievers brought from their state of unbelief? Yes, every one—not one left behind. Well, what is to be done with them? Why, says one, they "shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God," (meaning endless misery.) But what says Christ? "And they shall hear my voice." That may be, says another, and still be in misery. "And they shall hear my voice, and there shall be"—two folds and two shepherds? No; thank Heaven, not so. "And they shall hear my voice, and there shall be one fold, and one shepherd." What! not but one fold of the great family of man, and that too, of endless happiness? This is a very strange doctrine, to many ears. But as strange as it may appear, it is nevertheless the saying of him, who "spake as never man spake." Yes, it is a truth, as sure as the words of the great Messiah, that those who are out of his fold, shall be, by him, brought in, and there shall be but "one fold, and one shepherd."

What a meeting that will be, when the last wandering sheep of a sinful race shall be reclaimed, and brought into the fold of holiness and happiness! There not a tear will flow from the eye—not a sigh will rise in the breast—no lamentings that a friend is left behind—but every human being will be clothed with immortality and bliss; and the rising sigh hushed in every heart forever. Then will the strings of angels' harps vibrate sweetly upon the ear, and seraphs' lyres shall mingle their notes, without a discord, in singing with small and great, the glorious and triumphant song, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards men!" "OF ECSTACY, OR RANT, THERE IS NO NEED."

This ancient saying appears to me to be worthy of a place among the standing maxims of the day: its truth is so apparent, and its monition so appropriate, one might think it had been uttered by prophetic vision, for the age in which we live. Perhaps mankind were never more prone to run into extremes, than within a few years. Enthusiasm and fanaticism have been the order of the day, notwithstanding the wisdom of the wise, and the experience of all cry out against them. Commerce, Politics, Law, and Religion, have seemed to run wild, if not mad. To prove this, need I instance cases of revivals within the last ten years, and show to what a pitch of feeling the religious community were raised, and then present the counterpart, in the death-like stupidity and tombstone coldness that has taken their place, or the flagrant violation of all law, equity and humanity, in the recent prevalence of mobocracy; or the commercial embarrassments, bankruptcies, and pauperism of the last twelve months, the result in a great measure of the speculative mania that has paralized the best exertions of the laboring class, the bone and sinew of the country; or the strifes and triumphs of political warfare, and multiplied cases that might be mentioned to swell the evidence; or are these sufficient to convince us, that as with individuals, so with communities, all excesses of feeling and action, are so many drafts upon after life, with usurious interest?—surely of "ecstacy there is no need."

But what shall I say of rant? This is so common and so universally acknowledged to be unsocial and unlovely, that I need not stop for proof—I would to Heaven it were only heard amidst the strife and controversies of civil and political warfare. But alas! it stops not here—even in religion, the sanctuary, and the pulpit, can we discover the impress of this cloven foot. The sectarianisms of the day are a prolific cause of this evil; denominational differences, slight in themselves, are magnified till they appear like the beast with seven heads and ten horns, against which they must wage warfare; and those who should be engaged in one common cause, have one common interest, and one final home, are engaged in racing with one another—while the enemy triumphs over their collision, and tauntingly enquires "who will show us any good?"

"Thus man, devotes his brother and destroys."

Oh! how long ere the heirs, the blood-redeemed sons and daughters of the Almighty, will learn to "keep the unity of the spirit in the bonds of peace." Where is that honor, that high sense of propriety which should distinguish individuals so exalted, from the strife and mangling of political aspirants, and the low and grovelling action of interested and selfish men! But enough of this—can not the eye of the vigilant and watchful, through the darkness and troubles of the present, discern the approach of better times? May we not hope that the days of enthusiasm, and I like to have said witchcraft, are over, that passion and feeling will not be the rule of action, but that reason, calm and considerate, will triumph over delusion and error, and unity be at once the beauty and glory of Christianity. Then will the church, by her united, continuous, and consistent action, be terrible to the combined powers of infidelity—then will she indeed become "the light of the world"—a light that "can not be hid," shining more and more unto the perfect day.

AN ADDRESS TO LIFE.

O life! thou art often terrible; yet thousands hold thee as the only balm in Gilead! But, O, life; when joyful, thou createst a haven of bliss on earth! But mysterious wanderer, whence comest thou? what power rules thee? More mysterious than Sol's scorching rays at Summer's mid-day is thine origin to find out! Ha! strange! How couldst thou penetrate this mass of clay with that nerving promptitude which urges the lifeless pen over the wan bosom of the inanimate sheet? I have watched thy last glimmering ray, that shone on the countenance of the beloved one, O life! with breaking heart and anxious hoping to see thee gain thy former buoyancy—but alas! thy Ruler deprived me of my anticipated joy on earth, and thou soar'dst away to dwell in ineffable and eternal bliss! THE CHRISTIAN'S REST.

"For we which have believed do enter into rest." Heb. iv: 3.

This Scripture contains more than I find allowed by my Partialist brethren, for it is applied by them, to the post mortem state. But we find the inspired singer of Jerusalem corroborating this. "Great peace have they that love thy law, and nothing shall offend them." Do we find Partialists at rest, and nothing to offend them?—have they this great peace of mind?—are they not in torment at the possibility of being cast off through eternity?—are not their ears offended by the pastime of the wicked?—and do not their works prove they say to themselves, come not near me, I am more holy than thou? The holy Scriptures inform us that our Father "sends rain upon the just and the unjust," and bids us be perfect as our Father in heaven is perfect. In fulfilling this commandment, should not we remember that we are all members of one body, and brethren of the same human family, and have one common Parent? He that shutteth up his bowels of compassion toward his brother, how dwelleth the love of God in him? Let us all be faithful to the new commandment, "that ye love one another," and by so doing we shall enter into rest. N. M. T.

MY MOTHER.

How many endearing associations are connected with the name of mother. That being whose love transcends all other affections of the heart, who is gentle to reprove the waywardness of her children, and ever ready to forgive them. Faint emblem of Him, whose love is immutable and immortal! Her love is not of that base and sordid kind, which has its origin in selfish, sinister motives, but that pure, genuine, disinterested love, which knows no selfishness—is not chilled by misfortune, nor stifled by ingratitude. It is deep, and settled, and can never be eradicated. This spark of love, dwelling in none but a mother's breast, must be an emanation of the Deity. It was bestowed for the wisest and best of purposes. It was placed there by the gracious and benevolent ordination of Providence. It is the image that hovers over us in the agonies of dissolving nature, and whispers to us, "fear not," I still watch over you—be not dismayed, for God is love. When the last flattering of the vital lamp is about to be extinguished, in that flush of thought, of home, and friends, the last image that surrounds our dying bed, is a fond mother's; and the last wish or aspiration that issues from the lips, is, my mother.

COLDNESS AND INDIFFERENCE OF UNIVERSALISTS.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

To a true lover of the cause of God, there is no one thing so chilling and disheartening as the indifference of those who profess to believe in Jesus as the Saviour of the world. Yet there are thousands of this character associated with our societies. They hang like dead weights upon us, neither benefiting themselves nor others. Such a course is far worse than persecution, for that may be borne: that generally advances the cause it designs to destroy. It has been the misfortune of the writer to meet with many cold hearted professors of God's truth. Among societies where such men are found, he has heard many excuses urged in extenuation of a neglect of duty. In regard to preaching, they pretend to be very particular. It must be just such a man. He must not be very young nor very old. He must not be too severe, nor too mild. Then again, in places where this indifference exists, it will often be urged, that they have no place to preach in; that they are few in number, and poor in this world's goods. The first can not be true in the present state of society, or not to a great extent. The early disciples of our Lord would meet any where, in rocks, caverns, in each other's houses. They never supposed they could not meet for want of a place. If in any town Universalists are few in number, it certainly should be a reason for action. For how can they increase without using what strength they have? Let others see them doing what they can, and there will be some inducement to join them. As it regards poverty, it will be found that where this is professed, if any course presents itself in society, where money is to be made directly, then there is enough of this world's goods; as though temporal blessings were worth more than spiritual. Men forget the injunction of Jesus: "Seek first the kingdom of heaven and all these things shall be added unto you." They mean to seek every thing else first. Riches, fame, power, popularity, must all be sought to the neglect of the Gospel. Hence, Jesus, or his cause, is left to suffer, or find its way along without their aid. But one thing is evident. He who does nothing for a cause, can not enjoy its triumphs. This is the punishment assigned to the mere professor. It is a lamentable fact that our cause is now suffering more from professed friends than from open enemies. It would be better if all such persons would leave us. Ten men who love the cause heartily, are better than a thousand who merely profess it, but have no regard to its demands.

It is time that we commence more vigorously. Other denominations are alive in the propagation of sentiments that produce wretchedness and despair, while we have a doctrine that is designed to make the whole world happy, and yet many scarcely speak a word in its favor. Let us then show our regard for the truth. Let every man examine himself, and see if he has done his duty, remembering the declaration of Jesus: "He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me, and he that loveth son or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me."

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.....NO. VI.

BY REV. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

"Deliver my, soul O Lord, from lying lips, and from a deceitful tongue. What shall be given unto thee, or what shall be done unto thee, thou false tongue." Ps. xx: 2, 3.

What an excellent prayer! The Psalmist prayed to be delivered from using lying lips, and having a deceitful tongue. When we remember how much evil is effected, how many families are disturbed, how the peace of community is turned into contention by lying lips and false tongues, it were devoutly wished, that the prayer of every person was like the prayer of the Psalmist, and that it came from the heart to be remembered in all circumstances. But see how energetically he describes the evil of a lying lip and a false tongue. "Sharp arrows of the mighty, with coals of juniper." Ver. 4. But what are we to understand by "sharp arrows of the mighty?" In ancient times, it was the custom to use arrows in war, which were wrapped round with combustible materials, and fired to destroy ships, buildings and towers—these arrows were very much dreaded by besieged cities. The tenacity of the combustible materials used, is well expressed by allusion to coals of juniper. It is well known in eastern countries that coals from juniper wood are the hottest, and last longer than those formed from any other wood. With what figure could the Psalmist better express his views of the evils of a lying tongue, than by arrows whose fires were as tenacious and as burning, as the coals of the juniper wood? Nothing could be more striking.

The apostle James was not behind in this matter. He calls the tongue a "little member" which "no man can tame," a little fire, "which kindleth a great matter"—and of inconsistency in its use, he says, "therewith bless we God, even the Father; and therewith curse we men, which are made after the similitude of God; out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing." James iii: 9, 10. This practice, he strongly reprobates; and most judiciously and properly too—it is not right, nor can any man defend the practice, of taking the name of God in vain. It ought not to be, for it is ungrateful. But deceitful lips, a profession of friendship to the face, and secret enmity away, is so contrary to Christianity, to right, to every thing correct, that it needs no remarks from me, for I am persuaded, that those professing the glorious faith of a world's salvation, will not be guilty of it.

James never uttered a greater truth, when he said, "if any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body." Chap. iii: 2. It requires such constant care to speak properly, to watch each and every expression, that he who rigidly performs it, will discover his failings in other points of view, and will remedy them. In view then, of our proneness to evil speech and the necessity of watchfulness, let our prayer be, "deliver my soul, O Lord, from lying lips, and from a deceitful tongue."

[Unfortunately the following was accidentally omitted last week, and its omission was not perceived until too late to remedy it. We give it and the following number in this paper, that succeeding numbers may appear regularly and in due time. A. B. G.]

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, JULY 15, 1838.

ROMANS XIV: 1-12.

Were Paul to return to this world, and appear among us, would he not be astonished and indignant, to find the very same faults to reprove among professed Christians of the present day, which, eighteen centuries ago, he attempted to banish from all Christian society? The illiberal and contentious spirit which he has denounced in this paragraph and chapter, he would still find extensively prevalent. We thank God that it is on the wane, if appearances deceive us not, and we fervently desire its extermination from the bosom of every brother of the human family. We think we have found self-examining reflection upon this passage of Paul's epistle, tend to this desirable consummation; and, in hope of a similar result, we would invite the readers of this paper to a similar process.

Some of our readers, doubtless, will understand Paul's reasoning without any explanation; to others it may be necessary to state the circumstances which called forth this invective and exhortation.

In the first century, or in the days of the apostles, there were among the professed believers in the divine mission of Jesus, both Jews and Gentiles. In the society of believers to whom this letter was addressed, this was the case. The Jewish converts still maintained their regard to the Mosaic institutions, and particularly, as appears from this chapter, they adhered to the laws of Moses in respect to clean and unclean meats, sacred and common days. In addition to the list of unclean meats which we find in the books of Moses, the Jews of that age also refrained from those meats which were sold in the public markets of Gentile cities, because frequently such had been offered in sacrifice to the heathen Deities. The Gentile converts, on the other hand, had no scruples about the meats which were set before them; and, finding no precept inculcating any distinction of days among the injunctions of their Teacher and Master, they held every day alike sacred. Paul had never been at Rome to witness the divisions, discussions, and want of fraternal affection which these differences of opinion had created among the believers in that city, but he had been informed of them, probably by Aquila and Priscilla, who were recently from Rome at the time Paul wrote this epistle.

Now, what do we find the apostle saying to those two parties, who, on these grounds of opinion, had allowed themselves to indulge unkind and censorious feelings? He exhorts the Gentile convert to receive the Jewish Christian, who was weak in his belief regarding meats and days, to friendly intercourse; but by no means to enter into a disputation with him upon those points in which they disagreed. For, says he, it is just as natural and easily accounted for, that one of you should have no prejudices against eating any kind of meat, as that another of you, through early instilled opinions, should entertain such fears of doing wrong in eating such meats as he can generally obtain in a heathen country, as to prefer to restrict himself entirely to vegetable food. If so, why should the more liberal despise him that is less so? and, on the other hand, why should he whose conscience forbids him to partake of certain food, condemn the conduct of him who acts equally conscientiously in eating all kinds; since it is evident, by the extension of supernatural gifts to some of these, that their conduct finds acceptance with God? Besides, says Paul, what would any one of you think of himself were he to interfere with another man's servant, in dictating to him the mode in which he should render him service, or censure him because he did not take this, that, or the other mode of shewing to his master his regard for his interests, or his love for his person. Equally improper and presumptuous is it, to pass judgment upon the members of Christ's family, or those engaged in his cause and service. As the household servant is accountable only to his own master, so are those who have entered themselves servants of Christ, accountable only to their master. Would not this consideration, if allowed to have full and free influence upon our feelings, repress and counteract many unworthy emotions which are apt to spring up in our bosoms, when we are brought into collision with those who differ from us in opinion, as to points in which it is allowable and natural that Christians should differ? Those who differ from us, are the Lord's servants and free-men, as well as we; equally as sincere and devoted in their attachment to Jesus as we, so far as we are entitled to judge; and shall we despise or condemn such, because their mode of showing their attachment, or of promoting their Master's cause, is different from ours? As we would claim exemption from such censure ourselves, let us extend it also to others. P. JOHN XIII: 1-17.

In our last, we transported ourselves, in imagination, to the city of Rome, to behold among the earliest professors of Christain discipleship, deplorable dissensions, and such a want of fraternal good will as may still be observed among even the most ardent professors. We there saw the Roman deriding and despising the Jew for his observance of the precepts of Moses, in reference to forbidden meats and sacred seasons, and the Jew, in word and deed, demonstrates his condemnation of the Roman for his neglect of these observances. We listened to Paul's rebuke of these unchristian dispositions; heard him expound the impropriety of any man's passing judgment upon the servant of another, and of course, of the conduct of those who passed any sentence upon those whose Master and sole Judge was the Lord; heard him inculcate that Christians were not accountable to one another, but to Jesus; that differences of opinion were natural, and that it was not required of any man, that, in his religious opinions or services, he should conform himself to others, but that he should be fully satisfied in his own mind of of their validity, and that he should be sincere; that every Christian should believe that others were equally conscientious as himself; and, lastly, that the service of their adopted King did not consist in the observance of days or abstinence from meats, but in the cultivation and exercise of stern uprightness, and of a peaceful and cheerful disposition. From listening to and meditating upon this rebuke of a fault from which few of us can boast exemption, we trust we have derived some advancement in a Christian-like temper.

From the imperial, we now pass, in imagination, to the Holy City. We there assemble with the chosen twelve, in that room where they are to eat the paschal lamb for the last time with their Master. And what do we hear the chosen followers of the meek and lowly Nazarene in dispute about? Still possessed of the idea that Jesus was to be an earthly ruler, they are busy in contending who are most worthy or most likely to be installed into the highest and most honorable situations of their Prince's government. How does Jesus deal with this ambitious, worldly spirit? In our last, we listened to Paul's rebuke of the pride of opinion; let us now hear Jesus animadvert upon the pride of place or rank. They are already seated ready for supper, being upon fixed couches, not moveable chairs; and, without apparently noticing this angry discussion, or saying any thing to those engaged in it, Jesus rises from the head of the table, and laying aside his upper garment, arrays himself like a menial, or slave, about to wash his master's feet. In silence he goes round the twelve, and while they gaze upon each other in amazement, he washes the feet of them all. No one interrupts the silence till Jesus comes to Peter, whose impetuous feelings cause him to utter, in language, the feelings of his heart: "Lord, thou shalt never wash my feet." Jesus, however, proceeds without any explanation of his present proceeding, telling Peter that he shall know the meaning of this transaction hereafter.

The mysterious and deeply impressive scene is now over, and again we behold the company seated, or rather reclining around the table. Are the disciples dull of understanding? Or do they seem to discern what their contentions about superiority are aimed at? We presume they were overwhelmed in amazement, and perceived not the moral of the transaction. Jesus now asks if they knew the meaning and design of what he had been doing. The substance of the explanation contained in verses 13th to 16th of this chapter, compared with the 25th, 26th, and 27th verses of the 22d chapter of Luke, appears to be this:—"In the kingdoms of the Gentiles there are those who exercise authority, but it is not to be so in that kingdom to which I have called you. Ye are to be all equal in rank; the elder is to be as the younger, the chief as he that serveth, and he that sitteth at meat as he that serveth. I have been among you as he that serveth, I have disdained no useful occupation, even that of a servant; and if I, whom ye justly call your Lord and Master, have descended to what are generally considered menial services, ought not ye to perform readily the most humble offices which brotherly affection and devotion to my cause requires at your hands? This is the lesson your state of sentiment required, and the inculcation of this was the object of this parabolic action. I have washed your feet as an example to you to disdain no service to which love prompts—to seek, not worldly honor and authority, but each other's advancement and happiness.—From the performance of whatever will promote these ends, be not turned aside by false notions of honor."

Wakefield does not understand our Lord to ask a question in verse 12th, but to enjoin attention and consideration. He renders the latter clause "Consider, learn, or understand what I have done for you." He says, "This address appears to be much more forcible and striking in the imperative mood. And let the reader observe with what solemnity Jesus directs their attention to his explanation of this parabolic action, which immediately follows: so that to interpret this conduct of any other doctrine distinct from humility, and condescension, and brotherly love even to the lowest offices, is the most unauthorized and impertinent comment that could possibly be devised."

But merely to understand the meaning of Jesus, to admit the necessity and propriety of the lesson, to admire, yea, even to resolve to practice, is not enough for the disciples, nor is it enough for us. Few among Christ's disciples now, but need the same supplementary lesson which follows, as well as the first twelve. We, like them, have need to be reminded that this instruction is of little value, unless practically applied—that if we neglect to act agreeably thereto, it would have been as well, or better for us never to have understood or received the heaven-sent message. How easy, comparatively, to know our duty; how difficult to perform it! Instead of blaming others for the inconsistency between their knowledge and their practice, let us pluck the beam out of our own eye, and earnestly strive to be doers of the word and not hearers only, thus deceiving ourselves to our ruin.

TREATMENT OF ENEMIES.

"Be not overcome of evil; but overcome evil with good." Rom xii: 28.

This brief sentence contains a fundamental principle of the Christian religion. It enjoins upon us the duty of exercising a benevolent disposition; especially in our treatment of enemies. The object of the apostle, was to guard those for whose benefit he was writing, against fostering a spirit of revenge, and retaliating the wrongs they should receive; and to incite them to prevent a repetition of those wrongs by acts of kindness toward those who were the perpetrators of them. To be "overcome of evil," is to permit the evil conduct of our enemies to exert that pernicious influence upon our minds, which will prompt us to imitate their vices, by a retaliation of the injuries they inflict. To "overcome evil with good," is to destroy the malice of our enemies by acts of kindness. A compliance with these injunctions, imparts many benefits; while a violation of them, is productive of the most distressing evils. He who is "overcome of evil," receives into his own breast, the base passions which render his enemy contemptible, rob him of his peace and rest, and spread ruin and desolation around him. While he who "overcomes evil with good," not only enjoys the heartfelt satisfaction arising from a knowledge of having acted well his part, but he also destroys the malice of his enemy, and deprives him of the power to repeat his offences, by converting him into a faithful friend. Were this method of overcoming evil universally adopted and practiced, the cruel wars and contentions which now exist to such an alarming extent, would be unknown among men. Peace, with her attendant blessings would reign triumphant in the earth.

The foregoing reflections give rise to an important question. Will the Deity conduct toward his enemies, as he commands us to treat ours? Or will he violate his own laws? Will he fly in a terrible rage with those who sin against him, and imitate their vices, by doing them all the injury he can possibly inflict? Or will he by the exercise of benevolence, destroy their evil dispositions and passions, sanctify their tempers and purify their hearts? In a word, will God be "overcome of evil," or will he "overcome evil with good"?

To affirm that God will become angry with, and revenge himself upon his enemies by tormenting them forever, is virtually to declare that he will violate his own laws—that he will be "overcome of evil." Supposing this to be the case, how can we obey the injunctions contained in the text, without violating another command of the Scriptures: "Be ye followers (or imitators) of God as dear children"? It is not possible. Both of these requirements can not be obeyed. If God is "overcome of evil," we can not be imitators of him, if we "overcome evil with good."

On the other hand, to maintain that God will, through the influence of his love, subdue the evil dispositions and passions of the wicked, and render them obedient, righteous and happy, is tantamount to the declaration that he will "overcome evil with good." If the Deity pursues this course, we may both imitate him, and obey the requirements of the text: "Be not overcome of evil; but overcome evil with good." In this view of the subject, we may understand the language of our Saviour: "Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy: but I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you; that you may be the children (characteristically so) of your Father which is in heaven." Here it is plainly asserted, that by doing good for evil, we become characteristically the children of the supreme Being; or, in other words, that we become imitators of his character.

One question more. How can any system of religion be true, which ascribes to the Deity, a character which, if universally imitated by man, would not only cause him to indulge continually the basest passions of human nature, and render the earth a perfect pandemonium; but also compel him to violate the plainest moral precepts of the Lord Jesus Christ? A due consideration of this subject by those who advocate the popular doctrines of the Christian church, would convince them of their errors, and bring them to a "knowledge of the truth."

HAPPINESS.

Much has been said and written upon this topic, and it may be said that much speculation has been indulged, in relation to it, which is totally irrelevant to the subject. One great source of error is, that theologians have generally defined happiness, so as to make it appear that their favorite theory is essentially necessary to its enjoyment. Thus, it is argued by some men that happiness consists in believing the truth—taking it for granted that their sentiments will sustain that name.

But if by the assertion we are to understand that that truth, whatever it may be, is the source or fountain of human happiness, I shall take the liberty to dissent from the statement. It is a truth that sin exists in the world, but will a belief in that truth make mankind happy?—If it will, then mankind can be made perfectly happy, by making them perfectly sinful.

Again, it is a truth, that in consequence of sin, there is much misery in the world. According to the statement in question, the miserable man, must, in order to be happy, believe in the truth that he is miserable; and hence, if those who are liable to final misery in hell, only believe that they are thus liable, they will believe the truth, (according to human systems,) and consequently ought to be saved and made perfectly happy!

Now, with humble deference to the feelings of opposers, let me weigh their sentiments in their own scales. They tell the world, that there will be some men who will be finally impenitent; and that those men will be miserable forever. They say, moreover, that this being the truth, we must adopt it as a system of faith, if we wish to escape the same fate ourselves. Now the argument stands thus; if the doomed one believes that he is liable to be damned, he will be saved, and consequently, his salvation depends upon his believing that which was a truth before it was believed, but which was changed into a lie, by believing it was true! But let us go a little farther. We are told that all the believers in universal salvation, will be damned. Suppose it is universally believed, that all men will be saved and made happy. According to the above sentiment, they will be made unhappy. Why? Because they do not believe the truth. Well then, suppose they are disposed to believe the truth; will our opposers tell us what is the truth? If they believe they shall be saved, they will be damned; if they believe that they will be damned, why then they will be saved. Either way they will believe a lie. How then shall they believe the truth?

I do not, however, condemn the Christian faith, as a non-essential to human happiness, in condemning mere belief, as will be seen in the sequel. The difference between the two is, that faith is a positive good, but belief may be either good or evil. A man may believe ten thousand things, and at the same time desire that none of them were true. In such a case he would endeavor to subvert or destroy the truth, in some way or other. But Faith always prompts her subjects to act in unison with her will.

The inquiry occurs then, what is the prime essential to happiness? In answering this question, I shall pay no attention to the creeds of men, but endeavor to give my views, in accordance with the testimony of the sacred oracles. The first essential source of human happiness, is a knowledge of the only living and true God. Such is the perfection of his attributes, such the love of his character, that there is not one attribute which does not shine forth in the fulness of infinite glory; and hence, the more we become acquainted with him, the more we shall love and adore him, and the more we shall become resigned to his will. There is nothing in the character of our heavenly Father, that will not, when rightly appreciated, call forth from the heart of man, the most ardent and sincere devotion and love. The Psalmist says, "How excellent is thy loving kindness, O, God! therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of thy wings. They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house; and thou shalt make them drink of the river of thy pleasures.—For with thee is the fountain of life: in thy light shall we see light." If we teach men that the fountain of life sendeth forth nothing but bitter, poisonous waters, they will, in all probability, fear, loathe and avoid it. But teach them that God is infinitely good, that he is the fountain of life and salvation, and that from that fountain gush streams of the most extatic bliss, and he will rejoice "as a strong man to run a race." He will stand forth in bold defiance of the ills of life, and look upon them with calm resignation. He will be enabled to rejoice even in the midst of tears, for he knows that "whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, ... that they may be partakers of his holiness."

Another source of happiness may be said to consist in the cultivation and exercise of the moral faculties. But in order to cultivate the moral faculties aright, it is necessary to have a knowledge of God. We must have some pattern, some standard of moral goodness, unto which to conform our own. That standard is the will and character of our heavenly Father; that pattern is presented to us, in the life of the Saviour, through whom God has "made known to us the mystery of his will." If we conform ourselves to that great Pattern and Guide, if we bring our lives up to the standard of moral excellence, exhibited in the life of Jesus, as much as we are able to, we shall be happy. What nobler employment can there be, or what can give greater happiness, than contemplating the goodness of our God, and exercising towards our kindred race, those moral feelings which are engendered by such contemplations. With the conviction, that God is good unto all, we can endure a separation from friends, and rejoice in the consoling truth, that it is for their good, and that we shall meet them again in a happier state than this. Indeed, we can resignedly endure all the afflictions incident upon mortal existence, with the assurance that they are appointed for our good, by a being who knows all our wants, and provides for them with a bountiful hand.

Here, a belief of the truth comes necessarily into the prospect, and casts a brighter glow of radiance around the future; yet that belief is the legitimate consequence of a correct knowledge of the author of our existence. Without that knowledge, we should have been as likely to believe, as many sincere though mistaken brethren do believe, that our fate was under the control of some capricious being, who was determined to make a part of his dependent offspring miserable forever, as we should, to believe we were the children of a being who will have all men to be saved. The conclusion then, is, that a knowledge of God, and the exercise of those moral feelings and principles, which are thereby awakened in the bosom of man, is the source, and the only source of all true happiness.

Who that has gazed upon the far, far curtains of ether, that has not rejoiced in view of the evidences of goodness which God has written upon the deep blue sky? Who, as he sat by the death bed of a dear friend, and administered the restorative to his parched lips, has not felt the sadness of his soul relieved, and a glow of heavenly radiance beaming into his surcharged heart at the thought, that though his friend was soon to leave him, yet the separation would not last forever, but that he was only called from the scenes of earth, to rejoice in beatific purity, and to gaze unceasingly upon the glories of infinite love; and that he should meet his friend and the whole human family, around the throne of God, and join in the song of "blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, to him who sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever!" If any, let that desolate heart go and learn the will of his God.

Who that has smiled upon the friendless orphan, and offered her a home and an altar, or saved the unfortunate from the wreck of poverty, or rescued the injured from the grasp of malice, or forgiven an enemy for the injustice he has perpetrated, or pointed the sick to the "Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world," or embraced the returning prodigal in the arms of mercy, or won the dissolute and abandoned from the way of death by the soothing voice of love, or drawn the tender waywardness of youth from the haunts of vice, has not felt that "it is more blessed to give than to receive," and that there is solid happiness to be derived from a consciousness of having done the duties that Heaven enjoins upon man? Tell me not that happiness is not to be found in good deeds. Verily, I think I have good reasons for suspecting a culpable deficiency in morals, on the part of those who separate religion from good works. I suspect they wish to hide their immoralities, by teaching that religion atones for sin. But I need not dwell upon this point, for it is generally admitted that no man can be happy, and at the same time immoral. Then let the immoral turn from the evil of their ways, and serve the living God. Let those who mourn and weep in view of what they imagine to be the will of their heavenly Father, remember, that they not only are ignorant of his true character, but that they never will, never can be happy, until having learned better, they cease to teach that he is partial and vindictive.

We have on hand a number of long delayed requests for explanations of particular passages—we will commence on them next week.

BROTHERLY LOVE.

"Let brotherly love continue."—Heb. xiii: 1.

It was obedience to this injunction which supported the early Christians in all their afflictive trials, and added a tenfold pleasure to their mutual joys, hopes and consolations. It was this principle in the Gospel, which enabled it to triumph over the combined opposition of a world in arms—which converted the altars of iniquity into footstools of our God, and caused the fierce minions of the throne, and the fiercer devotees of superstition, to bow alike their ambition and their bigotry before it, and do it reverence. It is this principle which has converted the savage to a man—ameliorated the condition of humanity—brought distant nations to serve one another in good-will—reconciled heart to heart, and man to his Maker, and which has cast around us the light of truth and the warmth of religion, until they have become such common blessings as scarcely to be appreciated.—And it is this principle which will ultimately make man, every where, what God and nature intended he should be, a brother to his fellow-man, and practically cover the earth with an experience of the truths of Heaven.

Next to love to God, the best and greatest sentiment the heart of man is capable of, brotherly affection stands pre-eminent—indeed we can scarcely imagine any precedence between two affections so wholly dependent on, and intimately connected with each other. Like the separation of religion and morality, he despoils both of their greatest value by their separation—and though one may be more useful than the other to mankind in the abstract—yet it is only by their union that their permanency can be depended on, or true happiness be enjoyed in their practice.

Man is naturally affectionate—every where his feelings flow forth, seeking objects to admire and love, and asking their love in return. He can not be happy unless he loves some object, and is loved by it in return.—The greater and more numerous, therefore, are his affections and the objects they embrace; the greater and more numerous will be his enjoyments. In the prosperity of others, he will feel prosperous—in their joys he will be joyous and happy. And as in the life of every being there is more pleasure than pain—more joy than sorrow—it follows, that by cultivating brotherly affection, our happiness must be immeasurably increased beyond any pains or griefs we can suffer by sympathy with the miseries of those we love.

But even the pain and grief we suffer in consequence of sympathy and brotherly love, is not pure pain and unmixed sorrow. It is a shadowed pleasure—a clouded bliss—a mingled sensation of joy and sadness—it is enjoyment refined, mellowed, and softened down with an alloy of privation. There is a melancholy pleasure in mourning with a friend, which fully repays the pain it gives—and which none can know, save they who have sincerely and fervently tried it.—Even in mourning for a friend, there is a melancholy feeling which seems rather grateful than otherwise to the better feelings of the soul—we muse on the virtues, reflect on the kindness, and cherish every recollection of the deceased with a tenfold pleasure, now that these remembrances are all that are left us.

Thus no pain or sorrow which sympathy gives—not even our own real pains and sorrows—are pure, unmixed evils. In the very agony of misery, there is, as it were, a vein of something like bliss. And in mourning for the loss of a relative and friend, what a soothing joy arises, like flowers blooming on a new made grave, in the remembrance of the mutual duties we have performed, one toward the other. It is light mellowing down the darkness of grief into a sadly pleasing twilight—faintly gilding the brow of sorrow's night with a ray of consolation's dawning morning!

If such are our own pains and griefs—if even they are not unmixed evils—how much more may there be saddened joys and melancholy pleasures in the pains and sorrows which we feel only through the power of sympathy and brotherly love! But mixed and lightened as are our own personal griefs, they continue not forever sobered and chastened down into the twilight of melancholy. They are forerunners of perfect light, as dawn ushers in the full blaze of day. They are the shades of night, i whose relaxing influence our mental powers are prepared for the more active and exhilirating influences of joy and exultation. They are the healthful medicines by which our heavenly Parent restores the soul to purer, more cheerful and healthful exercises—they are the rude and severe instruments by which peace is perfected and good worked out. And by brotherly affection—our sympathy for others' griefs and sorrows—we are made partakers of their light, enjoyers of their good, and partners of their joy.

See, then, to what a vast, a necessary and a useful field the apostle invites the affections of the human soul, even when it is invited to sympathy with the distresses and sorrows of others. What a noble employment of our faculties—what a privilege for brotherly love! To sympathise with others' enjoyments—to share in their benefits—to improve with their improvements—and thus make all that is lovely, and endearing, and useful in them, our own, as well as theirs. Oh, who will not reverence—who does not desire to obey the injunction heading this article—"Let brotherly love continue."

PLEASURES OF SINNING.

Junius says, "with a sound heart, be assured that you are better gifted even for worldly happiness, than if you had been cursed with the abilities of a Mansfield." "After a long experience of the world, I affirm, before God, I never knew a rogue who was not unhappy."—This is the testimony of one who had a great and accurate acquaintance of the human heart. And how can it be otherwise? Even leaving out of the question the operation of human laws and human punishments, is there not that within a man which can punish far beyond the terrors of the rack, the dungeon and the stake?

Look at the abandoned villain fresh from the perpetration of what is called a successful crime—see reflection arouse from its lair, and, in his awful solitude, bring his crime before his mind—even if it be but for a single minute—

> In that instant, o'er his soul
> Winters of memory seem to roll,
> And gather in that drop of time,
> A life of pain, an age of crime."

> "Though in time's record nearly nought,
> It is eternity to thought!
> For infinite as boundless space
> The thought that conscience must embrace,
> Which in itself can comprehend
> Wo without name, or hope, or end!"

Then let but the Summer breeze play roughly with a leaf, or rattle at the casement, and he starts with terror and consternation at the sound—his hair stands erect, his nostrils dilate, his eyes quicken their glances and his ears their hearing—every object is a fiend, every shadow an executioner of his guilty life. And when justice unkennels her blood-hounds at his heels, and he flees the pursuit—do you think hell is yawning before him? No; hell is not before him! It is not behind him! it is WITHIN HIM; there gnaws the worm that dieth not—there rages the fire that is not quenched—these go with him through the murky glen, the solitary waste, the deep shadowing forest—these sit with him on the same saddle step with him on the vessel—go with him to the ends of the earth—and it is only when he can travel from himself that he can leave them behind! So long as wickedness inhabits his bosom and sin reigns in his soul, these tormentors will keep him company. The worm will gnaw with undying agony, so long as there can be found corruption for it to feed upon; and the fire will rage so long as he feeds with fuel its devouring flame. Where, then, is the cunning of the guilty—where are the pleasures of the sinful? See him follow still further in their pursuit, misled, as too many have been, by the meteor glare and the midnight gloom of a false theology. See him make rapine his play, and murder his pastime, till, red with human gore—reeking in the blood of his victims—or, if the picture be too dark, see him plunge from vice to vice, reaping guilt and remorse instead of happiness and peace, as promised by the deluded ministers of the Gospel, till despair assumes the throne of reason, or detection crowns with shame and chastisement his career of crime. Oh, how must he, if he possesses any reflection, curse the ignus fatuus of theology which pointed him to the paths of folly and of vice for happiness and peace! How must remorse, and despair, and bitterness crown his death with darkness, or fill his life with regrets!

> "So do the dark in soul expire,
> Or live like scorpion girt by fire,
> So writhes the mind remorse hath riven,
> Unfit for earth, undoomed for heaven,
> Darkness above, despair beneath,
> Around it flame, within it DEATH!"

I thank God that this foul blot on the theology of the day, this powerful incentive to vice, is fast losing ground—and oh, may God but nerve and inspire every teacher of his word, by precept and example to hasten its downfall and total extirpation, before hell is planted by it in more innocent but happiness-seeking bosoms—before community is deluged with more blood of its shedding, and the gibbets and penitentiaries of our land are peopled with more victims to its delusive precepts.

ABNER KNEELAND.

This aged man—and whatever may be his errors, he is still a man, and as such is our brother, and entitled equally with us to all the rights and privileges of our common humanity—this aged man was lately sentenced to sixty days imprisonment, by one of the courts in Massachusetts, on the charge of blasphemy. The particular words that drew on him the vengeance of an absurd, dangerous, and wicked law, fit only for superstitious and ignorant ages and a despotic land, were—"Universalists believe in a God, which I do not." All other forms were withdrawn by the prosecuting attorney, and this alone relied on for proof of blasphemy—and on this charge, in this age of toleration, and in this land of civil and religious freedom, an aged man was dragged from his family and home, and is incarcerated in a prison! Reader, do not your ears tingle and your cheeks burn as you reflect on this melancholy exhibition of our right of speech and freedom of conscience and of the press?

We are glad to perceive that our papers generally, religious and secular, and especially the Universalist periodicals, are out in full condemnation of such an abominable statute ("for increasing hypocrisy, and multiplying atheists," it should be called). A petition for the pardon of Kneeland was immediately got up, signed by Dr. Channing and the liberal clergy of every denomination, and by a great number of other persons, and presented to the Governor and council—but, shame to say the fact! it was denied—he must suffer his sixty days for simply expressing his opinions! This is too bad. The law is bad enough in all conscience; but there is an excuse for it—it was framed when men knew no better than to think they could serve God by persecuting errorists, and convince men's minds by torturing their bodies. But for this refusal to pardon Mr. Kneeland, I can frame no excuse—save a desire to comply with the poor man's own wishes in the case—for he requests his friends to refuse signing a petition for his pardon!

At all events, I hope the people of Massachusetts will demand the repeal of the law—it is a disgrace to the statute books—to the country—the age. Enforcing it will but make cowards hypocrites, and enlist the sympathies of the noble hearted in favor of bold atheists and skeptics.

Let me not be misunderstood. For Abner Kneeland's opinions I have no fellowship—no charity. I deem them absurd to every well trained mind, and abhorrent to every pure and holy aspiration of the soul. The very expression, too, on which Mr. Kneeland was found guilty, shows the wide difference between skepticism (or pantheism) and Universalism. But Mr. K. has the same right to his faith or no faith, that I have to believe in the Gospel of Jesus. He is a man, and whether sane or insane, he will never be rendered better, but worse, by such treatment. His persecution will also give him tenfold influence and importance as an advocate of his theory. On the score of policy—of settled opposition to his views—as well as of humanity and justice—I most solemnly protest against his persecution and punishment.

ERROR IN THE CONVENTION SERMON.

Our readers may remember a notice of an error in Br. Montgomery's occasional sermon, preached in May before our State Convention. We published a note from Br. Montgomery on the subject, and gave our excuse for the error in our paper.

Br. Price desires us to present his excuse to our readers, which we do with pleasure—for we had no intention to excuse ourselves at his expense; but merely to state facts so far as we knew them. Br. Price states that he took the sermon at the Convention, and sent it home, where it was put in type and printed before his return. The error was such an one as will sometimes occur, in a luckless moment, in the most careful hands. For in reading "proof," the proof-reader's eye is more intent on the look-out for bad, or reversed, or wrong letters, than his ear is in noticing the precise meaning of what he is reading. If all reads smoothly, the ear is too often satisfied that all else is right. But Br. Price says, also, that it is probable that in the hurry of preparing slips to send to us, the slip containing that particular blunder, was suffered to pass unread.

We join in the hope that Br. Montgomery will not be discouraged by this accident—but favor our periodicals as heretofore. Let him remember Jacob Faithful's encouraging philosophy—"Better luck next time."

APOLOGY.

Since my return from the West, I have been busily engaged in preparing the Universalist Register and Almanac for 1839, for the press. It was a difficult job. This, and a few other matters, so engaged my attention, as to compel me to delay some other matters which should also have had my attention before now. The proceedings of the St. Lawrence and Otsego Associations, have been received, and will appear in our next. The plan for a Western Emigration Society, will also appear next week. As soon as we can find room, other delayed matters will be attended to. We pray our friends to have a little patience with our seeming dilatoriness—we will endeavor to repay them in kind, should they ever have occasion for it.

THE VOICE OF GOD.

What called me forth from dust?
What bade my blood
Throughout my veins thus warmly flow?
What bade me live, and it was so?
The voice of God!

What, even from my youth,
Where'er I've trod,
Has warned dread danger from my way,
And called me back when I would stray?
The voice of God!

What, when affliction reared
Its weighty rod,
And I stood tremblingly in tears,
Fell most melodious on my ears?
The voice of God!

What, when I mouldering lie
Beneath the sod,
Shall bid the tomb resign its trust,
And rouse again my sleeping dust?
The voice of God!

Then ever let me heed,
At home, abroad,
Where'er my earthly lot is cast,
While duty calls, and life flows fast,
The voice of God.—D. J. MANDELL.

MORAL EDUCATION NECESSARY TO POLITICAL PROSPERITY.

An Extract from Dr. E. Bartlett's Address before the Boston Phrenological Society, January 1, 1838.

[Concluded from our last.]

Phrenology, by demonstrating the primary faculties of the mind, and their relations, first rendered intelligible the infinite variety of thought and action in individuals. Extending the same principles from the individual to the race—from the one person, thinking and acting to-day, to the many hundreds or millions of like persons, thinking and acting at any time, and at all times, in the past, it solves the riddle of history, it interprets the great events of time. Beautifully unfolding itself in the process of this interpretation, shall we find, everywhere, Law. Chance disappears, and we see that, throughout all that multitudinous thought and action of humanity, constituting its history,—in all its fightings, from the first fratricide down to the battle of Waterloo,—in all its art,—in all its literature,—in its religion,—in its laws,—in its politics,—in its love, and in its hate,—in its wisdom, and in its perversity,—in its migrations, in its conquests, in its discoveries,—in the mutations of empires, as truly as in the phases of individual life,—is there nothing fortuitous, nothing accidental, nothing anomalous. We have only to apply to all this the true principles of human nature, as they are now expounded by Phrenology, and its obscurity is dissipated, its apparent contradictions are reconciled, the seemingly inextricable confusion in which its elements are mingled is cleared up. As the sea,—alike in its vast aggregate, and its every atom,—alike in its rest and in its wrath,—is still subject to the laws of gravity and motion, so is the great tide—as it has been called,—of human affairs,—in its ebb, and in its flow,—in its agitation, and in its repose,—obedient, ever, to the few and simple laws which God has impressed upon it.

One result of this method of investigating the past will be a conviction, clearer and stronger than we can, in any other way, attain, that all Form is created and moulded by Spirit;—that all the multiform institutions of men,—that all the complex machinery of life and society,—that all the aggregate act of humanity existed first in the mind; that all these are but the emanations, in distinct and visible shape, of the pre-existing and pre-acting human soul. Without denying the reaction of these institutions, and of this external machinery, as instruments of that general mind of which they are the product, upon the interest and condition of our race, we shall be satisfied, I think, that their influence has been exaggerated. We shall thus be led, not only to a more correct philosophy, but to the adoption of more rational and efficient means of acting on the condition of our race,—of promoting its well-being. Strangely and widely do we mistake in the estimate which we form of the greatest personages, and the most important influences, judged merely in their relationship to civil and social institutions, and to the form and administration of government. We are accustomed to regard the statesmen and politicians of a country,—its kings, its presidents, its secretaries, and diplomatists, and senators, and representatives, as the great guardians and conservators of its liberty and its interests. This is too much the case with ourselves. But neither in these, nor yet in that other misnamed rock of safety,—the democracy of numbers,—the mere preponderance, ever changing of numerical strength, does any abiding security lie. True hearts are there, undoubtedly, many of them, among the first, warm with a patriot's love; and eloquent lips, touched with fire from the true altar, to vindicate for our wide commonwealth its best good, and to warn it against threatened ills. But from the high arena of the capitol at Washington, and from the ten thousand other rostrums scattered through the land, are there ever issuing discordant as well as angry voices. Lo here! says one, and lo there! says another. That democracy of numbers, too, can pull down as easily, more easily perhaps, than it can build up, and it undoes to-day its most solemn acts of yesterday. Not in the speculative doctrines of consolidation or of nullification, or of sub-treasury systems, or of banks, nor yet in the pendulum-swinging of counted majorities, whether federal or democratic, whether whig or tory, is the genuine good, the enduring and high glory of this nation bound up. Not Jefferson, nor Hamilton,—nor Webster, nor Hayne,—useful, indispensable as their functions may have been, and may still be, worthy as their names may be of that high honor and renown which they wear,—not they are the anointed High Priests of our social temple,—not on their shoulders does the ark of our safety rest.

"Who then," it may be asked, "are the great among us, if not these?" They are those who are most successful in giving to human nature that development, relative and absolute, which its Author has so evidently made the indispensable condition of its well-being.—They are those who are doing most for the direction of the intellect to its best uses, and especially for that subordination of the animal appetites and selfish desires to the moral and religious powers, which Revelation and Phrenology unite in declaring to be the best and highest good of man. They are the teachers in our schools, and academies, and colleges, although the relative importance of these has been overated. They are the ministers at the altar of religion, so far, and so far only, as these fill the soul with reverence, and humility, and good will, and duty,—warming the heart with love and devotion, instead of crowding the head with theology. They are mothers, at the fire-side, and in the nursery, guiding the feet of childhood in the right way, moulding its plastic mind to a correspondence with the good, the just, the beautiful, and the true. They are that mighty host,—of the dead and the living,—by whom, in their lives, and in their writings,—in their works, and in their words, Truth and Wisdom are ever speaking to all who are willing to listen. Even now, a woman, by the subtle magic of her pen, seated in her quiet parlor near the banks of the Housatonic, may be doing more, although of these things she may not utter a word, for the preservation and improvement of our political fabric, for the strengthening of the bonds of our political union, and for the promotion of our truest and highest national glory, than all the senators and representatives of the twenty-six States in Congress assembled.

Among the many other errors which Phrenology will one day, I trust, be instrumental in removing, is that of excluding religious instruction from our public schools. Speculative theology has been confounded with religious feeling and duty, and, under a government like our own, where there is perfect freedom of belief, and where there is no established religion,—it would be better to say no established form of theology,—the introduction of religious culture into public seminaries of education is thought to be impracticable. It is supposed to be incompatible with the equality of right, and liberty of conscience in matters of faith, so much vaunted amongst us. I think the true science of mind shows this to be all wrong. There are many systems of theology,—those of Christian theology are nearly as numerous as are the saints in the Catholic's calendar,—but there is only one religion. Whatever be the form which this angel spirit may assume,—whatever be the drapery which it wears,—still it is the same celestial visitant, fitting the soul of man alike for the performance of its duties on earth, and for the fruition of its hopes in heaven,—its strength, its solace and its ornament. And this religion ought to be made a matter of universal and efficient culture. Could the religious and moral powers,—could benevolence, conscientiousness, marvellousness, hope, veneration, and ideality, be only so far systematically and generally educated, as is the intellect of this nation, an advancement would be made in public order, happiness, and prosperity, such as the wildest dreamers about human perfectibility have hardly imagined.

Man was made for action, for duty, and for usefulness; and it is only when he lives in accordance with this great design of his being, that he attains his highest dignity and truest happiness. To make pleasure our ultimate aim is certainly to fail of it.

Tranquillity is the wish of all; the good, while pursuing the track of virtue; the great, while following the star of glory; and the little, while creeping in the styes of dissipation, sigh for tranquility and make it the great object which they ultimately hope to attain. How anxiously does the sailor, on the high and giddy mast, when on tempestuous seas, cast his eyes over the foaming billows, and anticipate the calm security he hopes to enjoy when he reaches the wished for shore? Even kings grow weary of their splendid slavery, and nobles sicken under increasing dignities. All, in fact, feel less delight in the actual enjoyment of worldly pursuits, however great and honorable they may be, than in the idea of their being able to relinquish them and retire to

"——some calm, sequestered spot,

Of all passions, gaming is the most dangerous and inexcusable. A gamester endeavors to enrich himself with the spoils of those he calls his friends. But how many armies are in arms against him! Behold that mother, her tears reproach him with the ruin of her only son! That father pronounces his name with horror and contempt to his children; pursued by hatred, overwhelmed by calumny, he feels himself condemned by reason and humanity, and after wandering long in the mazes of vice, he finds nothing before his eyes but ruin and remorse.

Knowledge is the true Alchemy that turns every thing it touches into gold. It gives us dominion over nature, unlocks the store house of creation, and opens to us the treasures of the universe.—Howes.

It is dangerous to deviate from truth, even on the most trifling occasion. However guileless may be our intentions, the habit, if indulged, may take root, and gain on us under the cover of various pretences, till it usurps a leading influence on our conduct.—Dougherty.

MARRIAGES.

"THE UNIVERSALIST REFUTED."

Truth will never lose by candid investigation, and those who aim to make this the fundamental principle of their belief, will not hesitate to subject their tenets to the strictest inquisition. I have no hesitation in saying that, as a sect, no denomination has evinced a greater willingness to discuss the merits of its doctrines, as a system of Divine truth, than the Universalist; while, at the same time, no class of people have greater reason to complain of the ungenerous and unchristian treatment they receive at the hands of those who chance to differ with them in regard to the import of Divine revelation. It can not be denied, that while we recognize several honorable exceptions, pseudology and misrepresentation characterize by far the greater part of their pretended inquiries after truth, and their zealous endeavors to exhibit the alleged fallacies of what they denominate "the fatal error" of Universalism. Of this class, we regard the unfortunate attempt of an "able theological Professor," in the pamphlet which we have made the subject of this article.

We confess, that to the unprejudiced and intelligent reader, the refutation of principles so manifestly absurd and pernicious as are inculcated in the work before us, will seem perfectly supererogant; but there are those who, while they entertain a kind of reverence for learning and titles of dignity, seemingly attach more importance to the opinions of their sapient leaders, than the plain truths of the Bible. They peruse, with avidity, all that comes recommended by the significant titles of literary distinction, and eagerly subscribe to its principles, if they but harmonize with preconceived opinions, without stopping to inquire whether reason and Scripture will warrant their adoption. To this we believe the work we are reviewing, owes its partial popularity; for its peculiar impotency, and the supreme arrogance of the author, must be apparent to even the moderately discerning and impartial reader. To such our labor will appear superfluous; but there are others, who regard it as an irrefragable argument for the dark theory of endless misery, and for the benefit of such, we will briefly examine some of its leading principles and positions.

Passing over the prefatory paragraphs of our learned author, which were evidently designed as a precursor of the sweeping work he was about to make, we come to his first grand objection to the doctrine of universal salvation, founded on the "inconsistencies" of the arguments by which it is supported. Hear him:—"For if, in the nature and relation of things, it was unjust to punish men with eternal misery, there was no need for a Saviour to come into the world and die, to prevent the Almighty from doing an act of flagrant injustice": hence we learn, that his notion in regard to the object of Christ's mission is, not that he came "to save his people from their sins," but from the regions of eternal despair; and the reader will perceive that upon this depends the validity of his argument. All the principles, therefore, deduced from this assumption, must fall to the ground when the position is denied.—1 John ii: 2. Secondly. It is alleged that the views entertained by Universalists, in regard to the nature and duration of punishment, renders nugatory the power of atoning grace, inasmuch as the sinner merits heaven by expiation, or upon the "strict principle of retributive justice," independent of the death and suffering of Christ. Now, to say nothing of the misrepresentation and puerile captiousness manifest in this objection, let us contrast, and see whose system of atonement harmonizes best with the most obvious declarations of Scripture, and represents the Saviour, when contemplated as such, in the most efficacious light. If the author's views, as advocated in the work before us, are correct, then we come to the conclusion, that in consequence of Adam's transgression, an infinite dissatisfaction was created in the mind of Jehovah to all his unhappy creatures, whom nothing short of an infinite sacrifice was adequate to reconcile; hence Christ was made to bear the sins of the whole human race, and died to redeem them from the curse of a law, the penalty of which was endless misery. Now if there is virtue and efficacy in the blood of Christ, upon the writer's own principles, all mankind will be saved. But mark! the same book will tell you—though perhaps not in so many words—that a great portion of God's creatures never will reap the benefit of atoning grace! How admirably consistent! The nature and design of punishment being salutary and corrective, (Heb. xii: 11.) we conclude that it is not endless; for this would forever preclude the possibility of its effecting such results. Hence we perceive the absurdity of redemption on the above plan. The system of atonement, as advocated by Universalists, argues no escape from the just punishment of sins. This view recognizes the fact, that "all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given us the ministry of reconciliation, to wit, that God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them"—it also assures us, that the "Lord God is merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth; forgiving iniquity, and transgression, and sin, but will by no means clear the guilty"—and that "though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished," while the reverse of this would abrogate the terrors of the law, and give loose reins to the corrupt inclinations and vicious propensities of wicked men.

The reader will perceive, on a perusal of the work now under consideration, that all the arguments in relation to this subject, centre in the position, that Christ died to redeem mankind from an infinity of wo—which we of course deny.—See 1 Cor. xv: 3; Eph. i: 7.

Sin, in a moral sense, is the direct cause of misery, and should this ever be brought to an end, its consequences, which are misery, will also come to an end. In view of this fact, our author, to give his system of endless misery at least a plausible appearance, finds it necessary to argue the perpetuity of both. But from opinions so palpably absurd, we must beg leave to dissent; for if wicked men, in the world of wo, are "continually contracting new guilt," when and where will justice ever receive its demand, on the supposition that the sins of the present life, alone, are of sufficient magnitude to merit endless punishment? The learned Dr. has here imposed upon himself the task of accounting for a period of time, posterior to that of eternity; for to argue a proportional increase of misery, is not obviating the difficulty, since, upon this principle, the sinner advances in sin and iniquity in a kind of geometrical progression, and instead of making the least approximation towards meeting the imperious demands of Divine Justice, every succeeding age serves but to accumulate arrears, and bring down the terrors of Divine wrath afresh upon his guilty head. How Jesus will destroy death, and "him that had the power of death, that is the devil"—make an end of sin and transgression, and yet all these continue as long as God exists, we must confess our inability to perceive.

After having inflicted upon the reader nine pages of puerile declamation, in disproof of the "flesh-pleasing" doctrine of Universalism, our chivalric friend first discovers that he has entered the arena of disputation with "a man of straw," not unlike his famous prototype, Don Quixote, in his fanciful rencounter with the wind-mill.—"What!" says he, "am I called upon to prove that doctrine false, which maintains that the New Testament teaches that the impenitent sinner will not be punished for his crimes after death? Why it would be almost as reasonable to be required to refute the assertion that there were neither words nor letters in the Bible, or to demonstrate that he spoke falsely who should declare that there was no such book in existence. Some things are so manifest, that it would be ridiculous to attempt their proof by reasoning. In fact, reasoning and argument are not intended for truths so plain that he who runs may read them. Who would undertake to refute the fool who should insist upon it, that the sun did not shine at noon-day? Much like this, it seems to me, is the task I have taken upon myself."

Now what must the intelligent and impartial reader think of all this? As for me, gentle reader, I am content to avail myself of the sage author's own concession, and freely grant that he has made himself completely "ridiculous"; however, in justice to his frankness, let it be observed, that the impotency of his work argues no small degree of sincerity in his estimation of the doctrine he vainly endeavors to refute; and to this, I am disposed to attribute the entire absence of all "reasoning and argument" from the pamphlet.

After a "copious effusion" of taunting misrepresentations and aspersions, he proceeds to examine, or rather pervert, some of the texts relied on by the advocates of Universalism, as teaching the "complete and unconditional salvation" of the whole human race. He introduces his pretended investigation, by cavilling upon the words, "All the ends of the earth shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee"—"all nations whom he hath made, shall come and worship before him and glorify his name." He refers them to the "universal spread of the Gospel, in the millenium, or glorious latter days of the church"; but he wishes his readers to understand, that none are alluded to but such as shall be found upon earth at the consummation of that happy period, and that all such as have lived and died in past times, can not be the subjects of such worship. He has not, however, seen fit to give us the least "reasoning and argument" in proof of the supposition, and for want of evidence in the case, we shall not feel ourselves in duty bound to receive it. There is, we think, quite as much reason for the inference that all who have died, from the morning of creation down to that time, are meant by the text, as that those who shall then exist, are above referred to; and while we are certified that all the ends of the earth shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before him, we rejoice to know and believe that such will be the fact, notwithstanding our learned author's contra "ipse dixit."

Equally unfortunate is his attempt to evade the force of the wise man's declaration, that "the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth: much more the wicked and the sinner." He observes that the plain meaning of the text is, "that the righteous man shall receive some recompense for his good deeds, and much more will the wicked and the sinner be visited, even here, more or less, with divine judgments, by which a holy God testifies his displeasure against their evil ways." But is there any thing in the cited passage, warranting the conclusion that the respective characters there mentioned, shall not receive an adequate recompense for their several works? Plainly, there is not. To recompense, means "to make return for an equivalent for any thing done or suffered," which precludes the possibility of denying that the righteous, and much more the wicked and the sinner, shall receive in the earth, an equivalent for their works, "whether they be good or bad." But says our author, "if the bare use of the word recompense, proves that the wicked receive all their punishment here, then the righteous, as they receive all their recompense here, must expect no felicity hereafter"; but why this must follow, we are, at present, unable to perceive. We have yet to learn that the sincere Christian founds his hopes of immortal beatitude beyond the grave, upon the simple merits of his imperfect works in the present life. Paul says, "For by grace are ye saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God: not of works, lest any man should boast." The obvious meaning of the passage under consideration, is, that obedience to the moral, as well as to the physical and organic laws, secures a correspondent degree of felicity; while, on the other hand, infringement is sure to bring with it the immediate consequences of pain and misery. His remarks in relation to several other Scripture passages, are not less unfortunate and untenable. He aims to show that if it is not incompatible with the goodness of God to inflict punishment in the present world, it is not to inflict it in the future; hence the argument deduced from the words, "the Lord is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works," must fall to the ground, "unless we draw conclusions in direct opposition to plain facts." By "plain facts," we suppose he wishes to be understood, that as God does not refrain from visiting the sins and iniquity of men in the present life, it is by no means incompatible with his divine goodness to subject them to a state of endless suffering in the next. Sensible and well-meaning persons they may be who argue thus, but surely we envy not that man's discernment who, on a little reflection, does not perceive the futility of such reasoning. Because it is consistent with the character of a good and wise parent to punish a refractory son, and subject him to a suitable degree of pain and misery at each infringement of his parental instructions, shall we thence infer that it is equally so for him to make the child as miserable as possible during the period of its earthly existence—yea, even protract it to torment him? Who dare affirm it? And yet upon precisely the same principle is this argument conducted.

He next proceeds to adduce texts of Scripture, which he deems "sufficient to convince all candid inquirers, that the doctrine of these Universalists is in utter contradiction to the word of God." That he has relied mainly on the prejudice and prepossession of his readers for the application, we have no doubt; for it is certain that in no instance has he condescended to give us reason and argument for the unwarranted use made of certain texts. We were not ignorant of their existence before we saw them in his tract, and surely a mere, correct transfer of a passage, can not materially affect its original import. All the passages referred to in this work, in proof of the dismal theory of endless wo, have been explained, time and again, and many of them in the columns of this paper. In reference to the parables of the "wheat and tares"—of the "sheep and goats"—and of the "rich man and Lazarus"—nothing "new under the sun" has been advanced. In commenting on the former, he catches at the phrase, "end of the world," (age,) and observes, "There is here no need of exposition. Every word is as plain as it is terrible. There is no room for plausible evasion." In regard to the latter, he says, "If the plainest words can teach any thing, we are here taught that, to some, the state after death is a state of misery—hopeless, excruciating misery." Such argumentation may have the desired effect with those who are secure in the fastnesses of inveterate prejudice, but with the intelligent and impartial reader, it will pass for what it is worth.

In passing strictures upon the "legitimate and practical consequences" of Universalism, our author has a more enlarged field for the exercise of his declamatory powers; nor has he, in his misguided zeal to promote the cause of truth, failed to exhibit to the world the virulent disposition with which his views of God and his institutions, inspire him. Reader, if thou hast not already, I would advise thee to procure the tract entitled, "Future Punishment, or the Universalist Refuted," and peruse it. It will well repay thy trouble: it will show thee how even "an able theological Professor" can stoop to misrepresentation and the grossest perversion, in exciting prejudice against the doctrine he finds his powers inadequate to "refute." Yes, gentle reader, you will there be told that to "take away from the minds of men the fear of judgment and eternity," would be to make this world "a scene of violence—an Aceldama"; that "all confidence among men would be destroyed, and all the bonds of civil society would be severed." You will be interrogated like this: "Suppose a man who has no fear of judgment, to be solemnly called upon to declare the truth in a case where his own honor and interest, or that of some friend, is at stake, what is there to prevent him from perjuring himself? Or if he can gratify secret malice by swearing against the life of an enemy, what shall restrain him?" Nor is this all: you will also read, "I would fully as soon have an atheist to bear witness against me on oath, or to sit in judgment as a juror, as to have one of these new-fangled Universalists." Such, then, are the views our author entertains in regard to the practical tendency of Universalism, and the consequences which must ensue, should this doctrine become general; and now, what is the only fair and legitimate inference that can be drawn from such a representation? Why, that the perjurer, the murderer, the robber, and the like, are all of that class who reject the wild chimera of post mortem judgment and endless suffering for the sinner; and that the salutary restraints which the fear of an endless hell imposes upon the passions and propensities of men, preserves them, at all times, from acts of violence and injustice. But, gentle reader, you and I know that this is in utter contradiction to obvious and well established facts. Go, visit the penitentiary, and ask the convicted felon if he believes in a state of endless misery for the wicked, and it were nothing strange should he avow himself a public advocate of the doctrine. Pursue the inquiry, and you will find hundreds of like precious faith, within the same walls. The thief, the robber, the assassin, and the perjurer, will tell you they tremble in awe of the righteous judgment with which they foresee that a just God will visit them in the future world. These are stubborn facts—why then place all to the credit of Universalism?

We will not attempt to rob him of the boasted honor of holding opinions in common with the Heathens and Mahommedans; for we are well aware, that to the mythology of the former he is indebted for the main article of his creed.

The wilful misrepresentation and utter disregard to all truth and candor, manifest in the captious rigmarole which closes his pamphlet, are wholly unworthy the dignity of his high vocation; and while we deprecate the causes which lead men to violate the heavenly precepts of our Saviour, we rejoice in contemplation of the fact, that when the salutary influence of Universalism shall be felt, and its practical tendency universally understood and appreciated, instead of "an Aceldama," the world will present one continued scene of harmony and good order; strife and dissention will cease, and the bonds of civil society will be strengthened—the midnight assassin, the marauder, the highwayman, and the perjurer, will become the peaceful citizen—and mankind, purged from the pollution of ages, and united by the strong ligaments of a kindred brotherhood, will bow down in humble adoration of the Father of the spirits of all flesh, "who is good unto all, and whose tender mercies are over all his works."

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS....NO. VII.

BY REV. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

"And thou shalt be blessed; for they can not recompense thee; for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." LUKE XIV: 14.

This language was spoken to the Jews, by the Saviour, in reference to making a feast—he directed them, when they made a feast, not to call their rich neighbors, but to bring in and feed the poor who could not recompense them; for they should be recompensed at the resurrection of the just. It has been said, that this passage proves joyous life beyond the resurrection, to be a reward to the just, and to none but the just—consequently those who die impenitent, will not receive this recompense, and must be lost. But aside from the fact that, in other places, the future world is represented as a free gift from God to his children, there are other considerations which obviate this objection.

It is a truth that the Scriptures speak of a moral death and a moral resurrection. For instance: the Jews were once carried away into Babylonian captivity; but after a time, the prophet Ezekiel was sent to notify them of their redemption from it. "Therefore prophesy, and say unto them, thus saith the Lord God, behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel."—Ezek. xxxvii: 12. Now observe—the captivity of the Jews is set forth by moral death in graves, and their restoration to Palestine, is represented by bringing them up out of their graves, or a moral resurrection. This is so obvious that it can not be mistaken.

When Christ entered upon his ministry, the Jews, by reason of sin and error, were all morally dead—hence it was said, when Jesus first went among the people, "to them which sat in the region and shadow of death, light is sprung up."—Matt. iv: 16. After the word of truth was established, when such individuals came to a knowledge of that truth, they are represented as rising from death. Hence, our Saviour said, "He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life."—John v: 21. Hence, too, Paul said to his Ephesian brethren, "And you hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins."—ii: 1. Here, surely, is a moral death and a moral resurrection. It must be remembered, that when our Saviour spake the words we are examining, Christianity, or the kingdom of God, was not established; nor was it established until after the literal resurrection of Christ, when the truth was made known to the apostles on the morning of the Pentecostal day. It was in this kingdom of truth, that the resurrection was to take place, which was a recompense to the just of whom our Saviour was speaking; not a literal, but a moral resurrection from error to truth, and its consequent blessings. This is evident from the next verse—"And when one of them that sat at meat with him [Jesus] heard these things, he said unto him, blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God."—Verse 15. Now there is not a single instance in the New Testament, where the phrase "kingdom of God," or "kingdom of heaven," occurs, that has any other allusion than to the Gospel dispensation. To eat bread in this kingdom or dispensation, was to receive the truth. Hence our Saviour said, "I am the living bread which came down from heaven."—John vi:51. It was in rising into the life of this kingdom of truth from the death of sin and error, that the recompense consisted to the just.

The Pharisees were not charitable—they were hard-hearted, and consequently, for not receiving the Saviour, were destroyed by the Roman armies. But those who fed the poor, were just men, and in the conduct of the Saviour found a kindred benevolence, which predisposed them to receive and to believe in him, when the principles of his system were proclaimed by the apostles after his ascension. The believing in him, was the recompense of resurrection to those just Jews who fed the poor, because they passed from the death of Judaism to the life of Christianity—this was their reward for benevolence. I know, when Christ said, "Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just," the recompense was then future; but this is easily accounted for by the fact, that at the time Jesus spake, his kingdom had not then come, nor did it come until after his death and resurrection; then the truth was made known, and the moral resurrection of the just men took place. There is an instance on record, of such a just man. After our Saviour had yielded his life on the cross, we read—"And, behold, there was a man named Joseph, a counsellor, and he was a good man, and a just; he was of Arimathea, a city of the Jews; who also himself waited for the kingdom of God; this man went unto Pilate and begged the body of Jesus."—Luke xxiii: 50, 51, 52. This man was just, and waited for the kingdom of God, or the proclamation of the Saviour's reign among men; and doubtless he received his reward for waiting, by passing into the life of truth. In the 25th of Matthew, those on the right hand are represented as passing into "life eternal"—for what? Because they had visited his followers in their distress and in prison, and had ministered to their wants. These very individuals, by their attention and kindness, were led to believe the truth when it was taught by the apostles; then they entered the "eternal life" of knowing God and his dear Son, and thus passed from moral death into moral life, or in other words, attained a resurrection to the truth, which was the reward of their previous goodness. Such, then, do I conceive to be the only true view of our Saviour's declaration.

"And in the vineyards there shall be no singing, neither shall there be shouting; the treaders shall TREAD OUT NO wine in their presses; I have made their vintage shouting to cease"
Isa xvi: 10.

One of the allusions in this language, evidently refers to a custom common in all countries, for the grape-gatherers to sing and rejoice when collecting the fruit of the vineyards. But treading out wine is not so clear, without direct reference to fact. One method of making wine is this: In France and Italy, the grapes are collected and thrown into a cask set on four wheels, that it may be carried from place to place. They are then trodden beneath the feet of a man, who prepares himself and gets into the cask, and the liquid runs out from a hole near the bottom into another cask, and is there fermented.—Penny Magazine for 1836, page 178. This is an evident illustration of the language of the prophet who asserted, to set forth the desolation of Moab, that no grapes should be trodden, nor should wine be produced in the vineyards.

This fact also illustrates another prophecy relating to our Saviour—"Wherefore art thou red in thy apparel, and thy garments like him that treadeth in the wine-fat? I have trodden the wine-press alone; and of the people there was none with me."—Isa. lxiii: 2, 3. This has reference to the sacrifice of the Redeemer, whose battle with death, and whose pains are compared to a treadder pressing out the wine in the vineyard. A most expressive allusion! I know of no circumstance which so certainly demonstrates the depth of the Saviour's love for the world, as the ready willingness with which he labored in the wine-press of death. He looked forward—the future was open before him; he saw a Judas marching at the head of a band of his most blood-thirsty enemies to betray him; he saw his disciples deserting him, notwithstanding their warm professions of friendship, and their words of constant fellowship; he saw the perjured trial, the hill of Calvary, the mocking foes, the piercing nails, the cruel spear, the flowing blood, the death agony—but all these did not palsy his love, did not cripple his courage, did not drive him from his duty in abject fear. No! he stepped into the wine-press of death, trod out all its honors, and came forth the triumphant conqueror over sin and the grave, to the glory of the world.

Say, my fellow-sinner, if the whole human family depended on us for salvation, could we make such a sacrifice; could we have dared to meet such inveterate enmity, and without a cheering word or a look of affection from a single person, have endured the unmingled horrors of crucifixion? Ah, no; we should have shrunk from it with abject fear. How much, then, we owe to our Saviour for the sacrifice which he offered, for having had courage to tread the wine-press of his suffering alone! Alone?—yes, alone, so far as any earthly voice was concerned. He still was under an eye which was sleepless, one friend which will not forsake. "Yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me." Sacred consolation! He had taught his disciples to pray, "Our Father who art in heaven," and he felt the cheering truth himself. He realized that God could protect him, as well amid the ferocity of the Jews, as in joy—could extend the shield of love over him, as well on the cross, as in the blessings of peace; and knowing that it was the will of his Father that he should taste death for every man, he willingly obeyed the command. How sacred is the truth, and how holy is the privilege to realize, that whatever may transpire around us, in whatever situation placed, however painful our lot, we can look up to heaven, and with the confidence of children pray, "Our Father."

Minutes of the Otsego Association.

Met according to adjournment, in Cedarville, June 27th and 28th. Chose Br. J. Potter Moderator, and Brs. T. J. Smith and I. Hayward, Clerks. After which made the following appointments, and transacted the following business.

Appointments.—Brs. T. J. Smith and the delegates of the Cedarville Society, Committee on religious services—Whiston, Potter, and J. Clark, Committee on fellowship and ordination for the year—T. J. Smith, Hayward and Guild, Committee of discipline—Hayward to deliver the next occasional sermon—Whiston, Standing Clerk, in room of M. B. Smith, to whom thanks were returned for his services—J. Potter, E. Guild (clerical), S. Gregory, and J. M. Elwood (lay) delegates to the State Convention, with power to appoint substitutes and fill vacancies—T. J. Smith, Potter, Whiston and Hayward, to visit destitute societies and neighborhoods—and T. J. Smith to prepare the Minutes and Circular letter.

Adopted the report of the Committee of discipline for last year—"no complaint"—and that of the Committee on fellowship and ordination, granting ordination to Br. I. Hayward, at such time and place as he may select; and fellowship to the First Universalist societies in Sharon, Danube, and of Ford's Bush in Minden—also, adopted the following preamble and Resolutions—

Whereas the custom of wearing mourning apparel is, in the opinion of this body, superfluous, expensive and inconvenient, particularly to those in moderate circumstances; and whereas the N. Y. State Convention of Universalists at their session in 1835 passed a resolution disapproving, and recommending the discontinuance of, this custom, Therefore, Resolved, (1.) That this body recommend to the Universalist community to lead the way in discontinuing of this custom.—(2.) That we recommend the following plan for defraying the expences of delegates to the State Convention—viz., that each society within the limits of this Association take up an annual collection, and send the same to the Standing Clerk of the said Association, to be by him equally appropriated in defraying the expences of delegates from this body to the N. Y. State Convention.—(3.) That the Society whose pastor may be appointed a delegate to the U. S. Convention, be requested to give him the necessary time (without deduction from his salary), and likewise aid him in defraying his expences.—(4.) That four clergymen be appointed a committee to visit each society within our own limits, which may be destitute of stated preaching, and in the name of this body, encourage and rouse them to life and action, and, if possible, induce them to have more than a name to live—and, also, to visit other places for the purpose of diffusing the truths of the Gospel, and forming societies wherever practicable—and empowered said Committee to divide into four districts, (as may best accommodate the field of labor to each member of said Committee,) the whole territory of our Association.—(5.) That in future our Standing Clerk communicate a timely notice to some periodical, of the meetings of this body, and that he specify in such notice the hour for the first meeting of the Council, the name of the preacher of the occasional sermon, and the hour at which it will be delivered.—(6.) That persons wishing the fellowship of this Association as preachers of the Gospel, must signify their intention of applying for said fellowship at least one year before a letter can be granted; and that the names of said applicants be published as candidates for the ministry.—(7.) Voted, That the Standing Clerk have the permanent power to appoint Conferences, on application, at any time between our annual sessions.

Adjourned to meet in Sharon, Schoharie county, on the fourth Wednesday in June, 1839.

Ministers present.—W. Underwood, Litchfield; J. Potter, Fort Plain; O. Whiston, Cooperstown; L. C. Browne, Troy; M. B. Newell, Amsterdam; E. E. Guild, Worcester; J. D. Hicks, Springfield; I. Hayward, Burlington Flats; A. R. Barlett, J. G. McAdam, Utica; A. Williams, Hamilton; M. B. Smith, Clinton; J. C. Eddy, T. J. Smith, Winfield; J. Boden, Cooperstown; O. Roberts, Lakeville; W. Wilcox, Albany.

Lay Delegates.—S. Norton, A. Zimmerman, Fort Plain; J. Kellogg, J. Clark, Cooperstown; Z. Gibbs, A. B. Davidson, Otsego; S. Fish, C. Brainard, Cedarville; H. Burlingham, M. Luther, Esq., Hartwick; C. Harrington, R. A. Chapin, Burlington; H. Coleman, J. Derthick, Richfield: A. Empie, H. Lehman, Sharon; J. P. Keller, J. W. Cronkhite, Ford's Bush; F. Green, A. Wilcox, Newville.

Sermons were preached by Brs. L. C. Browne, A. Williams, J. G. McAdam, E. E. Guild, J. Potter, and O. Whiston; assisted by Brs. Underwood, Guild, Boden, M. B. Smith, and Hicks. Addresses by L. C. Browne.

STATISTICAL CIRCULAR.

From the society letters received at our last session, we are able and happy to publish the increase and prosperity of our Zion.

Ten societies within our bounds were fully and ably represented, eight of which have stated preaching, and are gradually progressing in the good cause of righteousness.

And while our stakes have been strengthened, our borders also have been enlarged, by the addition of three societies to our body, organized within the past year.—At three other places, societies will soon be formed, as measures have been, and will be taken to that end.—We believe there are two or three societies languishing, but we hope not ready to die, and these we have full confidence in arousing up to health and vigor by the attention and exertions of our "visiting Committee."

For when the weakened and discouraged are fully assured that the strong and prosperous of their brethren, desire their health and growth in spiritual things, we do believe, they will care for themselves—will awake from their lethargy and shake off their dust—that the cloud of despondency will roll back before the brightened beams of returning hope, and the benignant spirit of pure religion diffuse its life-giving joys throughout their borders.

We may anticipate too much when we look forward to the next annual session of this body, and then and there expect the full representation of every society—the dead and languishing aroused up to their own interests and well-being in the cause of our Master, and withal, from three to five new societies born into the Redeemer's kingdom, rejoicing as a strong man to run the Christian race, and fight the good fight of faith.

We are no prophet, but this we do expect from the present state of things, and our own unequalled prosperity.

Brethren—our cause is onward like the beams of the morning, our prospects are truly flattering, and may our united exertions, turn and overturn the kingdoms of earth, till there shall be one fold and one shepherd in the kingdom of God's dear Son. Per order,

T. J. Smith.

Reading.—By reading we enjoy the dead, by conversation the living, and by contemplation ourselves. Reading enriches the memory, conversation polishes the wit, and contemplation improves the judgment. Of these, that reading is the most important, which furnishes both the others.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;

FOR SUNDAY, JULY 29, 1838.

1 COR. XIII: 1-13.

In the first age of Christianity there were various supernatural powers bestowed upon its professors, chiefly for the purpose of establishing its claims to a superhuman origin: Some possessed the power of healing diseases: some of speaking in foreign languages; some of interpreting these languages; some of foretelling future events; sundry other miraculous powers were also committed to the earliest converts of the Christian faith. Those who were in possession of these miraculous powers, were apt to be inflated with vanity, and by others to be regarded with envy: some, however, more than others: as these gifts, though all proceeding from one Author, and all communicated for one purpose, even the edification of the church, were held in various degrees of respect and repute. The power of speaking in unknown or foreign tongues, seems to have been held in highest repute among the Corinthian brethren. Yet all of these gifts were the subjects of earnest desire: every one seems to have coveted after the possession of these supernatural powers. This was a wrong state of sentiment; and to the correction of it the apostle has addressed himself, in that part of his epistle immediately preceding this chapter. Let the attentive reader turn to the 12th chapter, and peruse Paul's rebuke of, and reasoning against this erroneous sentiment, and he will better understand the chapter now before him. This chapter should, with propriety, have been made to commence with the last verse of the 12th chapter, in which case the sense and connexion would have been as follows: "Ye are all now ambitious of obtaining honor, by attaining the gift of miraculous powers; yea even of those which you esteem the most honorable: ye wish to be the most elevated and honorable persons in the church, your ambition, however, has not taken the most proper direction. I will now submit to you a more certain, efficacious, and excellent way of raising yourselves to honorable stations in the church; and that is to attain the grace of love in a very eminent degree. My estimate of supernatural powers, compared with this excellent disposition, may be explained to you by stating that though I myself had the power of speaking all the languages of men and angels, yet had not this love in my heart, I should be nothing better than the basest of musical instruments. Again, although I had the gift of prophecy, and thoroughly understood all mysterious subjects; and although I had such faith as to be able to surmount all obstacles, but had not love, I would account myself as nothing. Yea more, if I should give up all my property for the benefit of others, and yield my body as a ready sacrifice in a good cause, but have not love as the principle of these actions, they will yield me no profit, I shall be a profitless servant. The love which I recommend to your ambitious pursuit, may be understood from the following, which are some of its manifestations." Such we think the manner in which Paul introduced this high object of ambition, desire, pursuit, and cultivation.

Were Paul, or his Master, Jesus, to return to earth, and sit in judgment upon my objects of ambition, what would the just sentence be? What higher objects of ambition could be presented to me than eminence in love? Let me, then, contemplate Paul's delineation of its beauties. He enumerates the following.

1st. Love disposeth its possessor to be patient and forbearing under the infliction of injuries.—Were this virtue generally practiced how many quarrels would be prevented, and how many that might have been confirmed enemies by resentment, would be converted into grateful and admiring friends.

2d. Love disposeth its possessor to be the dispenser of kindnesses and the communicator of benefits. Love's current is not checked, but flows freely, even to the evil and the unthankful. Here judicious kindness is twice blest.

3d. Love effectually prevents its possessor from envying others on account of their superiority in wealth, talent, station, or reputation.

4th. Love prevents its possessor from manifesting to his neighbors an insolent, overbearing disposition.

5th. Love expels from the bosom in which it resides, all arrogance and self-conceit, all overvaluing of one's self on account of his peculiar advantages, endowments or station.

6th. The person who is animated and regulated by love, will never be found behaving with indecorium, rudeness, or impropriety. He will respect the feelings of others too much to permit in himself any such offensive conduct.

7th. The generality of mankind are strongly marked by their propensity to labor for, and seek only their own emolument and advantage. But love gives a check to this propensity, enabling its possessor cheerfully to contribute to the good and prosperity of others.

8th. Again, while the generality of mankind are readily excited to angry and resentful feelings, love effectually prevents its possessor from being readily exasperated or provoked. His angry feelings are not roused by every slight insult, injury or neglect. His love overcomes his resentment.

9th. It is exceedingly common to put a bad construction upon the conduct and character of others, but love disposes to greater candor, and to the most favorable construction of the actions of others which circumstances allow.

10th. Love forbids its possessor from rejoicing in any false or injurious reports against his neighbor; these he will not entertain, neither will he circulate, but will search out the truth, and in the dispensation of this, he will rejoice.

11th. Indeed, so far from rejoicing in false reports, the man actuated by love will not spread any injurious reports even when true; his love to his brethren dictates to him to throw a covering over all their failings.

12th. Conscious of integrity and veracity in his own bosom, he is always ready to give credit to others for similar dispositions and principles.

13th. Even when forced to admit the depravity of his neighbor, the man we speak of does not give him up as hopeless and incorrigible; but, in the efforts he makes, or witnesses made for that neighbors improvement, is animated by a cheering hope that they will be successful.

14th. In fine, love animates its possessor with such a firm adherence to every good object which can be promoted by his efforts, that no difficulties, no dangers, no obstacles deter him from their pursuit, or turn him aside from his chosen path.—For the sake of the good he aims at, he will endure all labors, pains, privations, and disappointments. Nay, love is in some cases, "stronger than death."

15th. The last recommendation of this object of desire and ambition which Paul enumerates is, that it will endure through all the future stages of our being. The gifts which the Corinthians were anxious to obtain—prophecy, tongues, knowledge—would all of them have a period put to their usefulness; whereas this quality which he recommends them to strain after, would never be taken from them, but would endure and gain in strength, utility and blissfulness in all the conditions of their future existence. The knowledge and other attainments which we value now, are likely to be of as little service to us in a future state of being, as the knowledge and attainments of the child are to the business of the adult man. But, on the contrary, the love which we cultivate and attain to here, we will carry with us a starting ground whence to begin our next career of labors and rejoicings in love. All that we gain in knowledge and other envied attainments, may be of little, if any service in another world: all that we gain in a loving disposition will not only be a fountain, whence will flow streams to refresh others, and our own souls also, but will also remain with us and be to us the commencement of an ever-increasing usefulness and felicity in that world to which we are hastening.

Will reader and writer, henceforth strive more after this Godlike excellence. P. P.

WORSHIP ONE GOD.

The laws of Moses seem to have been instituted, not only to show the exalted perfections of God, but to teach mankind how to worship him. Hence it was that God inspired Moses to promulgate a code, which, if lived up to, in thought, word, and deed, might be sufficient for man until a greater than Moses should appear.

There is one God, says the Hebrew code, and there is but one. This God alone deserves to be worshipped. Our popular teachers say there are three Gods! and, virtually, they worship a fourth, viz., a god mammon—without whose aid, it would seem, the other three Gods would have great difficulty in managing their concerns!

Now, if the Hebrew God is the Supreme Being, the necessary origin of all things, no other can be compared to him. He is a pure, invisible and infinite spirit, who created the universe by his power, governs it by his wisdom, and rules all events by his providence. Nothing escapes his watchful eye; and as every thing comes from him, so every thing must center in him. Not all the pomp and circumstance of Popish or Orthodox worship, is any thing in his eyes, if the sentiments of the heart do not give it life. The worship he requires above every other thing, is the acknowledgment of our entire dependence, and of his supreme dominion—thankfulness for his benefits, trust in his mercy, fear to do wrong, and love without doubting. "I am the Lord thy God, thou shalt have none other God before me." These are true and sublime ideas. But it is certain this God is not understood, or why so much violence against moral propriety in worshipping him! He is represented to be more cruel than a demon! Can pure love for such a being, exist in the breast of a rational creature! I should think not. There must be something lovely in the object to be beloved, or else it becomes the object of fear or indifference. But the God mentioned by Moses, never required the worship of fear. What purity and beauty in his morality! Is there a vice which it does not condemn? No! even desires are prohibited. "Thou shalt not covet." He not only requires perfect equity, probity, and the most exact honesty, but he would have us be humane, compassionate, charitable, ready to do unto others what we might with propriety wish they would do unto us. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." In short, whatever can make a man respectable in his own eyes, and dear to his fellowmen—whatever can insure the peace and happiness of society—is to be found in the requirements of the ONE GOD spoken of by Moses.

But all the teachings of Moses were not sufficient to convince the world of mankind, of the true character of the God be worshipped. This Moses seems to have been aware of. He says, another prophet shall come after me—him shall ye hear. In the progress of time, God did send another personage into the world, and placed him at the head of mankind, giving him wisdom and power to make known, fully, the character of the God who sent him, not only by precept, but by example. By the sayings and doings of this special Messenger sent from God, we learn the character of him who is the Father of us all. Did Jesus manifest any malevolence in his conduct? Did he condemn the worst of sinners to interminable wo? Surely not. In the calamities which he said should fall on his bitterest persecutors, there was to be a time when they should see him again with different feelings, saying, "Blessed is he who cometh in the name of the Lord."

Where do we find the authority of worshipping the God, Jesus represented, as he is worshipped in the revival meetings, so common in our day? We can neither find it in the teachings nor in the examples of Jesus. This mode of worship seems more a revival of the scandalous excesses and barbarous customs practised by the ancient heathen nations, to whom the true God was not known, than like any authority we can find in the Bible. Do not our modern worshippers, in their excited meetings, as did the pagans of old, sacrifice all modesty and decency in their conduct? And although human blood does not flow from the altars or in the assemblies of these modern worshippers, or fanatics, yet it has frequently flowed as a consequence of such unnatural proceedings.

PRAYER.

It has been said, that

"Prayer ardent, opens Heaven, lets down a stream
Of glory on the consecrated hour
Of man in audience with the Deity."

This is a sentiment, to which every one who is accustomed to the daily practice of prayer to God, will freely subscribe. This was the sentiment of a pious praying man of ancient times, "who declared that "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man, availeth much." Yes, prayer is the key that unlocks the gates of Paradise, and gives to him who uses it, free access to the rich treasures of boundless love. It "opens Heaven, and lets down a stream of glory" upon that favored and happy man, who is permitted to have an "audience with the Deity."

Prayer is an exercise of the affections and the soul; and is as necessary to keep the religious feelings in a vigorous and healthy state, as is bodily exercise, to promote the health and well-being of this tenement of clay. And how delightfully pleasant and agreeable is this practice. How it soothes the troubled mind, and calms the tempests of the soul! Let a man's state and condition in life be what they may; let him be surrounded by ardent and devoted friends, who value no trouble or expense that may advance his interest; or let him be beset on every hand by foes and enemies, as corrupt and wicked as the prince of hell; whose sole and only aim, is his destruction and downfall; let him walk in the higher circles of life, surrounded by riches and affluence, followed and courted by a crowd of flatterers, who are ready to obey his every word, and anticipate his every wish; or let him be sunk by misfortune to the lowest depths of poverty and wretchedness, with no friends to assist him or administer to his necessities—in all these various and dissimilar situations, prayer is the exercise and solace of the pious and truly religious.

How numerous are the instances recorded in Holy Writ, where "prayer ardent" has brought comfort to the afflicted, rest to the weary and heavy laden, and rejoicing to the sorrowful; and where it has proved "a sovereign balm," to heal the foul maladies of the soul. Hear the sweet singer of Israel, when his enemies had multiplied on every hand, and increased till they were like to swallow him up; hear him cry, "Be merciful unto me, O God; for man would swallow me up; mine enemies would daily swallow me up; every day they wrest my words; all their thoughts are against me for evil. Tney gather themselves together, they hide themselves, they mark my steps when they wait for my soul."

But although afflicted and distressed, the Psalmist did not forget in whom to put his trust. Said he, "In God have I put my trust; I will not be afraid what man can do unto me. He shall send from heaven, and save me from the reproach of them that would swallow me up. God shall send forth his mercy and his truth." His enemies had beset him on every side, and persecution dire followed him wherever he went; still his confidence in his divine Benefactor, remained unshaken, while he declares, "He only is my Rock and my salvation. He is my defence, I shall not be greatly moved." But David is not the only example on record, who has practiced the duty of prayer. Moses and Aaron, Joshua, Samuel and the prophets, were all of them praying men. And among the valuable and instructive teachings of Christ and his apostles, no duty or practice is more frequently or urgently enforced than prayer. On one occasion Christ "spake a parable to this end, that men ought always to pray."

The great Teacher himself often engaged in this practice, thus teaching his disciples and followers, by example as well as by precept, the proper manner of performing it.

Let us all learn by a practical experience that it is good to call on the name of the Lord. Let all men pray every where, with fervent prayer, "lifting up holy hands without wrath or doubting." Let men "praise the Lord, for he is good"—let them sing praises unto his name, for it is pleasant," and let them "give thanks unto the Lord, for his mercy endureth forever." H. L. H.

THE LOVE OF GOD THE STRONGEST MOTIVE.

However much the claims of the Gospel may have been urged upon us as moral, intellectual and dependent beings, it is evident, that other claims might be daily added, and that those already urged, can not be too often repeated, especially if we take into consideration, our dependence upon God, the near relationship existing between us and him who is the father of us all, and his tender solicitude for our welfare and happiness.

The idea alone, that he is our Father, should teach us, at least, to respect him, and to love and obey his requirements. But when, in addition to this, we learn that he is our God, that it is he who has given us being, constituted with all those noble powers and faculties of the mind, which elevate us above all other animate creation, placed us upon this terraqueous ball, where we are blessed with a change of seasons, and provided us with all things necessary for our comfort and support, how can we neglect to adore him for his goodness and to revere his holy name.

And above all, when we behold the bright revelations of his will, and his wonderful purposes, bringing to light the happy destiny of all the wandering sons and daughters of men, and learn that for all this, and countless other evidences of his goodness, he asks not our prayers nor the worship of our hands for his own benefit, but that it is alone for our good; who can but exclaim with the Psalmist, "Let us praise the Lord for his goodness and his wonderful works to the children of men."

Who after duly considering this, can refuse to acquaint themselves with his teachings, and to obey his most holy requirements? None; none I presume are so base, and, I have charity to believe, so ungenerous, and so regardless of their own happiness and peace, as to turn a deaf ear to the teachings of Christ, after they shall have become acquainted with his doctrine and shall have experienced faith in the same.

But why then this coldness and indifference on the part of professing Christians? My friend, it is on account of the lack of faith and knowledge. He that once was the warm hearted and exemplary follower of Christ, never became cold and indifferent, without first neglecting the sanctuary or some other means instituted by our Saviour to promote his cause, and keep alive the warm emotions of the soul. For man is so constituted that although he acquires knowledge and faith upon any important subject and fails to exercise his mind thereupon, the impressions received must soon fade, and both that knowledge and faith be nearly eradicated from the mind. How important then that those who have engaged in the Christian cause should continue in well doing, being constant in season and out of season, meeting often together, and improving every opportunity to derive instruction from his word, and thus grow in grace and make advances in the knowledge of the truth.

But farther—as without this knowledge the mind presents but a cold and barren waste, bringing forth little more than briars and thorns, so upon the reception of it, it produces fruits directly the reverse, becoming like a rich and fertile garden, yielding fruits both rich and abundant to its possessor.—These statements need no proof, as it is a fact long since admitted, that the higher and more exalted the subject upon which the mind is exercised, the higher and nobler will be the conceptions and the more elevated the character. Therefore the importance of making a selection of those subjects which are worthy our contemplation, which will improve and expand the mind, elevate us in the scale of moral being, and render us useful members of society and examples of piety and virtue, worthy the imitation of rising generations. Of these studies, and for this purpose, none can be better adapted than those of the holy Scriptures—no example so worthy our imitation, as that of our divine Master, and no incentive to virtue, so strong as the love of God. CONFIDENCE IN GOD.

It needs not the maxims of old age, nor the arguments of philosophy, to tell us that life is to all a checkered scene. Some may have more sorrow than others—may have more tears to shed—may heave more sighs; yet there is no one who treads, for any length of time, the pathway from the cradle to the grave, who does not experience vicissitudes. While, if he lives to his "three score years and ten," he will perceive that the period of human existence has been appropriately divided, as is the year, into four seasons, yet even in its early springtime, he will find that it has its sunshine and its shadow, like the natural world. This being so, as we pass through the portals of the years, we require deeper consolation at each new sorrow than before, until we have found the true fountain of consolation. We hear of some, that they have become callous to adversities, and that they "Sweep by them, as the idle wind."

It may be so, yet I doubt whether this stoicism prevails to the extent that is generally supposed. There may be those who outwardly have no emotion, and who proudly, and apparently unmovingly breast the rushing tide, yet after all, they may be effected by calamity, and deeply too, and while not a limb shakes nor a muscle quivers, internal grief may be struggling and stifling at their very hearts. These are philosophic men, who know that there is no permanent consolation in the things of earth, and whose pride disdains tears, for fear of the pity of humanity. And sorrow is it for them, who are so well acquainted with the world as to know the emptiness of its allurements, and who have no purer or better resource, than to retire within themselves and drink poison from their own bitter thoughts.

All, then, are liable to grief and need consolation, from the youth to the gray-headed, and as they pass on through life, require comfort of a more substantial kind than that which satisfied them in its earlier hours. Why does not the stern man, when his possessions have been swept by flood or the flame, sit down and weep gushing tears as he did in the sorrow of his childhood at the loss of some gilded toy? Is it, think you, because he does not feel as much this greater loss?—surely not. He does powerfully feel it, but the experience of his mature years will not bring back his treasures, and with the calm but terrible strength of grief, he rises, and casts about him, and lays hold of the elements which are to build up again his fortune. And while he is thus employed, he finds consolation, and feels that it is of a deeper nature—one more adapted to his hope—than the slight amusement which dried his boyish tears of yesterday. But anon, perhaps, the fabric of his delight will be swept away, ay, and again, and when by repeated lessons, he learns that he needs a firmer foundation than the temporary and fleeting things of earth, when he finds that none of these will ever afford sufficient consolation, however various it may be, he will seek for something that will raise him above fluctuation—that will make him truly superior to misfortune. And then, it may be, he will begin to look for a lasting peace—to establish "the kingdom of heaven within him"—and when this is done, he will have laid up his treasures "where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt."

The maiden, with her gay and girlish laugh, and her April tears, what consolation has she required to smother all the grief which she has known? If she has lamented, for one monient, the loss of some favorite and cherished flower, in the next, the sunshine glittering upon the dew-drops, has banished her sorrow. But when other days have come—when she has sealed the eyes of that infant for whom affection was so garnered in her heart with all that depth and power which woman alone possesses—when the tiny shout and the carol laugh no more come with their music to her ears—she feels that much of the beauty of earth, for her, has passed away, and she turns for stronger consolation than that, and finds it in the love of him who took her hand in the bridal hour, to walk with him through the changing pilgrimage of life. But again—when years have rolled by—when, one by one, the flowers which lay upon her path have been blighted, and the golden links which bound her to existence, broken—when their children have gone down to their "dreamless sleep;" or are scattered abroad in the world—when her husband is not of the living, or, if of the living, has turned fiend—when she sits down in the loneliness and desolation of her widowhood, or worse than widowhood—oh! what shall be her trust, her strong stay, then? Hear her, as she raises her calm, meek eye to heaven, and learn what is her support!—"The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside the still waters!"

We perceive, by these illustrations, that confidence in God is our only abiding light through the journey of life. All others, emanating from earth, flicker a while upon our pathway, and then leave us, in disappointment and alone! The spirit of man, from its immortal nature, needs, amid the sorrow and harshness of the world, stronger support than worldly things can afford. It requires aid from the supreme Being, and confidence in his merciful goodness. We all seek, although it may be erroneously, for that true peace which imparts serenity and happiness amid the storms and the fretfulness of our present existence. Oh! "the green pastures and the still waters"—how many hearts have sighed for them amid the glare and tumult of the world!—How many spirits, wearied and sinking, have longed for the wings of a dove, that they might "flee away and be at rest!"—There are so many changes which happen to us—so many hopes, wreathed and then scattered—so many bright schemes destroyed—so many fond ties severed—there is so much coldness, selfishness and hollowness in man—that we find that the prospect which cheered us on life's young morning, like the deceptive mirage, leaves us in disappointment under the heat of the noontide and in the bareness of the desert! We need then, I say, a deep and immutable trust in God, and a condition of the heart which will afford us this trust. We need a peace which the world can neither give nor take away—and this peace we may have by possessing a practical and unshaken confidence in that Being, whose existence and attributes are demonstrated in the natural world, and, far more clearly, in the blessed teachings of revelation.

The system of atheism may afford a temporary refuge for the corrupt man, wishing to indulge himself in sin; but it appears to me that its chief tenet overshadows with darkness, even the momentary gratification which is derived from these indulgences. And that tenet is the denial of the existence of God. This makes the world truly cheerless and existence a fitful dream. No God? And the hind of the forest, and the wild deer of the hills, find a congeniality in the physical world—every adaptations to their natures—their wants all satisfied! Yet the spirit of man—the lofty and yearning spirit—has nothing like it, superior and purer!—no great spirit of the universe that sympathizes with it! It would be hard, very hard, for us to believe this. It makes a discord amid universal harmony. Were it true, there would be one existing principle, superior to all other existences, and yet, although superior, unable fully to satisfy its own wants, and having no higher and perfect power of the kind from which to obtain aid. We say this would be a discord amid universal harmony, because the wants of all other beings can be fully satisfied from the physical world, but the noblest existence in the universe can not be satisfied by it. This principle, which lives in man, mounts above earth and requires something higher and better than it affords, and we can not but believe that there is a Father of our spirits, who is able to appease those yearnings—to heal the wounded soul and give the troubled rest!

It would be very hard for us, also, to believe that the aspirations for good, the prayers and the praises which ascend around us, go up into the vast temple of nature, heard by no Deity, answered but by its winds and echoes!—that it was all delusion when the doomed at the stake,

> "caught, through the martyr's flame,
> A glimpse of the martyr's heaven!"

—that the good deeds which have blest humanity, and dispelled the darkness, and poured out the truth, was not purposed—oh! it would be very hard for us to believe that the principle which has been able to achieve things like these, was called into existence by dull, unthinking matter, and moved about in the earth for a period of days, without design and without end! You may tell us that the genial warmth which quickens our fields and calls forth our harvests, the dews and the raindrops which gladden the flowers and refresh the herbage, are the operation of natural causes without design, and possibly we may believe you, but more difficult than that would it be for us to believe, that the moral good which has existed in and brightened our world, was undesigned, unsent!

Again—you may tell us when the sun is sinking to his rest, and mountain, and river, and the pavilion of clouds are kindling in his beams—when the incense of flowers and the sweetness of song are going up from the great altar of earth—when in the smile of his glory, there are beauty, gladness and rejoicing—you may tell us amid all this, that he will rise no more, and that eternal night will settle around us; and we could credit this much easier, than we can believe that the glorious intellect which has brought us knowledge from the high stars and from the secret places of earth—which has breathed the songs we sing, and uttered the eloquence which stirs our hearts, and opened to us the pages that old wisdom wrote—that has left behind it so many monuments of power has perished. Oh! much easier could we credit you, when you told us that the sunlight had vanished forever, than we could believe this last—that when the music of the crushed lyre is yet thrilling our souls with its sweetness, the spirit which first summoned forth that living melody has gone down into the darkness, to be annihilated and to exist no more! Yet all these things, so difficult to believe, would be true if there is no God!

But we may take even one step farther, and believe that old and mystic philosophy, which taught that the world is the creation of some evil spirit, inferior to the Great First Cause, who has imprisoned our souls here in frail materiality; and believing this, we may suppose that all the exhibitions of goodness and all the splendor of genius which we have witnessed, were mere mockeries—beautiful illusions—which the demon has called up and caused to pass before our eyes, the more to aggravate the evils of our situation. All this we might, perhaps, be so deluded as to believe.

But there is yet one doctrine which our souls can not receive. And it is, that the blessed confidence in God—the trust in his goodness and mercy, which has cheered so many sad hearts, and dried so many tears, and buoyed up so many sinking spirits—is all a mockery. This we can not believe. We can not believe that what has purified and supported so many in their pilgrimage, is a cruel and vain deception!

No!—There is a God, who maketh us to lie down in green pastures; who leadeth us beside the still waters! Turn, reader, from the gloom of infidelity, to the cheering view which the religion of Christ, shedding light and joy, presents before us. In that volume of revelation, which God in mercy has given to man, the great truth so needful to the peace of our souls, is declared. There we find the teachings of nature and our hearts, confirmed. There we are told, that there is One who created the souls which we possess, and who knows their wants and their sorrows. To that blessed support let us cling in all the storms and tempests of life. The Lord is our Shepherd—he will provide! E. H. C.

THE BOOK OF REVELATIONS

Of the numerous requests for explanations of Scripture, there are more texts from this book than from any other in the Bible. It will be seen by my views of the book itself, why I have always been reluctant to undertake explaining particular portions of it—i. e., I have not yet become Yankee enough to love guessing in religious mat ers, and yet have been able to form so little of a system respecting the book, that I could not conscientiously and consistently offer my opinions on any part of the book, but as inferences and guesses. For this reason, I never quote from this book, as proof of any doctrine, and have never, until last Winter, preached from any text in it. The reader will presently see that I am in respectable company at least, on this subject; whether we are correct or not in our views and practice, let every one judge for himself as we have done for ourselves.

The Book of Revelations, or Apocalypse, is a disputed book. It has long been contended whether it was written by John, the beloved disciple, or another John—whether in the life-time of the apostles, or at a subsequent period—whether it was, at the date of the book, a description of things past and present, or wholly relating to things yet to come. Every shade of each of these different views has found advocates and defenders, whose zeal and industry could not be faulted, whatever might be said of their learning and candor!

Of later years, however, the generality of the ablest critics and commentators unite in fixing the date of the book in the age of the apostles—in regarding it as most probably a genuine and authentic book, written by the apostle John—and regard it as a prophecy of things to come. So far nearly all are agreed, and my own mind is convinced that such is most probably the fact—at least, the evidence I have read, if not conclusive, preponderates greatly on that side of the question. As one who would not handle the Bible deceitfully, I am obliged to state that my conviction is not complete on this point—I would be glad to find yet "more light" upon the subject.

But in examining the book, for the purpose of explaining any of its "dark passages," I choose to assume a system the nearest possible to my belief respecting the book, in order that I may proceed consistently and clearly in my explanations. This I shall do in my subsequent articles—after explaining in this article the views I do entertain, and the reasons for my assumption. Suffice it then to say, that whoever will go to the various commentators for an explanation of this book, and will carefully examine their conflicting explanations, dates, and authorities, will be more than ever convinced of the propriety of the rule respecting it, laid down by the primitive churches of Christ—viz.: That it was to be received as authentic and genuine, and allowed to be publicly read in the churches, but not to be quoted in proof of any doctrine.

Among the various dates for its production, and schemes for its interpretation, (all of them well defended and ably supported,) I agree with Dr. Adam Clarke in preferring those given by the celebrated commentator and Biblical critic, Wetstein, and others—viz., that the Apocalypse was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, and had reference principally to the establishment of Christianity in the stead of Judaism. In adopting this view, I am governed not by the authority of great names, nor, alone, by the external evidence these learned men adduce in favor of this opinion—for though their general views, being so different from mine, render them good authority in my favor on this subject, and though the historical and other external testimony is very great and strong, yet it appears to me that the internal evidence, derived from this book alone, is sufficient to settle the question. And it further appears to me, that if those who adopt a date later than the destruction of Jerusalem, would be governed by internal evidence, they could not longer dissent from Drs. Clarke, Wetstein, Eichhorn, Sir Isaac Newton, and others who hold to an earlier date.

For instance—the Revelator always and frequently speaks of the Jewish temple, and of the city of Jerusalem, as yet standing—of the Jewish nation and worship as yet existing in full vigor—as he would not have done, had such not been the case at the time of his writing the book. Again—the events he prophecies, are almost always said to be at hand—to be about to occur—to come to pass shortly—to happen quickly—in short, the book opens and closes with the solemn declarations that the revelation was made solely to show "things which must shortly come to pass"—that for their fulfilment "the time is at hand"—that Jesus "cometh quickly" to execute them, and that the book shall not be sealed, for the time of its fulfilment "is at hand"—the things predicted in it, "must shortly be done." These expressions occur in the first and in the last chapters of the book, no less than eight times—once on an average, to every five verses—besides being repeated in other chapters of the book. Now, fixing the date after the destruction of Jerusalem, we can find no events narrated in history, which could compare in importance and nature with those prefigured in the Apocalypse, and which took place soon enough after the writing of the book, to warrant the use of these repeated declarations. But, fixing the date of the book before the destruction of Jerusalem, every event rushes forward to fulfil its predictions, and to prove it true that the time was at hand—that the events did shortly come to pass—and that Jesus did come quickly, in the power of his Gospel and the triumph of his church over Judaism and Heathenism—in the clouds of heaven, in his kingdom, with power and great glory. With these very brief reasons, which might easily be greatly extended, I deem myself justified in my views of the date and plan of the book.

In relation to the explanation of any particular passage, it may be but fair to apprise the reader, that I shall not practice, myself, conduct I condemn in others. Believing the language of the Apocalypse to be too highly figurative and symbolical to be relied on confidently, however clearly it might have been, when first written, to those living in the very events it prefigured, I shall not dare to quote it as proof of any doctrine, in itself.—But when a doctrine is plainly and clearly taught in the positive, literal language of the Gospels and Epistles of the New Testament, I may quote the book of Revelations in illustration thereof. Of course, any doctrine not clearly and plainly taught in other parts of the Christian Scriptures, can not be proven by the ambiguous figurative language of the Apocalypse. I think you will admit the fairness and reasonableness of this course, so accordant with the practice of the early Christians in relation to this book. And had it been adhered to by later Christians, we had been spared the sneers and ridicule of skeptics at the many signal failures to interpret it—and the disgrace of having so often prostituted its predictions for the purpose of reviling and persecuting each other. For Gibbon (I believe it is) informs us, that it was first used by the Christian church, after the days of primitive Christianity, as a war-club to knock down the Pagans—after that, by the Greek and Roman Catholics to maul each other—then by the Reformers and Roman Catholics to beat each other—and now there is scarcely a new sect that breaks off from the popular Protestants, but uses this theological mallet to batter down the systems they have deserted. Thus, the Mormons, the Perfectionists, and the Swedenborgians, use it to prove the downfall of popular Protestantism—and I am of the opinion that an ingenious Universalist could use it as readily, if not more plausibly, to prove the downfall of Trinitarian Partialism. If he did so use it, he would abuse it as much as all the others have done. I shall therefore confine myself to an interpretation and defence of the text selected, which shall be in perfect accordance with the plain and explicit language of the other parts of the Bible—especially of the New Testament. If this book is canonical, it can not contradict Jesus, and Paul, and John—if not canonical, it is of no authority whatever to Christians, except so far as it agrees with the Gospels and Epistles of the New Testament.

If the reader wishes for farther information on the general views of commentators, and their mode of explaining this book, he will find it in Dr. Clarke's Commentary and prefatory remarks on the book itself—also, in the Universalist Expositor, volume iii, pp. 193, 210, he will find two excellent articles on the subject. My limits will not allow me to state further on the subject than is here written. Next week, explanations of the passages on which explanations are requested, will be commenced. A. B. G.

ABUSIVE LETTERS.

By the Star in the West I see that Br. Gurley has received a scandalous, profane, and abusive letter, designed to make him pay postage for being insulted. Was it from "Jacksonville, Geo.,"—dated at "Americus"—and taxed 25 cents postage? I ask, because on July 23d, Br. Skinner received one containing the "worst respects" of its writer, and similar profane and even obscene language, from that quarter. I believe that the writer has subjected himself to a pretty smart fine for thus imposing on the post office department, (for it is on that, and not on those addressed, that he imposes, as all postage on such letters is refunded by the postmasters,) and that it would be doing him a kindness, and the public a service, to find him out, and fine him accordingly. Probably if all such impositions were sent to the General Post Office, with a proper statement of the case, the Postmaster General would take pains to ferret out the writer. Let us try it. A. B. G.

THE BEREAN AND BIBLICAL INTERPRETER.

The first number of the second volume of this ever-welcome messenger of glad tidings is before me, enlarged to a quarto form. The news of the spread of our cause in that mighty, indefinable West, where men's minds seem to expand with their own boundless prairies, and strengthen with the growth of their vast and towering forests, it is like "cold water to the thirsty soul" of the philanthropist and the patriot. And such news, mingled with melancholy solicitations for more substantial support, do we find in the Berean. Free discussion, almost to a fault, is the order of the day in that mighty West. There men's minds know not the trammels of creeds that demand a shrinking from investigation—or, if they have felt those trammels at the East, on their removal thither, the mingled multitudes of various opinions, wear off the rivets, and the shackles hang but loosely on the expanding mind. And among those that have buckled on the Gospel armor, and battle for spiritual freedom, reform, and truth, and love, Br. Wadsworth of the Berean always seems to prove himself well skilled in using the weapons of the warfare.—There is a vigor, freshness and fearlessness in his controversial articles—a boldness of thought and depth of inquiry, mingled withal with a forbearing and Christian spirit—that is refreshing to the soul. Our brethren in the West should prize him and his labors more highly than I fear they do. The Glad Tidings—the Star in the West, and last, not least, the Berean are all needed there, and should be ably, substantially supported.—There are hundreds of brethren there whose attachments to the East do not lead them to prefer a paper from the Middle and Eastern States, and who therefore patronize no Universalist paper. Can they not be aroused to the importance of supporting better—more promptly and extensively—these excellent and useful laborers with the press? The trifle it will cost them, will be repaid a hundred fold, in the moral and intellectual good these periodicals will effect in their families and neighborhoods.

The Berean is published in Louisville, Ky., every other Saturday, on a medium sheet, quarto form, by Wadsworth and Messenger—N. Wadsworth, Editor—at one dollar and fifty cents per annum payable on the reception of the first number. The first number of volume second, is dated forward to August 4th, 1838.

A MISUNDERSTANDING.

"Understandest thou what thou readest?" is a question that might be proposed to many of the reading world, with propriety and profit. Last Spring I gave notice that I had sold my printing establishment to my brother, C. C. P. Grosh. Many of our readers have got the idea that it was the newspaper establishment—the subscription list, etc., of the Magazine and Advocate—which was thus sold to him; and have kept hold of this erroneous opinion, notwithstanding that every paper published since that, bears the imprint, "Published by A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson," on the last page! Be it therefore understood, that myself and Br. Hutchinson still are the Proprietors and Publishers of this paper—that the printing materials on which it is printed is all that I sold to my brother—and that C. C. P. Grosh, is the printer employed by us to do the printing of the Magazine and Advocate. All letters relating in any wise to the Magazine and Advocate, must be addressed to Grosh and Hutchinson, Proprietors of the same. If you have any pamphlets or books that you want printed, direct your letters to C. C. P. Grosh, who will attend to the same. A. B. G.

Br. Towpkins—Send current vol. Repository to Miss Hannah Eldred, Auburn—also, to Miss Harriet Hewett, Genoa, Cayuga county, and charge H. Boughton, of Scipio—also, credit Maria McDonough, Lairdsville, Oneida county, Peter Fake, J. H. Woodburn, and H. S. Todd, Cold Brook, each $2 and charge G. and H.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in August, by Br. E. E. Guild, in Harpersfield, at 11 A. M., and in the stone school-house at 4 P. M.—Br. Grosh in Oppenheim, (will be at Johnsville on Saturday)—Br. Doolittle, in Oxford—Br. W. Martin, in Phœnix, Oswego county.

The Murray Association will hold its regular annual session in the Universalist Institute, Ohio City, on the last Saturday and following Sunday in August next.—The societies of New-London, Huntington, Westfield, Sharon, Carlisle, Olmstead and Ohio City, are requested in accordance with the recommendation of this body at its last session in Sharon, to meet, if they have not done it, appoint, each, a committee of three, to examine the condition of their respective societies, and report at the forthcoming session. We hope and trust that not one will be found wanting at that time.

J. Whitney, Standing Clerk.

The annual meeting of the Chenango Association, will be held at North Norwich, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in September. We hope to see all the societies within its bounds represented by their delegates. Ministering brethren from other Associations, respectfully invited to attend.

N. Doolittle, Standing Clerk.

A quarterly Conference will be held at Jenning Corners, Palermo, on the third Saturday and Sunday, 18th and 19th of August next.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

HEAVEN.

BY MRS. A. F. STEPHENS.

"Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him" 1 Cor. ii: 9.

Beyond the reign of sin and death,
Beyond the precincts of the tomb,
There is a bright and beauteous land,
Where flowers perennial ever bloom.

Eye hath not seen, nor heart conceived
The glories of that bleat abode;
Oceans of light, and life, and joy,
Flow round it from the throne of God.

Before that throne, archangels bend,
And tune their harps to loftier strains;
While loud hosannas to the Lord,
Echo around those flowery plains.

And oh! in those green, fadeless bowers,
Reclining on their Saviour's breast,
The loved and lost of earth have found,
A blissful home of endless rest.

Our Father in his boundless love,
Hath there prepared a bounteous feast;
And the whole kindred of mankind,
Shall share in the divine repast.

Yes, led by Jesus' own soft hand,
All shall return from error's ways,
And, purified from earthly dross,
There join in endless songs of praise.

Infinite grace will be the theme
Of those blest songs, through Heaven's bright day;
And love supreme will fill each soul,
While ages roll their years away.

DUELLING.

If two boys who disagreed about a game of marbles or a penny tart, should therefore walk out by the river side, quietly take off their clothes, and when they had got into the water, each try to keep the other's head down until one of them was drowned, we should doubtless think these two boys were mad. If when the survivor returned to his school-fellows, they patted him on the shoulder, told him he was a spirited fellow, and that if he had not tried the feat in the water, they would never have played at marbles or any other game with him again, we should doubtless think that these boys were infected with a most revolting and disgusting depravity and ferociousness. We should instantly exert ourselves to correct their principles, and should feel assured that nothing could ever induce us to tolerate, much less encourage such abandoned depravity. And yet we do both tolerate and encourage such depravity every day. Change the penny tart for some other trifle; instead of boys put men, and instead of a river a pistol, and we encourage it all. We virtually pat the the survivor's shoulder, tell him he is a man of honor, and if he had not shot at his acquaintance, we would never have dined with him again. "Revolting and disgusting depravity" are at once excluded from our vocabulary. We substitute such phrases as "the course which a gentleman is obliged to pursue,"—"it was necessary to his honor,"—"one could not have associated with him if he had not fought." We are the school-boys grown up; and by the absurdity and more than absurdity, of our phrases and actions, shooting or drowning, (it matters not which) becomes the practice of the national school.

It is not a trifling question that a man puts to himself when he asks what is the amount of my contribution to this detestable practice? It is by individual contributions to the public notions respecting it, that the practice is kept up. Men do not fire at one another because they are fond of risking their own lives or other men's, but because public notions are such as they are. Nor do I think any deduction can be more manifestly just, than that he who contributes to the misdirection of these notions, is responsible for a share of the evil and the guilt. When some offence has given probability to a duel, every man acts immorally who evinces any disposition to coolness with either party, until he has resolved to fight; and if eventually one of them falls, he is a party to his destruction. Every word of unfriendliness, every look of indifference is positive guilt; for it is such words and such looks, that drive men to their pistols.—It is the same after a victim has fallen. "I pity his family, but they have the consolation of knowing that he vindicated his honor," is equivalent to urging another and another to fight. Every heedless gossip who asks, "have you heard of this affair of honor"? and every reporter of news who relates it as a proper and necessary procedure, participates in the general crime.

If they who hear of an intended meeting among their friends, hasten to manifest that they will continue their intercourse with the parties though they do not fight, if none talk of vindicating honor by demanding satisfaction, if he who speaks and he who writes of this atrocity, speaks and writes as reason and moral dictate, duelling will soon disappear from the world. To contribute to the suppression of the custom is therefore easy, and let no man, and let no woman, who does not, as occasion offers, express reprobation of the custom, think that their hands are clear of blood. They especially are responsible for its continuance, whose station or general character gives peculiar influence to their opinions in its favor. What then are we to think of the conduct of a British [or an American] judge who encourages it from the bench? [Ought they not to treat it the same as they would any other kind of murder?] A short time ago [1826] a person was tried on the Perth Circuit, for murder, having killed another in a duel. The evidence of the fact was undisputed. Before the verdict was pronounced, the judge is said to have used these words in his address to the jury: "The character you have heard testified by so many respectable and intelligent gentlemen this day, is as high as is possible for man to receive, and I consider that throughout this affair the panel has acted up to it." So that it is laid down from the bench that a man who shoots another through the heart for striking him with an umbrella, acts up to the highest possible character of a man! The prisoner, although every one knew that he had killed the deceased, was acquitted; and the judge is reported to have addressed him thus: "You must be aware that the only duty I have to perform is to dismiss you from that with a character unsullied." If the judge's language be true, Christianity is an idle fiction. Who will wonder at the continuance of duelling?—who will wonder that upon this subject the moral law is disregarded? If we are to be told that "unsullied character,"—nay, that "the highest possible character of man," is compatible with trampling Christianity under our feet?—Dymond's Essays.

FORCE OF EDUCATION.

Few are aware of the tremendous power of education over the human mind in relation to every subject. In the moral composition of man there seems to exist a constitutional tenacity of primary impressions. However absurd, and ridiculous, the ideas and sentiments may be, that are instilled into the credulous heart in childhood, it is rarely the case that the reasoning powers are ever afterwards sufficiently strong to free themselves from the iron grasp of tradition. Although their better judgment may be convinced that what they were at first taught to believe, is perfectly erroneous, yet in spite of themselves, those early conceptions, generated by ignorance and superstition, involuntarily haunt the imagination, and hang like a moral incubus upon their ripened judgment. The experience of most people will furnish abundant illustrations of what I have here stated. Who does not remember when in youth of having listened whole evenings to stories of ghosts and apparitions, of "goblins and chimeras dire," until his young heart palpitated with fear, and every thing he heard or saw for a long time afterwards was metamorphosed into an unearthly sight, or sound, which foreboded death, or some one of the ten thousand lesser evils that "flesh is heir to." And who can say that he has ever been able to entirely overcome the effects of this foolish conduct in persons who ought to have known better than to have created such groundless alarm in the breasts of their young auditors? For myself I shall never forget the many times that I have heard in breathless silence the whole catalogue of supernatural appearances—of strange noises, of haunted houses, of infallible forerunners and sure omens—of sights that were seen, and sounds that were heard before such and such a person died, etc., etc., until my hair bristled, and my nervous system was at the highest pitch of excitement. And when I retired to my bed chamber it would be with my eyes firmly closed, that I might not see any of the frightful visitants from the world of spirits with which I imagined I was surrounded. And after having with a trembling hand divested myself of clothing, often have I ensconced my body in the smothering folds of a multiplicity of bedquilts; perhaps too in the sultry heat of a dog day evening, with every nerve strained to catch the least sound which corresponded with the description which I had heard, expecting every moment to be saluted with a precursor of my speedy dissolution; or that my apartment would be entered by some mischievous witch or wizard who would put me under the unpleasant duress of saddle and bridle, transform me into a horse, and ride me to the periodical rendezvous of Belzebub's forces which was held according, to report, somewhere in the region of Hades, until wearied nature would find repose in sleep; or day-light would dispel the horrible phantoms of a disordered imagination. Now all this would deserve but little attention if no one else had experienced the same or similar feelings. But it is sufficiently notorious, that almost every person now living has suffered incalculably under this injudicious treatment. It has not been confined to the ignorant, or those who chiefly delighted in the marvellous, but has been common with the most enlightened, and even with professed Christians. In short, terrorism has been the order of the day, and the creed of the world for many centuries; it has been the great agent of despotism in the church for almost two thousand years, and although it is perceptibly giving way to more enlarged and consistent views, yet the fact of its existing at all at the present day, is proof conclusive of the immense and enduring power that education sways over the destinies of man. Children have been frightened to the performance of their duties, and fright has been the grand lever that has moved the multitude, people have repented through fright, and been frightened to Heaven. O! what folly, madness and ridiculous superstition.—Watchman.

PLEASURES OF OBSERVATION.

What a large volume of adventures may be grasped within this little span of life, by him who interests his heart in every thing, and who having eyes to see what time and chance are perpetually holding out to him as he journeys on his way, misses nothing he can fairly lay his hands on.

I pity the man who can travel from Dan to Beersheba, and cry, 'tis all barren—but so it is, and so is all the world to him who will not cultivate the fruits it offers. I declare, that were I in a desert, I would find wherewith in it to call forth my affections. If I could do no better, I would fasten them upon some sweet myrtle or seek some melancholy cypress, to connect myself to—I would court their shade, and greet them kindly for their protection—I would cut my name upon them, and affirm they were the loveliest trees throughout the desert: if their leaves withered, I would teach myself to mourn, and when they rejoiced I would rejoice along with them. —Sterne.

DEATHS.

In Columbus, on the 8th inst., after a short but painful illness, MARY FRANCES, only child of D. H. and H. M. Spurr, aged about 3 years. Funeral on the 9th—sermon by T. J. S.

At Rome, on the 13th inst., of measles, CELESTIA E. HOLLISTER, aged 2 years and 7 months. Her funeral was attended at Bridgewater on the 14th, by the writer. T. J. S.

In Busti, February 4th, CHARLES ANDREWS, son of Asahel and Lucy Andrews, aged 24 years. Sermon by Br. Adams.

In Gerry, Chautauque county, May 28th, HANNAH AMARILLA WALKUP, daughter of Asahel and Lucy Andrews, aged 35 years. Sermon by Br. Adams.

In Edmeston, July 1st, MRS. JERUSHA CHARISSA DEMING, wife of Col. Eri Deming, aged 33 years. Suddenly, and under circumstances peculiarly afflicting to her friends, she was called from the midst of life and usefulness, to slumber with the nations of the dead.—She has left behind an affectionate husband and seven small children, who have suffered an irreparable loss; and a numerous circle of relatives and friends to mourn her untimely departure.

Mrs. Deming had made no public professions of religion; yet she performed the practical duties of Christianity, and it is believed was supported in her last moments by an unshaken confidence in the goodness of God. Her funeral was attended on the 3d inst., by a numerous and sympathizing audience, to all of whom may God grant the richest blessings, a knowledge of himself and the consolations of his Gospel. Sermon by the writer, from Luke iv: 18, 19. I. HAYWARD.

In this city, June 23d, LYDIA ANN, daughter of Thomas L. Kingsley, aged six weeks.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 28.—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.

Bethany, Va., July 12, 1838.

SIR—Your two last letters appear to have been designed for making up the number. Like mortar, they only fill up space, without strengthening the wall. When I consented to protracting the controversy to forty letters in all, or twenty letters each, it was on your allegation that you could not do justice to the subject in less. But really, Sir, for some time past you seem to have exhausted the subject and to be intent on making up the complement, rather than proving your propositions. Your proof was nearly all in your first letter: it was then in the solid form—since you have given it to us in its liquid state—and now you are exhibiting it in its gaseous phenomena. It becomes still less feasible the more speciously you elaborate it. Your allegations require direct proof; yet you have not attempted to give us a text, not even a single text, that says all men shall be finally holy and happy—not one verse that says any thing about your post mortem purgatorial repentance, sanctification, and salvation.

2d. You appear in the singular attitude of proving a question of fact by theorizing, or by remote inferences from premises that have no bearing upon the subject. Meantime, while you are elaborating a theory rather than proving a proposition, I shall proceed to summon a few witnesses in the case, whose testimony severally and collectively refutes all Universalism, both the genuine Universalism of New-York and New-England, and your unwritten indefinable Restorationism. Future judgment, future punishment, the everlasting destruction and perdition of ungodly men, or the ultimate difference between the righteous and the wicked in another state, are unequivocally asserted and fully maintained by the following witnesses, if their words have any meaning. Though written off as you now read them before I read your last letter, you will no doubt perceive that they reach the whole ground assumed in it, and in that which preceded it, and much more than anticipate and countervail both your quotations and reasonings. Do, Sir, give, if possible, a candid hearing to the following cloud of witnesses, any one of whom has more authority than all the Rabbis, philosophers, and commentators that ever lived:—

3d. Enoch's Testimony.—"Behold the Lord comes with ten thousand of his saints to execute judgment [*krisis punishment] upon all, and to convince [convict] all that are ungodly amongst them, of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him." Jude 15.

4th. Abraham's Testimony.—"That be far from thee, O Lord! to do after this manner, to slay the righteous with the wicked; and that the righteous should be as the wicked, that be far from thee. Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" Gen. xviii: 25.

5th. Moses' Testimony.—"The Lord God is merciful and gracious, long-suffering, abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty; visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, and upon their children's children, to the third and to the fourth generation." Exod. xxxiv: 6, 7.

6th. Joshua's Testimony.—"As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord;" but—"You can not serve the Lord; for he is a holy God, a jealous God; he will not forgive your transgressions nor your sins. If you forsake the Lord and serve strange gods, then he will turn and do you hurt, and consume you after that he has done you good." Joshua xxiv: 19, 20.

7th. Balaam's Testimony.—"God is not a man that he should repent, nor the son of man that he should lie; hath he said, and shall he not do it? Hath he spoken, and shall it not come to pass? He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath he seen perverseness in Israel: the Lord his God is with him. Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." Had Balaam been a Universalist he might as well have said, all punishment being in this life, "Let me die the death of the wicked, and let my last end be like his. Num. xxiii: 10, 19.

8th. David's Testimony.—"The ungodly shall not stand in the judgment, nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous: for the Lord approveth the way of the righteous, but the way of the ungodly shall perish." Ps. i: 5, 6. "The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God." Ps. ix: 17. "Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire and brimstone, and a horrible tempest. This shall be the portion of their cup." Ps. xi: 6. "Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle, who shall dwell in thy holy hill? He that walketh uprightly and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart," etc. Ps. xv. "Deliver me, O Lord, from the wicked, from the men of the world which have their portion in this life." Psalm xvii: 14. "Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord, and who shall stand in his holy place? He who has clean hands and a pure heart; who has not lifted up his soul nor sworn deceitfully. He shall receive the blessing from the Lord, and righteousness from the God of his salvation." Ps. xxiv: 3, 4. "Evil shall slay the wicked. The face of the Lord is against them that do evil." xxxiv: 16, 21. "The wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs. They shall consume away." xxxvii: 20. "The end of the perfect man is peace, but the transgressors shall be destroyed together: the end of the wicked shall be cut off." v: 37, 38. "To the wicked God saith, Thou thoughtest that I was altogether such a one as thyself; but I will reprove thee, and set them [thy sins] in order before thine eyes. Now consider this, you that forget God, lest I tear you in pieces and there be none to deliver." l: 26. "Behold these are the ungodly who prosper in the world: they increase in riches. When I went into the sanctuary of God then I understood their end.—Surely thou didst set them in slippery places; thou castedst them down into destruction; they are brought to desolation as in a moment: they are utterly consumed with terrors. O Lord! when thou awakest, thou shalt despise their image." lxxiii: 12-20. "In the hand of the Lord there is a cup, and the wine is red; it is full of mixture, and he poureth out of the same; but the dregs thereof all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out and drink them." lxxv: 8. "When all the workers of iniquity do flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed for ever." xcii: 7.

9th. Solomon's Testimony.—"Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished; but the seed of the righteous shall be delivered." Prov. xi: 21. "The wicked is driven away in his wickedness, but the righteous has hope in his death." Prov. xiv: 32. "He that being often reproved, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy." xxix: 1. "Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the hearts of the sons of men are fully set in them to do evil. Though a sinner do evil a hundred times, and his days be prolonged, yet surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God, who fear before him. But it shall not be well with the wicked, neither shall he prolong his days, which are as a shadow, because he feareth not before God." Ecc. viii: 11-13. "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole happiness of man; for God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil." Ecc. xii: 13, 14.

10th. Isaiah's Testimony.—"Say you to the righteous that it shall be well with him: for they shall eat the fruit of their doings. Wo unto the wicked! it shall be ill with him: for the reward of his hand shall be given him." iii: 10, 11. "There is no peace, saith the Lord, to the wicked. The sinner, though a hundred years old, shall be accursed." lxv: 20. "The destruction of transgressors and of the sinner shall be together, and they that forsake the Lord shall be consumed." i: 28.

11th. Jeremiah's Testimony.—"Among my people are found wicked men: they are full of deceit, therefore are they become great and waxen rich; yea, they overpass the deeds of the wicked. Shall I not visit for these things, saith the Lord; shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?" v: 25-29. "Pour out thy fury upon the heathen that know thee not, and upon the families that call not upon thy name." x: 28. "Ah! Lord God, behold thou hast made the heaven and the earth by thy great power and stretched out arm, and there is nothing too hard for thee. Thou showest loving kindness unto thousands, and recompensest the iniquity of the fathers into the bosom of their children after them. The Great, the Mighty God, the Lord of Hosts is his name; great in counsel and mighty in work: for thine eyes are open upon all the ways of the sons of men, to give every one according to his ways and according to the fruit of his doings." xxxii: 18, 19. "I the Lord search the heart and try the reins, even to give every man according to his ways and according to the fruit of his doings." xvii: 10.

12th. So testify Enoch, Abraham, Moses, Joshua, Balaam, David, Solomon, Isaiah, and Jeremiah; and these are but a fair sample of the witnesses of the olden times—the Patriarchal and Jewish ages of the world. We shall now hear some of the New Testament witnesses:—

13th. John the Baptist testifies, "Jesus shall baptize you in the Holy Spirit and in fire. His fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly cleanse his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner, and burn up the chaff in unquenchable fire. The axe lieth at the root of the trees: every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire." Matt. iii: 10, 12.

14th. Jesus, the great teacher and light of the world, testifies, "Except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, you shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven," Matt. v: 20. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." v: 8. "If thine eye ensnare thee, pluck it out; if thy right hand cause thee to stumble, cut it off and cast it away; for better it is for thee that one of thy members po-rish than that thy whole body be cast into hell. v: 29, 37. "Enter in at the strait gate: for wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be that go in thereat. Because strait is the gate and narrow the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." vii: 13, 14. "Not every one that saith Lord! Lord! shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven. Many will say to me in THAT DAY, Lord, Lord, have we not in thy name done many wonderful works? Then will I say to them, I never did acknowledge you, depart from me, you workers of iniquity." vii: 21–23. "Whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, when you depart out of that house or city, shake off the dust of your feet. Verily, I say to you, it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for that city. Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear Him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." Matt. x: 14, 15, 28. "Alas! for thee Chorazin, Bethsaida, Capernaum, etc., it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment than for you." Matt. xi: 21–24. "I say to you, that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment; for by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned." xii: 36, 37. "Let the tares and the wheat grow together unto the harvest, and in the time of harvest I will say to the reapers, Gather you together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them; but gather the wheat into my barn. The Son of Man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all that offend and do iniquity, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the righteous shine forth in the kingdom of their Father. Whoever hath ears to hear let him hear." xiii: 29, 30, 41, 42. "So shall it be at the end of the world; the angels shall come forth and sever the wicked from among the just, and shall cast them into the furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth." xiii: 47–50. "Whosoever will save his life shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it: for what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels, and he shall reward every man according to his works." xvi: 25–27. "It is better for thee to enter life halt or maimed, rather than having two hands or two feet to be cast into everlasting fire—into hell fire." xviii: 8, 9. "Wo unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! you shall receive the greater damnation. Serpents! generation of vipers! how can you escape the punishment of hell?" Matt. xxiii: 14–23. "These [the wicked] shall go away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous into life eternal." Matt. xxv: 46.

15th. Thus Matthew Levi testifies that Jesus spoke and taught the people. Matthew, Luke and John confirm the statements of Matthew, and add other sayings of the Messiah of a similar import, and sometimes illustrative of them; such as, "All sins may be forgiven unto the sons of men, and blasphemies wherewith they shall blaspheme; but he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Spirit hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of [or liable to] eternal damnation." Mark iii: 28. Matthew adds, "Whosoever speaketh a word against the Holy Spirit it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come." xii: 31, 32. Luke also declares, "To him that blasphemes against the Holy Spirit it shall not be forgiven." xii: 10. Mark, by a peculiar repetition, makes some points more emphatic; as when he quotes the Messiah saying, "Than to go into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched, where their worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched." This he repeats three times, chap. ix: 42–48. "Wo to that man by whom the Son of Man is betrayed! it were good for that man that he had never been born." Mark xiv: 21. "He that believeth not shall be damned." Mark xvi: 16. "He that rejecteth me and receiveth not my word, hath one that judgeth him—the word that I have spoken the same shall judge [condemn] him in the last day." John xii: 48. If it be possible for human language to assure us that there are some persons who shall never be pardoned, Jesus Christ himself has most solemnly and explicitly done it in the words before quoted—"He shall never be forgiven, neither in this world nor in that to come."

16th. Here we might pause: for who can illustrate or confirm the words of the Saviour and Judge of all men! But as there are some who teach that since the Gospel was fully preached by the apostles, and not by Christ, nor the prophets, we must look to their testimony for the future condition of those who receive and reject their Gospel. We shall therefore hear some of the apostles testify on this subject:—

17th. The sketches of sermons found in the Acts of the Apostles show that the receiving and rejecting of the Gospel, as there published, was understood by all the preachers as equivalent to receiving and rejecting eternal life. For example, Paul and Barnabas said to the Jews in Antioch of Pisidia, "It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you; but seeing you put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of eternal life, we turn to the Gentiles." Again, Luke says, "When the Gentiles heard this they were glad, and glorified the word of the Lord; and as many as were ordained [determined] for eternal life, believed." And to those who rejected the Gospel, Paul says, "Behold, you despisers, and wonder and perish." Acts xiii: 41, 46, 48. And as if the life eternal of the hearers depended in part upon the faithfulness of the preacher, Paul says, "I have not shunned to declare to you all the counsel of God; therefore I call you to record this day that I am pure from the blood of all men." Acts xx: 26, 27. As a proof of the faithfulness of Paul, we learn that when he reasoned before Felix and Drusilla of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, Felix trembled." Acts xxiv: 25. But we have not to infer their mind or make out their testimony by construction. We shall therefore hear Paul in his Epistles:—

18th. Paul's Testimony.—"Despisest thou the riches of his goodness and forbearance and long-suffering, not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance. But after thy hardness and impenitent heart treasurest up unto thyself wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to every man according to his works. To them who by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory, and honor, and immortality, (he will reward) eternal life. But unto them who are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, (he will reward) indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first and also of the Gentile. But glory, honor, and peace to every man that worketh good to the Jew first and also to the Gentile; for there is no respect of persons with God. For as many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law, and as many as have sinned under the law shall be judged (condemned) by the law; for not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified." Rom. ii: 1–13. This passage may be regarded as a full expose of the principles of the moral government of God as Paul understood it. Every thing else found in his epistles is but an application of these principles. For example:—

19th. "Know you not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolators, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God." 1 Cor. vi: 9, 10, 11. This is substantially oft repeated; such as, Gal. v: 19–21, "The works of the flesh are manifest, adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, sedition, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such like; of the which I tell you before, as I have also told in times past, that they who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God." Once more—"For this you know," says Paul, "that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolator, has any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God. Let no man deceive you with empty words: for because of these things comes the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience." Eph. v: 4, 5.

20th. He varies his style, and teaches the same solemn truths in a great many ways. "We apostles are unto God a sweet savor of Christ in them that are saved, and in them that perish: to the one we are the savor of death unto death, and to the other the savor of life unto life." 2 Cor. ii: 15, 16. "We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in the body, according to that he hath done, whether good or bad. Knowing, therefore, the terror of the Lord, we persuade men." 2 Cor. v: 10. "For our God is a consuming fire." Heb. xii: 29. "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ let him be anathema maranatha (accursed when the Lord comes)." 1 Cor. xvi: 22. "For though we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached, let him be anathema"—i. e. accursed." Gal. i: 8. "Be not deceived: God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. He that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption, (death;) but he that soweth to the spirit, shall of the spirit reap life everlasting," (incorruption.) Gal. v: 7, 8.

21st. "There are many walk—the enemies of Christ. Their end is destruction!" Phil. iii: 19. "Yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night: for when they shall say, Peace and safety! then sudden destruction cometh upon them—as travail upon a woman with child—and they shall not escape." 1 Thess. v: 2. "Let the troubled (persecuted) rest with us——when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power; when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe." 2 Thess. i: 7–10. We need not quote Paul farther: he can not be more explicit, not even when he says, "He that despised Moses' law died without mercy—at the mouth of two or three witnesses—of how much sorer punishment (than death) will he be thought worthy who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing?" etc. Heb. x: 29. "But we are not of them who draw back to perdition, but of them who believe to the saving of the soul." x: 39.

22d. We have not yet heard the pillars James, and John, and Peter, nor have we room for their whole testimony; a few words from each will show on which side they stand:—James says, "Sin, when it is perfected, brings forth death;" and "judgment without mercy shall be awarded to him that showed no mercy;" "yet mercy rejoiceth against judgment;" and "he who converts a sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death and hide a multitude of sins." Chap. i: 15; ii: 13; v: 20. "If punishment begin at the house of God, what shall be the end of them who do not obey the Gospel of God? And if the righteous with difficulty escape, where will the ungodly and the sinner appear?" 1 Pet. iv: 17, 18. "False teachers—denying the Lord that bought them—shall bring upon themselves swift destruction. The punishment threatened of old lingers not, and their damnation slumbers not!

For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness to be reserved to judgment, and spared not the old world, nor Sodom, nor Gomorrah, will he spare you? The Lord knows how to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished." 2 Pet. ii: 3–10. "The heavens and the earth which are now by the same word, are kept in store, reserved to fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." "The unlearned and unteachable wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction." 2 Peter iii: 7, 16. "This is the record that God has given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son has life, and he that has not the Son of God has not life." 1 John v: 11, 12. "No murderer has eternal life abiding in him; and every one who hates his brother is a murderer." 1 John iii: 15.

23d. We shall not enter the Apocalypse because of its symbolic style, but conclude with a few words from Jude:—"The angels which kept not their first state, but left their own habitation, he has reserved in everlasting chains under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day." Verse 6. "Raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame; wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever." Verse 13.

24th. So depose Enoch, Abraham, Moses, Joshua, David, Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, John the Baptist, Jesus the Messiah, the four Evangelists, Paul, Peter, James, and Jude. On their testimony, without a word of comment, leaving the literal to explain the figurative, and the figurative the literal—prophets to explain apostles—and apostles, prophets, and Jesus himself to explain them all, I leave it with all my readers to decide for themselves whether there be not the strongest reasons on the part of all impenitent sinners for "a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation which shall devour the adversaries of God and Christ." I have sometimes quoted from the new version as well as from the old; but as some of these passages will doubtless be reconsidered, I appeal, according to stipulation, to the common version only. Faithfully yours, SOOTHING INFLUENCE OF NATURE TO THE UPRIGHT.

BY MRS. BROUGHTON.

How soothing to the worn spirit, to retire at times from the gay and bustling world, the wearying din of the busy throng, and the lore of scientific halls, to seek in nature's holy temple a balm for the fevered brow and aching heart; to cheer the eye that has grown weary in gazing upon the studied ornaments of fashion, with the bright and beautiful hues that glow upon her living page; and to forget the cupidity, the heartlessness, and treachery of frail, erring man, by listening to the celestial harmonies that swell in harp-like breathings through the whispering glens, where babbling streamlets murmur sweetly on their flower-clad paths; or when the spirit bows in sweet devotion, by joining in the anthems which swell, like the organ's peal, along the sapphire arches of nature's magnificent cathedral. The voice of the sweet-stringed instrument may thrill the soul with rapture; but what music can soothe like the chiming roll of the dashing waters, when the gale is moaning in echoing caverns, and the strong oaks bow to the fierce-toned blast? We may forget our dependence, our utter insignificance, while mingling with the worldly throng, and the spirit may bend to the enslaving influence of glittering wealth, and forget in the adulation of the thoughtless multitude, that mankind are but one great family, every individual of which, is alike dependent upon the upholding hand of Him who moved the dark chaotic waters of the embryo world, and who planted the mountains in the depths of the sea, and scattered upon the vast ethereal ocean, the myriads of diamond spheres that blaze upon the tranquil brow of night; but when we go out to meet the blushing dawn, while the shadowy twilight still lingers in the dewy vale, and the merry lark carols her matin hymn as she ascends to the orient chambers of light, where Aurora is giving place to the golden-crested king, the soul arises on devotion's wing, and the heart grows purer in the orisons that ascend to the shrine of nature and nature's God. When we stand alone on the breezy height, and look abroad upon the outstretched plains where herds and flocks are enjoying the bounties of Heaven, or gaze upon the mighty ocean that meets the far-off horizon, and glistens in the brightening dawn like a burnished plain of crystal, while the stately ship rides securely over its bosom, and the sea minstrel sleeps beneath the glassy wave, does not the soul send up the sweet incense of devotional praise to Him who spreads so fair the beautiful scenes of earth, and attunes the heart to melody? Or, when the tempest-king unfurls his gloomy banners, while his wild-winged couriers peal the onset of elemental strife, and ocean roars through all his troubled depths, and the dark forest's sons groan in the sounding blast, while the winged lightning's fiery chain glares fearfully through the deepening gloom, and the dread thunder's living peals re-echo along the vaulted sky, does not the stubborn soul bow low in reverential awe, and own the majesty of that Being who holds the angry winds in his grasp—whose ministers are the devouring flame, the devastating whirlwind, and storms that wake the billowy surges of the "upper deep"? Does not the mind grow purer in these solitary communings with itself? Does it not feel, with greater force, its child-like dependence upon the eternal Author of its being? The heart that has been taught aright—that has learned to look up to the Father of spirits, with that love and confidence with which the smiling infant twines its fond affections around the shrine of the parent's love, will answer in the affirmative. To those who view in all the varied works of nature, the wisdom and goodness of a benignant Parent, each scene of rural beauty—each seraph harmony that thrills the soul, as the light-winged breeze steals softly through the green arcades of nature's whispering bowers—each loftier melody of the rushing cataract and mountain stream, that roars among the hills; or the more awful notes that swell, when the wild demon of the storm sweeps darkly through the troubled sky—will impress more firmly upon the softened heart, the beautiful precepts of pure morality that abound in the sacred Volume. But are there not millions of our frail race, to whom the moral influence of nature is lost? Alas! The pirate unfurls his sails to the freshening gale, and speeds along the foaming deep in chase of the defenceless ship. The western sky is gathering blackness: the flash of heaven's artillery plays nimbly through the darkening horizon, and the thunder's muttered roar sounds like the earthquake's distant tread. Low, moaning sounds come booming over the waters, in soft but saddening strains, as if some spirit hand was gently sweeping the trembling chords of ocean's sounding lyre. He listens not to the voices that are swelling around him. The rushing gale seems but to fan the gleaming fire that lightens up his eye with demoniacal fury. He smiles as the vivid blaze robes in a sheet of flame the gloomy drapery of the sky, for it lights him to his prey; and answers with horrid curses the deep-toned voice that shakes the dark pavilion of the storm. His soul is warped from its native innocence—he delights in blood and carnage—the wail of his helpless victims softens not his heart—for demons have kindled the unholy fires of depraved, unlicensed passions, and the searing flames have withered the pure, the beautiful flowers of sympathy and love.

The heartless murderer steals noiselessly along the sylvan shades of the moon-lit dell. The leafy screen sways with sweet murmurings in the gentle breeze; the sweet-toned forest bird carols its untaught lays to Him who careth for the most minute work of his hands; glittering gems of heavenly lustre, send down their holy beams through the shadowy veil of night; but the silver rays pierce not the darker gloom that shrouds his wretched heart, and the thrilling harmonies of nature's lyres, are drowned in the fierce whisperings of revenge, or unhallowed gain.

Alas, for the miserable wretches that have strayed so far from wisdom's bowers. They are deceived by the lure of the syren—they have sought happiness in the path of unholy desires—and the fruit they have gained is bitterness and ashes. They have forsaken the pure fountain of peace—they stumble upon the dark mountains of error, and famish in the arid desert of wickedness, where no fresh water-springs send up the sparkling wave to cheer the perishing traveller; no soft, luxuriant verdure relieves the aching eye, or whispering grove invites to rest beneath its cooling shades; but burning wastes spread far on every side, and fiery serpents wreathe their horrid folds around the tortured heart. When shall they return, and learn the things that belong to their peace? Shall the spirit forever groan beneath the galling chains of iniquity? For there is no peace to the wicked, whatever may be said to the contrary. There is within the heart a monitor, whose voice, though hushed at times when the deluded soul is eagerly pursuing some fancied good, is often heard in the balmy hours of rest, when the innocent are enjoying the healing influence of nature's repose. What though the evening shades spread softly over the landscape, and the vesper lamp sends forth its silver rays from the fading West, imaging forth to the mind the eternal watchfulness of that Eye that never sleeps, the victim of sin is unmoved by the gorgeous splendors that once delighted his eyes. His soul perchance goes back on memory's car, to the green fields of his childhood, where in innocence he revelled among the scented bowers, and his merry voice joined with the notes of the greenwood warblers. Perchance, in the bitterness of his aching heart, he may say, "Had I been taught in childhood to restrain these fierce untoward passions of my nature, and the evils resulting from unsubdued anger pointed out to me, I might have escaped this labyrinth of crime and misery."

The azure dome bends softly over the mirrored wave, whose glassy surface gives back the myriad rays that stray from the far arches of the cerulean chambers, but the holy influence of the scene is lost upon the miserable outlaw, whose hand is red with the crimson stream of life. His brow is dark and lowering, and from his blood-shot eye the dews of sympathy are dried—peace, heavenly peace, is gone forever, and serpent-fangs are gnawing at his heart-strings. O that the knowledge of the Lord might increase, and cover the earth as the waters cover the face of the deep; that the purifying light of truth divine, might penetrate the dark cells of ignorance, and lead the erring sons of men back to the paths of righteousness and peace. When mankind shall deal aright, every man with his brother, then shall peace descend on golden pinions, and build her altar in every breast, and the heart shall leap in unison to the joyous melodies that swell on every breeze, and the sweet song of adoration from grateful souls, shall arise to the throne of God, the Creator and Redeemer of men.

"The soul that sinneth, it shall die."

What kind of death shall it die? Not a death of the body, because that is not mentioned. No, a death of the soul. Does the soul cease to exist? No, the soul is immortal. 1 Cor. xv: 53—"For this mortal must put on immortality." If every soul that sinneth must die, all men must die, for all have sinned. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all, for that all have sinned." But what kind of death was it that passed upon all? It was said unto him, "In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die." He actually died, that day, the very kind of death which was threatened as a penalty of the transgression. He died to his forever innocent and happy state, and became the heir of guilt and wo. And every soul that sinneth must die a similar death. JULIET.

EXTRACT FROM A SERMON.

BY REV. H. BELDING.

"Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? declare, if thou hast understanding. Who hath laid the measures thereof, if thou knowest? or who hath stretched the line upon it? Whereupon are the foundations thereof fastened? or who laid the corner-stone thereof; when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy?"

Job xxxviii: 4-7.

Let us now turn our attention to the latter clauses of our text, which are these—"when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." We have already taken into consideration the great work of creation. We have reflected upon God, as the establisher of the foundations of the earth, and as the being that laid the corner-stone thereof. But, while contemplating upon the sublimity of the design, and the vastness of the execution; while reflecting that none other than the hand of God could have fashioned—none but the voice of the Almighty, called into existence—let us not forget that all this was done for man, that he might have a habitation suited to his nature and his capacity; that he might have objects whereon to gaze—objects to excite in him feelings of reverence and awe, to direct his mind upward and onward to the great source and fountain of all life and all existence.

"The morning stars sang together." There is something truly sublime in the thought that even those twinkling luminaries that nightly cast their radiance over our globe, should join in the general song. And even at this late day, it would require no great stretch of thought, in the calm clear evening, when the heavens are stretched over our heads as a curtain, to imagine those bright orbs breaking forth in strains of joy. And how delightful the thought to the beholder! For once turn your eye upon that morning star, as it casts its clear and lucid light upon you: In its steady beam, behold a reflection of the purity of Him who created it, and planted it in yonder heaven!

But, we are informed, that in addition to the above, "all the sons of God shouted for joy." Without taking into the account the cause of this general rejoicing, there is something in the images presented to us, calculated to elevate our minds. Here, at one view, we have systems on systems, all the inhabitants of the upper world, and God, the mighty maker of them all! But after learning that the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy, we anxiously inquire, why is all this? Why this music among the stars of heaven, and why this shouting among the sons of God? We have already seen that all this was heard at the time of the establishment of the foundations of the earth, when its corner-stone was laid: and, as I have already hinted, it was in view of the earth, as the future habitation of man. But was this all? Was it in view of man, as a creature of earth only, that the sons of God shouted? No; the view must have extended still farther, and have taken in the life beyond the grave.

By the sons of God, we may understand pure spirits, such as dwell in the regions of bliss—bright seraphs that stand around the throne of God. These, then, looked down upon our world at the morn of its creation. And did they look along down the course of time, and see what we, in our day, have seen, and what our fathers have seen before us? Did they see, in prospect, the sin, the misery, and the wretchedness that has oftimes overspread the earth? Had they a view of the wars, the contentions, and the fightings that have ever been—and did they notice their accursed fruits? And was it, with these things in full view, that the heavenly host was heard to shout? Alas! to pure spirits, the world as it has been, and as it is now, would do any thing but awaken joy! Not that the world is so very bad to us that are accustomed to its ills; but to pure and beatified spirits, I think it must be any thing but a scene to awaken the song of rejoicing.

Upon what principle, then, must we account for the declaration in the text, "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy"? Shall we not rather say that all this was in view of what should be? Did not the heavenly host take a prospective view of what should be the final result of what they saw? It was among the counsels of God, that mankind, generally, should be erring beings; that while here, they should be held by the "bondage of corruption." And it was among the counsels of that same being, that they should be delivered from this condition; and this was to be effected through the instrumentality of Jesus Christ; and hence, at his birth we hear of an expression of joy similar to the one mentioned in our text—"a multitude of the heavenly host were praising God, and saying, glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men."

Upon a fair consideration of this part of our subject, we are led to the conclusion that the joy and rejoicing, as recorded in our text, was not called forth barely by a view of our earth alone, as it is, without taking into the account what should be the final result. The earth, as it is, with man upon it as its lord and governor, may excite wonder; but until we know the final issue, joy and rejoicing seems ill-timed. There is one view, and the only one which we can take, that will enable us to join in the song of the sons of God, and "shout for joy," as it was at the morn of creation—and this will cause us to join with the heavenly host in praising God, and saying, "glory to God in the highest." Such a view had the Revelator, when, with an eye fixed on things beyond mortality—with a prophetic ken that brought before him the scenes that were to be acted in eternity—he saw "every creature which is in heaven, and on earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them," and heard them saying, "blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, forever and ever." If this was the view that the sons of God had, well might they express their feelings in shouts of joy.

But let us reverse the picture, and suppose what a majority of people profess to believe, that when God laid the foundations of the earth, and placed man upon it, he planted the seeds of that endless misery and those eternal wailings which many expect to see and hear in the future world! If such was a part of the design that God had in view, when he set about the formation of our earth, why sang the morning stars? and why shouted the sons of God? Was it that they felt to mock at the future misery of men? And did they rejoice in prospect of woes unending? Think not that such was the design of God at that eventful period, or that such were the anticipations of the sons of God, when the morning stars sang together, and the universal shout rang through the arch of heaven.—Rather think, that when God created man and placed him in a world of wo, he decreed also the end of this wo; though he made provision for temporary evils, he designed they shoul be succeeded by glorious, universal, and unending good. If these were among the purposes of God, then would I say, sing on, ye stars of the morning, and sons of God shout, for the theme is worthy your celestial voices: let all the earth say, Amen.

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, AUGUST 5, 1838.

ROMANS XIV: 13-23.

A few weeks ago, we had the preceding paragraph of this chapter under consideration. We there found Paul bringing a charge of impropriety against the professors of Christianity, both Jewish and Gentile:—against the Jews, because they censured those of their Gentile brethren who made no distinction between meats and days; against the Gentiles, because they despised those of their Jewish brethren who held, as they thought, in superstitious reverence, the Mosaic distinctions of clean and unclean meats, of sacred and common days. The impropriety with which both parties were chargeable, consisted in their assuming the place of master to their brethren. It was only to their Master that they were accountable; therefore in judging one another, they were intruding into the office of Jesus—usurping the prerogative of Judge. While their opinions and practices might differ, both parties might be equally sincere and devoted in the service of their Lord; this, therefore, should make them lenient and candid in judging, or abstain from it entirely. Besides, as Jesus alone was the Lord of the consciences of his servants, Paul, with propriety, urges upon those who had herein offended, to offend no more, to judge no more one another.

Having animadverted upon the conduct of the more enlightened, as well as the weak in faith, in reference to the subjects upon which they held a difference of opinion, the apostle proceeds to point out a mode of conduct by which the dissenting parties might mutually benefit one another, instead of annoying each other, and promoting discord among brethren. While each party was at perfect liberty to serve Jesus as they would, and to hold what opinions they might conscientiously, relative to his will and requirements, yet for the sake of peace and mutual improvement, they ought to refrain from what was otherwise perfectly lawful. Because of the applicability of the apostle's counsel to ourselves, who profess to be, and who are, we trust, the more enlightened and liberal party among Christ's followers at the present day, we have reverted to this chapter, that we may derive from it an useful lesson, appropriate to our circumstances.

To the Gentile, or more liberal party in the church of Rome, Paul addresses this exhortation: "Ye who are strong, use not your liberty as to meats and days in such a manner as to lead him who is weak in faith, to do what his conscience does not approve. By doing so, you would cause your brother to fall, by your example, into the most grievous of sins and most cruel of punishments. For my own part, I am well assured that under the government of the Lord Jesus, there is nothing to be accounted unclean of itself; but, nevertheless, if any man think that any one kind of food is unclean, to him it is unsuitable while he entertains that opinion. Now, if before one who holds this opinion, you unnecessarily make a show or a boast of your more liberal notions, you give him cause of dislike, or tempt him, contrary to his conscience, to follow your example, or make him turn away from your society and return to Judaism—you, obviously, are not guided and regulated by feelings of love. Would you not sacrifice a portion of your own liberty or convenience for the sake of one for whom Christ sacrificed even his life? If so, then so behave yourselves to your weaker brethren, as not to have it said that you will not abate any of your liberty as to food and festivals, for the sake of conciliating them, and living at peace with them. Although you are free by the laws of Jesus, from the observance of the ancient institutions of Moses, yet it is not essential to display ostentatiously this freedom at all times; I will tell you a way whereby you can show your allegiance to the King of your adoption, much more than by indulging in the use of any of the creatures of God, or employing your time and days differently from your Jewish brethren. Even by acting towards all men, at all times, with the most stern uprightness, and with the most friendly and peaceable disposition, and by cultivating in yourselves those habits and dispositions which produce a cheerful self-satisfaction—a confiding, consoling, conscious harmony with the Supreme Spirit. These are the essential requirements of the new kingdom; and if you, by doing these things, show your devotion to Christ your Lord, your service is also acceptable to God, and such conduct will always be approved by worthy men, yea, by all men in their hearts."

Are not many among us, too apt to boast of their freedom from obligation to observe certain time-honored ceremonies, neglectful, meanwhile, of the prejudices of their weaker brethren, and of the more essential services by which their discipleship might be demonstrated, their Father's approbation secured, and the good of their brethren promoted! If so, may we not meditate with profit upon Paul's address to Christians in similar circumstances? We trust many of the readers of this paper will resort to Paul's own counsel contained in this chapter, and rise from the perusal of it, rejoicing sincerely in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made them free, yet at the same time, more firmly resolved than before, to make no vain, unnecessary, or offensive show of their liberty—to avoid all interference with the opinions of others, so as to produce feelings of irritation, or obtain compliances unauthorized by conscience—more firmly resolved to aim more at improvement in Christian virtue in ourselves and others, than at the propagation of any creed, or any set of opinions. May all such resolutions be successfully carried into execution. P. P.

WHO AID THE INFIDELS?

The following, from the pen of Br. Wadsworth, Editor of the Louisville Ky. Berean, will show at once that the Universalists are by far further from being infidels, than are Partialist brethren who so often charge us with being infidels. It presents the fact that Partialism is the armory from whence the infidels draw their weapons to fight the Bible. A. B. G.

On my passage down the Mississippi from upper Illinois to Troy, Mo., I spent the 29th of May more industriously in the way of argument than any former day of my life. On one side of me were the most rigid defenders of the doctrine of endless misery, with an Episcopal clergyman at their head; and on the other side were several deists, strongly prejudiced, and weilding the common place objections against the Bible. In the first place the skirmish began between the clergyman and one of the deists. The deist contended for the literal import of the English word hate, where our Saviour says, "except a man hate father and mother, etc., he can not be my disciple." It was contended on the contrary that our word hate expressed too much—that its import was only comparative, as shown by its parallels,—"whoso loveth father or mother etc., more than me, is not worthy of me." But the deist appealed to the Greek text, declaring that it would justify him. I stept to my saddle-bags, took out my Bible, Greek Testament, Lexicon, Concordance, etc., and laid them on the table round which the parties seated themselves, and our day's work commenced.—The result of the first rencontre was, that the deist was forced to yield his authority so far as the Greek text was concerned. A pitched battle now took place between the clergyman and the deist, when each betimes gained some advantage, and considerable tact was shown on both sides. But the clergyman labored under all the difficulties of the creeds, thereby giving his opponents all the advantages of reason and philosophy on his side, as also, all the force of ridicule and satire. His arguments were therefore as effectual against these Limitarian spectres, as were the cleanings of Don Quixote's blade among the wine skins. Sometimes when I saw that he had routed his opponent upon his nursery mysteries, and knew, as was almost invariably the case, that his arguments had no force against the Bible, but against sectarian dogmas that bar the doors of common sense against the reception of the Scriptures, I was constrained to disavow the premises of the clergyman, and thus wrest the weapon from the hand of the deist, and place the subject upon a new footing. Thus I was drawn into the controversy, having to vindicate the Bible against both of them, and prove that it taught no such unnatural measures, but that it was perfectly vindicated by the philosophy of nature. My greatest task with the deists was, to convince them that the absurdities against which their opposition was levelled, were not in the Scriptures. They had learned them from the sects. The contest with them, therefore, assumed a philosophical character, and the result was, that the violence of their prejudices were removed,—they said if they could understand the Scriptures in the light in which I did, they would readily accept them, and promised with these principles of interpretation in view, that they would candidly give the subject further investigation.—They were "almost persuaded to be Christians."

But my warfare was not to end here, for certain believers in endless misery, knowing that I was a Universalist, commenced a spirited attack against the doctrine. Some of them had sense enough to see the force of an argument, and were soon satisfied. The clergyman then buckled on his armor afresh, and with much show of confidence referred to the Greek terms hades and paradeiso, (Luke xxiii: 43,) contending that they signified the place of departed spirits, good and bad, and was divided into two departments, occupied by these two classes of conscious, immortal spirits.

Now came "the din of battle and the tug of war;" but it was soon over. He had asserted what he could by no means prove; and the strongest argument he offered was, the tradition of heathen nations, which they had no doubt derived from early revelations which are lost. I showed by the Scripture use, and by the definitions and interpretations of lexicographers and critics, that he was wholly unsupported, and he not only yielded the terms, but tried to disavow the positions he had taken. "Truth is mighty and will prevail."

Minutes of the St. Lawrence Association.

Met agreeably to adjournment, in Malone, Franklin county, June 27th and 28th, and chose Br. O. Wilcox, Moderator, and Br. Z. N. Ellis, Clerk; after which made the following appointments, and transacted the following business.

APPOINTMENTS.—Brs. Briggs, E. A Garfield, and M. L. Parlin, Committee on fellowship and ordination—M. Jennison, S. Hyde, and Dr. F. Parker, Committee of discipline—Briggs, E. A. Garfield (ministers), M. L. Parlin, and N. Parmeter, Jr. (laymen), delegates to the State Convention, with power to appoint substitutes—Wilcox, Briggs and Garfield, Committee to appoint three quarterly meetings during the ensuing year.

Adopted the report of the Committee of discipline for the last year—"no complaint."

Received the societies of Little York, and Hammond, St. Lawrence county, into fellowship.

Adjourned to meet in Potsdam on the fourth Wednesday and following Thursday in June, 1839.

Eight sermons were preached by Brs. Sias, Wilcox, Garfield and Briggs.

TO THE PUBLIC.

I have been told repeatedly within the last three months, that Rev. Mr. Quigby, a Methodist Clergyman, continues to express, in public and private, a willingness, and even a desire, to meet me again in oral debate on the grand point of difference between us in faith. I am writing this paragraph to correct the error, and place the matter before you in its true light. Since the debate at Brooklyn Centre, between Mr. Q. and myself, five letters have been exchanged by us in regard to another discussion, and in those written by Mr. Q. he has virtually expressed a determination to avoid all honorable controversy in future. After calling on me for a set of "Christian conditions," and receiving them at my hands, he says, "The rules of speaking shall be as long and often as we please." And again, "The point between us shall be future punishment." Now, it strikes me that these declarations indicate a disposition to avoid an honorable debate, for even the gentleman himself must be sensible that no discussion can be useful to the speaker or hearer, where both disputants are allowed to occupy all the time, or none of it, as they might feel moved by the impulse of the moment. The letters will be published verbatim, on both sides, if my friend desires it. J. WHITNEY.

MARK III: 28-30.

"Verily I say unto you, All sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men, and blasphemies wherewithsoever they shall blaspheme; but he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation: Because they said, He hath an unclean spirit."

A youthful correspondent requests an explanation of the foregoing passage; and although different explanations, agreeing in the main particulars, have often been given in former volumes of this paper, yet it is believed that our old subscribers will bear with us while we add another to their number, for the sake of the benefit our newer readers may derive from it.

To have a perfect view of the whole ground, the reader had better turn to, and carefully read the corresponding passages in Matt. xii: 22–38, and Luke xii: 8–12.

What was the sin against the holy spirit? The 30th verse of our text, and Matt. xii: 24–30, followed by the "wherefore I say unto you," etc., plainly shows that it consisted in ascribing the benevolent miracles of Jesus to demoniacal agency. Bear this in mind; for not only can no person who believes in Jesus as a Messenger from God, commit this sin; but, also, no person can commit it, who has not witnessed the miracles thus ascribed to an evil agency.

What is meant by forgiveness? The original words for forgive, forgiveness, etc., bear the idea of to dismiss, to send away, and are never applied to punishment, but always to sin, in the Scriptures; as any one may see by taking a Concordance and examining all the passages where these words occur.

What is meant by "hath never forgiveness"—"is in danger of eternal damnation"—and "shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come"? The first phrase is, literally, "hath not forgiveness to the aion" in the original. In the second phrase, the word "eternal," is aionion. In the third phrase, the word rendered world, is not kosmos, the proper word for this material globe, nor yet aikemene, the proper word for the inhabited world, but aion, lifetime, age, dispensation, indefinite time whether of longer or shorter duration. When applied to things by nature endless, it may mean eternity; but that such can not be its meaning in the case before us, is evident from the fact that "neither in this eternity, neither in the eternity to come," would be nonsense—for there is but one eternity, and that is without an end or a successor. If the word "world" is taken for an ending period, then the second named "world" has an end as well as the first; and that the first named has an end, is evident from the very language used by the Saviour. The sin of these Jews, then, would not be dismissed, or sent away from them, to the age—they would be in danger of damnation for an indefinite duration—they would not be released from it in that age nor in that which was to come.

Why would they not be forgiven? The nature of the case explains the rationality of the Saviour's declaration. The miracles of Jesus, so benevolent, so consistent with his pretensions, so openly and fully performed before them—were the highest evidence that could be afforded of his claimed divine authority. These being rejected on such unreasonable grounds, and with such a malicious spirit, there remained for these Pharisees no other remedy for sin—there was no other evidence by which to convert them to Christianity, and so save them from opposition to the Gospel. Hence they were greatly in danger of the damnation which fell on their nation, and remains on it to this day, and they remained unforgiven—unreleased from sin, to the age—during the age of the Jewish dispensation and during the age of the apostles, after it.

But will they endlessly remain opposed to the Gospel—under this sin? Such a doctrine is not declared in the text. Unless this sin is in its very nature endless the words used to express its duration can not by any fair principle of interpretation, be supposed to teach its endless duration. That this sin is not in its nature endless, is evident from the phraseology of Matt. xii: 31, 32, which declares that all manner of sins and blasphemies shall be forgiven, and only excepts the sin against the holy spirit for two certain periods of duration, out of that general forgiveness; thus evidently implying that, then, this particular sin shall also be forgiven. This construction also agrees with the declaration that "the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin"—while the Partialist view of our text, positively contradicts the universal efficacy of the blood of Jesus, by declaring that it does not cleanse from the sin against the holy spirit!

Finally—the text, literally and strictly construed, proves positively that all sins and blasphemies shall be forgiven unto men; while it does not prove that the single sin against the holy spirit, which was committed by a few Pharisees 1800 years ago, will be punished endlessly—but only for a time! And even if it did prove the endless misery of these few Pharisees, it positively and unqualifiedly proves the ultimately forgiveness of all other sinners in the universe of God. Are our Partialist brethren ready to submit to this plain teaching of the text? If not, they had better not quote it so much in disproof of Universalism!

But that the endless misery of these few Pharisees can not be believed in, without a direct contradiction of other passages of Holy Writ, will be rendered evident to every candid mind, by perusing Romans xi: 25-36; and also, 1 Cor. xv: 21-28, which clearly teaches that God is the only being in the universe who will not be subdued to Jesus, and that Jesus, and all his subjects, will be the subjects of God, who will then be all that is in all. Where, then, will be opposition to Jesus, his Gospel, and his miracles of goodness and mercy? Where, then, will there be room in any one for sin or suffering? A. B. G.

THE PSALMS.

The beautiful spirit of devotion which breathes through the Psalms, sufficiently proves their divine inspiration. Would the Christian find language in which to express the emotions that glow or struggle at his heart?—let him search this portion of the Scriptures. Is he filled with a sense of the greatness and the power of the Deity from the creations which he sees around him?—he may exclaim, "The heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament sheweth forth his handy work!" Does he witness the loving kindness of the Maker to his creatures?—and these are the words in which his heart may utter its convictions—"The Lord is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works!" Is he convinced of and penitent for sin?—let him read and adopt the expressions of the fifty-first Psalm!

But why should I multiply examples? Let the doubting—the despairing—the contrite—the devout—go to this spring of sacred purity, and drink and live.

Clothing the aspirations of piety with lofty poetry, the Psalms have been found fitting mediums, when combined with the thrilling power of music, for the utterance of the soul's devotion in public or private worship. They furnish themes for the swelling anthem and the triumphant song of jubilee. Their language peals, in its solemn grandeur, through the deep melody of a dirge, or wails in the outpourings of the afflicted spirit. Their cheering strains, mount up and exult in the hymn of hope, or their expressions breathe softly in the language of the reconciled and the penitent. No wonder, then, that they are heard in our temples and places of worship—by our family altars and in our closets. Over the bosom of the vast sea, when it sleeps with its star-beams, or rests from the tumult of the storm—in the dim cell, the lowly hut, the lofty palace—where "the mountain Christian" rears his rude shrine in "upper air," or the weary pilgrim rests by the forest streamlet—no wonder that in all these situations, and by all the hill sides, and in all the valleys of our land, in every place and under all circumstances, no wonder that the strains of David are among the offerings of worship.

This devotional spirit of the Psalms, I say, then, is sufficient evidence for their Divine inspiration. I would impress this truth upon you, reader. At the age in which they were written, can we suppose that unaided human intellect could have produced them? Is it supposable that this could have accomplished such a work in any age, much less in the time of their appearance? Man now may, with ideas derived from them, produce exalted and beautiful poetry, but from whence gushed the fountain, "the streams whereof make glad the city of God," and light up "the wilderness and the solitary place"?

The writer's acquaintance with literature is by no means extensive, and yet, he ventures to say, that you will find the poetry of the Psalms superior to any other of any age of the world. Now, we have been considering their exalted and varied devotional spirit, and when we add to that their high poetic excellence, when we remember, withal, the early period of their production, can we, I ask, conceive them to be of mere human origin? I grant, that in unenlightened lands there may be outbreakings of poetry, for it is a natural language of the heart. I grant that beautiful expressions may be blended with the literature of the East, that the Indian may utter strains of lofty and kindling sentiment; but when I see a continued stream of eloquence—the sweetest and the sublimest—blending with deep piety and teachings of the most dignified and pure character, adapted to all situations and circumstances, I can but think such a production inspired by Him, who, for all time and all lands, made the sun to rule the day and the moon or the stars the night. JOHN V: 28, 29.

"Marvel not at this; for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation."

The inquiry made of us concerning this passage is not, what we suppose it means, (for the writer seems well acquainted with that already,) but how we reconcile one of our reasons for our opinion, with other circumstances. But hear the inquirer speak for himself.

"To the Conductors of the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate.

"Gentlemen—Will you oblige an inquirer by attempting to remove an obstacle which seems to block up the path of consistency, allowing the system of universal salvation to be true? As far as I am acquainted, the exposition given of John v: 28, 29, by preachers of your order, does not appear to correspond with the explanations which they give of other passages found in the writings of the other Evangelists.

"Most of the passages found in Matthew, Mark and Luke, which are brought forward by a majority of the Christian world to prove future eternal punishment, are supposed by people of your order to have had their fulfilment more than 1800 years ago [About A. D. 70, Ed.]; having particular allusion to the destruction of the Jewish nation, etc., etc. To justify yourselves in such explanations, you generally refer us to John, and contend that he lived and wrote his Gospel after the destruction of Jerusalem, and affirm that the reasons why he omits the awful denunciations of our Lord, recorded by the other Evangelists, was, that they had already had their fulfilment, and that it would be superfluous for him to record prophecies having allusion to events which had already transpired.

"Now, allowing all this to be true, where is the consistency or propriety of explaining John v: 28, 29, as generally explained by Universalists? As far as I am acquainted, your people contend that the above passages have no allusion to any thing yet future; and is it not possible that you have been induced to overlook or swallow (what appears to me to be) a great inconsistency to avoid a certain conclusion?

"May I hope to hear from you on this subject through your paper? I am for 'truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.' Yours truly, INQUIRER."

When I commenced inquiring my "way to Zion's hill," some fifteen or sixteen years ago, my path was blocked up for a time by the same difficulty—but as my eyes opened more and more, and the light of truth shone more brightly and clearly on my way, I found that the supposed mountain blocking up the road, was merely a fog bank! I trust to show to Inquirer that it needs neither climbing over, creeping under, nor squeezing around it—but simply walking through it; for having done so, myself, I know that it is but a mist, or the shadow of a mist. Passing by some slight errors in his letter, I proceed directly to the main subject.

Why do we believe that our text treats only of a great moral resurrection in this state of existence? 1st. Because a precisely similar resurrection, named in Daniel xii: 1, 2, is declared by Jesus, himself, to have its fulfilment in the destruction of Jerusalem, and its accompanying events. See Matt. xxiv: particularly verses 15, 21 and 34. 2d. Because the very contexts of both passages (in Daniel and John), show that such a moral resurrection in this life was there spoken of. See Dan. xi, and xii: 1; and John v: 21-27. 3d. Because a precisely similar resurrection in Ezekiel xxxvii: 11-14, is declared to be fulfilled in a period of Jewish history very similar to the deliverance of a part and a condemnation (or damnation) of the other part of the Jewish people, at the dissolution of the Mosaic and the establishment of the Christian dispensation. See the whole of the xxxvii chapter of Ezekiel. 4th. Because in all places where the resurrection to immortality is spoken of, its description differs from the description in our text in the following particulars—(1.) All the dead are spoken of; here, only those that are in the graves, excluding millions in the sea, and the unburied. Hades is the general receptacle of all the dead, whether buried or unburied, but here the word is graves, (in the original, mnemeiois,) places especially made for regular honorable burial. (2.) The general resurrection is particularly described to be to immortality; here it is not so described. (3.) No distinction is made between those that are raised—all are made alive in Christ—all are clothed in honor, glory, power, incorruptibility and immortality—all are to be as the angels of God in heaven; but here a distinction is made, and no portion is said to be clothed in such attributes of the spiritual state, or to become as the angels of God in heaven. That the mere term "life," or even "eternal life," is not equivalent to immortality conjoined with incorruptibility, honor, glory, and power, is evident from John v: 24, 25, where it is applied to those then living on earth, who had received the Gospel in earthly vessels.

Here, then, are four important reasons; (the last embracing three important subdivisions,) for believing our text to apply only to a moral resurrection in time, while not one reason equivalent to any one of these, can be given for believing that it treats of a resurrection in eternity. This much I deemed necessary to show (as briefly as possible) to our readers generally, that Inquirer's difficulty in no wise touches our principal reasons for understanding the passage as we do; and, consequently, that even if we were utterly unable to answer his question, still that question could not weigh one grain against our construction of the passage before us.

But does it not weigh against our construction of the passages he refers to in Matthew, Mark and Luke?—We think not, and will proceed to show why we thinks o.

The only point of doctrine in which we adduce John's silence as testimony in our favor, as far as my knowledge and memory serve me, is in our views of gehenna, the only word in the Bible claimed by the most respectable Partialist Commentators, as meaning an absolutely endless place of misery in the eternal state. It occurs twelve times in the New Testament, and is always named to Jews, and Jews only. Primitively it meant the valley of Hinnom—but it is used by Isaiah and Jeremiah, prophetically, to designate the miseries and horrors connected with the destruction of Jerusalem. In this sense, we contend, it was used by our Saviour, who referred to, and quoted the Old Testament writers in most cases when he spoke of gehenna punishment and fire. Among a number of other proofs, we show that gehenna was never used in reference to a future state of existence, in Jewish writings, till long after our Saviour's death, and that, consequently, it is not probable that Jesus used it in any sense different from its general acceptation—its usage in the sacred writings of the Jews.—If he had done so, we contend he would have given some notice, that he used the word in a sense so different from that in which it had been used by the teachers sent from God, who preceded him. We also show, by the contexts and attending circumstances, in many cases where Jesus uses gehenna, that he did apply it only as Jeremiah used it before him. Such are the principal arguments, by which, together with the total absence of proof on the other side of the question, we sustain our views. And it is only as a corroborative evidence that we refer to the entire omission of John to record any of the discourses of Jesus in which this word occurs, and argue from thence, that as John's Gospel was not written until after these discourses were completely fulfilled, (if our views thereof are correct) it is probable that he omitted the word on that account. We argue further, that if gehenna is really and truly the name, and the only name for a proper place of endless misery, this apostle was not faithful in omitting it from his record—but that if our views of its meaning are correct, his omission of it was natural, not improper, and easily to be accounted for by the circumstances above named.

From these facts, which we have named thus briefly for the satisfaction of the general reader, it will be seen that the omission of gehenna by John, is not our only reason—nor even one of our most important reasons—for believing as we do. Consequently, even admitting the full force of Inquirer's objection, it weighs but little, if any, against our views on this subject.

I have been compelled by the nature of the case, to dwell longer on these preliminary remarks than may be pleasant to Inquirer, or even to our readers generally. But his query is an important one—the objection it involves, is a very general one, and one that I never saw publicly answered, if my memory is correct—and I have deemed it best thus to remove all difficulties in the way of answering it as clearly possible. If I am correct in the facts and arguments here stated, the mere fact that John omits the word gehenna, is but a minor argument in favor of our views, while it is a very weighty argument against its meaning a place of endless misery. And, on the other hand, his naming the resurrection from the graves to life and to condemnation, is no argument against our views of the passage heading this article, while our reasons for our views the passage, are independent of the reasons we give for his omission of gehenna. The only question, then, that remains to be answered, is—If John v: 28. 29, had already been fulfilled at the time John wrote his Gospel, wherein is the propriety of his recording it? This question I will now proceed to answer.

1st. Even admitting that the passage in question had been completely fulfilled, it would have been very proper for John to have recorded it, because none of the other Evangelists had given it a place in their records. If John had not recorded it, it would have been lost—the world had never known of this particular prophecy. Probably for similar reasons, John has recorded the miracle at the marriage feast in Cana—the discourse with Nicodemus in attestation of the declaration just preceding it, that Jesus "knew what was in man"—the conversation with the Samaritan woman at Jacob's well—the restoration of the nobleman's sick child, and of the impotent man at the pool of Bethesda, and of the man born blind—the raising of Lazarus from the dead, and various other particulars, proofs of the divine mission of Jesus which had been omitted by the Evangelists who wrote before John wrote his Gospel.

2d. But our text had not been completely fulfilled at the time John wrote his Gospel. Gehenna damnation, and gehenna fire, relating only to the destruction of Jerusalem, and its immediately attending horrors; was, as it were, a completely past event. Having reference only to the Jews as a nation, it was of no practical use to mention it after the Jews had ceased to exist as a nation.—But the resurrection to life was still going on—yes, going forward more rapidly, at the time John wrote his Gospel, than it ever did before or since that period.—Then the nations of the earth were awakened in the graves by the wonderful events that had just taken place among the Jews—then these Jews were wonderfully scattered abroad among all nations, and this event opened the eyes of the people every where to the fulfilment of the prophecies of Jesus and his followers—and then being convinced thereby, they entered into the life of the Gospel dispensation, long after the Jews had awaked to shame and everlasting contempt. A. B. G.

We give the following proposals a place in our columns, and consent to act as therein required, at the request of the esteemed brethren who have signed the same; but deem it due to ourselves to say, that in thus consenting, we assume no responsibility for the plan itself, or for the consequences resulting from it. For one, I have no confidence in the plan, itself, however much I may have in those engaged in it. I do not believe it practicable, unless they can vest power sufficient somewhere, to prevent settlers from changing their religious views, from intermarrying with Partialists, from selling their lands to those who are not Universalists, or those who may be born and reared in the colony, from doing these things. But as there are those who are older and more experienced than myself, engaged in it, I am perfectly willing that a trial should be made by those who desire it; and so far as above expressed, but no farther, I am willing to aid in making that trial. UNIVERSALIST WESTERN EMIGRATION SOCIETY.

Whereas, it is believed that much good, both temporally and morally, would result from the formation of a Universalist society for the purpose of emigration to the West, and the purchase and settlement of a township exclusively by Universalists, it is therefore proposed—

1. That all who are willing to unite in this object, send in their names to the Magazine and Advocate, within three months from the publication of this article, together with their place of residence, and the amount of funds they will invest. And Brs. Grosh and Hutchinson are hereby respectfully requested to insert this article, and to preserve the names sent in at or near the close of the three months, to insert them also.

2. That those who unite in this object, furnish themselves with certificates of good moral character, from the societies to which they belong, or from respectable individuals in their vicinity, to be presented at the organization of the proposed society.

3. That when the names of a sufficient number of individuals to purchase a township, shall have been sent in, there be a meeting of the same at some central place, to organize the society, adopt an appropriate constitution, and to perform all other business that may be necessary to promote the object in view.

For the information of such as may be interested in the formation of this society, it may be well to remark, that the object contemplated, is the enjoyment of greater religious privileges than can now be enjoyed by our friends who emigrate to to the West. As the case now is, our friends are scattered all over the Western country, and are neither in a condition to enjoy fully the benefits of their religion, nor to extend them to others. But in the plan proposed, it is believed that both these objects will be admirably secured. Hence it will be expected, that as soon as possible after the settlement commences, a house for public worship will be erected, and stated preaching sustained.

And among other advantages, (not the least,) the community at large will be furnished with an opportunity of witnessing the effects of Universalism, when so much of it is brought together, and the opposite excluded.

To such of our friends as are expecting soon to emigrate to the West, we recommend the proposed plan for their serious consideration. And we request those who may be acquainted with a good location for the society, to give us information of the same. Communications may be directed to either of the following persons:—W. E. Manley, Warsaw; or James H. Bolton, Perry, Genesee county; or to I. D. Shuart, Portageville, Allegany county, N. Y.

MINUTES

Of the proceedings of the Allegany Association—for 1838.

Met in Centreville, June 27th and 28th, and chose Brs. S. Adams, Moderator, and T. P. Abell, Clerk—after which transacted the business, and made the appointments following.

Invited brethren present from various societies in the Association, to act as members of the Council. Adopted the report of the Committee of discipline—"no complaint."—Voted, That the Constitution of this Association shall hereafter recognize a Standing Committee on fellowship and ordination, to whom all requests for letters and ordination shall be made three months before the regular session of this body.—Voted, That Brs. J. Todd and L. Vinton appoint three Conferences within the year ensuing, within the bounds of this Association. Voted, To recommend the several societies in this Association to take up a collection previous to our annual session, to defray the expences of the ministerial attendance thereon; and that Brs. Todd and Babcock be a committee to see it carried into effect.

Resolved, (1.) That we earnestly recommend to our brethren every where, and particularly to those in this Association, the adoption of a church covenant and constitution which shall recognize the observance of the ordinances and all duties pertaining to the Christian system, that those who deem them important may be privileged with their beneficial influence. (2.) That we seriously recommend to our brethren, and especially to those of this Association, the establishment of Sunday schools, Bible classes and Conference meetings for the purpose of directing the minds of youth to the great subject of religion and thus cultivate the social and religious feelings among them.—(3.) That we will, as far as practicable, endeavor to carry into effect the spirit of the above resolutions; and that we will immediately enter upon the work of persuading as many of our brethren as possible, to take upon them the obligations recognized therein.

Appointments.—Brs. Lewis, Todd, O. Pell, and N. Bingham, Committee on public services, Morton, Todd, and Babcock, Commitee on fellowship and ordination. Todd, L. Vinton, Ellicottville, and A. Adams, Pike, Committee of discipline. Lewis Graves, Pike, Standing Clerk. J. Babcock, J. Todd, L. Vinton, and A. Adams, delegates to the next State Convention, with power to appoint substitutes. J. Babcock to preach the next annual sermon, with power to appoint a substitute. T. P. Abell to prepare Minutes, and publish in the Magazine and Advocate, and Universalist Union.

Adjourned to meet in Rushford, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday in June, 1839.

Sermons were preached by Brs. N. Brown, Kelsey, W. Andrews, Wisner, Barnes, N. Sawyer, Manley, and Tomlinson, assisted in the services by Brs. Babcock and Abell.

MINISTERS PRESENT.

C. Morton, Conewango; S. Adams, Carrol; J. Lewis, Boston; R. Tomlinson, Ridgeway; J. Todd, Ellicottville; J. Babcock, Hume; W. E. Manley, Warsaw; W. Andrews, Wolcott; L. Paine, Panama; M. L. Wisner, Bath; N. Sawyer, Medina A. Kelsey, Pavilion; N. Brown, Henrietta; S. Barnes, Salina; T. P. Abell, Rochester.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst., by Br. E. E. Guild, in Harpersfield, at 11 A. M., and in the stone school-house at 4 P. M.—Br. Grosh in Oppenheim, (will be at Johnsville on Saturday)—Br. Doolittle, in Oxford—Br. W. Martin, in Phœnix, Oswego county—Br. Bullard in the village of Palmer, St. Clair county, Mich—Br. Biddlecom, at Sullivan, and at Canastota, at 5 P. M.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. E. E. Guild, in Jacksonboro', at 10 A. M., and in the Academy in Worcester, at 3 P. M.—Br. Bullard, in Port Huron, St. Clair county, Mich.

A general Conference will be held in Gainesville, instead of Warsaw, for want of a house in the latter place, on the third Wednesday and Thursday 15th and 16th inst. Ministering brethren, and all others, are invited to attend.

POETRY.

From the Olive Branch.

"WHO IS MY NEIGHBOR."

THY NEIGHBOR? It is he whom thou
Hast power to aid and bless—
Whose aching heart or burning brow
Thy soothing hand may press.

THY NEIGHBOR? 'Tis the fainting poor,
Whose eye with want is dim—
Whom hunger sends from door to door—
Go thou and succor him.

THY NEIGHBOR? 'Tis that weary man,
Whose years are at their brim,
But low with sickness, care and pain—
Go thou and comfort him.

THY NEIGHBOR? 'Tis the heart bereft
Of every earthly gem;
Widow and orphan, helpless left—
Go thou and shelter them.

THY NEIGHBOR? Yonder toiling slave,
Fettered in thought and limb—
Whose hopes are all beyond the grave—
Go thou and ransom him.

Where'er thou meet'st a human form
Less favored than thy own,
Remember 'tis thy neighbor worm,
Thy brother or thy son.

Oh, pass not, pass not heedless by,
Perhaps thou canst redeem
The breaking heart from misery—
Go, share thy lot with him.

ORATION

Delivered in the Independent church, Richmond, Va., July 4th, 1838.

BY REV. E. H. CHAPIN.

[We copy from the Richmond Compiler, of the 17th of July, the following extracts from the Oration delivered by our young and eloquent Associate, and regret that the limits of our sheet will not permit us to publish it entire. The following abstract may serve to give an idea of the parts omitted. After a brief, modest yet dignified allusion to himself, and the difficulty of offering any thing new on the subject, he proceeds to the reasons for publicly celebrating the day. It relaxes the stricture of narrow party feelings, and abates the heat of political animosities, and purifies and enlarges our patriotism by the communion. It dissipates the weariness of drudging toil in pursuit of wealth, abolishes the distinctions created by various pursuits and conditions, and strengthens our love of country and of freedom.—It assembles all classes, ages and conditions together, and discloses to them our relationship and dependence on each other, and rivets closer the many bonds that bind us together and make us mighty. Another reason for celebrating the day, is the deeper impression to be made on the mind of youth. From which follows the conclusion on this part of his subject copied below.

A. B. G.]

No further reasons need be offered fellow-citizens, for the celebration of this day. If our principles of political action are purified—if patriotism is enlivened and preserved—if national affections are warmed and expanded—if childhood learns to love the land of its birth—these are sufficient motives for holding in distinguished remembrance and in perpetual commemoration, the Fourth of July.

But there are two things which I would urge upon your attention. I would earnestly advise to lay aside upon this day, all religious and political differences. Unless this be done, some of the very reasons which have been presented for celebrating this anniversary will be destroyed. Party politics should not intrude upon a time like this. The recollections of the hour are recollections of harmony and unity in one great cause; let us not alloy their sweetness, with strife and acrimony. We are to speak of one common theme—to rejoice in one triumph—to cherish one spirit. Let us not rive asunder and trample the ties which we should strengthen!—Let us not kindle the fires of faction upon the very altar of liberty! And let not our religious opinions separate us. Christians, in reference to this anniversary, surely can agree in one congregation! They can all offer up praises and thanksgiving for the mercies of the past—they can all invoke the blessings of God upon their country, and His guidance and protection for it in all its future course. Let us come together then, and offer these tributes of gratitude—together let us invoke these good gifts—as brethren of one nation—as children of one heavenly Father!

Secondly, in regard to the observance of the day, I would remark—let each one be guided honestly and unwaveringly by his own conscience; and as his conscience dictates, so let him act in demonstrating the feelings of his heart upon the occasion. But let not the memory of the deed which we would honor, be degraded by profane orgies or bacchanalian revels. Let not the time which is set apart for lofty purposes, be perverted into channels of licentiousness and sin. This appeal I am sure, will find a corresponding sentiment in the bosom of every friend of sound morals, of every lover of his country's reputation! The signing of the declaration of independence, was an exhibition of the dignity of human nature; let not the successors of those good and true men, dishonor them by exposing its weakness and its folly.

Thus, laying aside all differences, acting in accordance with the moral and civil law, striving to cherish pure and liberal principles, let us celebrate the Anniversary of Freedom. In such manner let it be held in perpetual remembrance.

Having said this much of the day, we will pass to the consideration of other topics.

Your speaker has neither time nor ability, to descant upon the circumstances of the signing of the declaration of independence. The immediate causes of the act, are clearly and emphatically set forth in the instrument itself, and are well known to Americans. To the superficial inquirer, it would appear that a course of stern tyranny, a burdensome taxation, a succession of grievances falling fast and heavy, forced as it were, our ancestors to sudden contest and unexpected rupture.—We say unexpected, for although English writers accused them of secretly cherishing the idea of freedom from the control of the British government, yet facts render it improbable that a large or associated number of colonies, cherished such a design for any great length of time.* To the hasty student of history, then—one not accustomed to philosophise—this splendid action may appear to have been elicited by the deep injuries of the time. And, doubtlessly, these did produce and nourish the idea of independence. They may be very properly called the immediate causes of the revolution. But we deem them not the only causes. He who looks upon the vast system of cause and effect as being primarily moved by the hand of an all-wise God, will, we think, discover far in preceding ages, the agents which helped to accomplish this great work. The philosophic eye, indeed, traces the occurrences of time, through light and shade, in one unbroken stream, from the period when it burst forth at the song of "the morning star" and the shouting of "the sons of God," down to the present hour. But, as having a direct influence upon this act—following—in each other in brilliant and rapid succession—we think events may be observed, much older in their date than perhaps is commonly supposed.

We would say it, that in the dispensation of Providence, the time for this light had fully come and it broke upon the nations. Let us see.

"When the Goth, the Vandal, and the long-haired warrior of Clouis," had swept the pride of the Roman from the earth—when their iron might had seized upon broad lands, which the pomp of his eagles had shadowed and the tread of his legions shaken—when the stern rigor of the Feudal system held down the grades of society link by link, from the king to the serf—when superstition and ignorance had stagnated morals and intellect—there fell a darkness and desolation upon Europe. Amid this gloom, had there been one vested with prophetic power, in the pictured vision of the future, he would probably have beheld causes operating which finally produced the declaration of independence.

As the night melted into misty dawn, he would have beheld old manuscripts dragged to the light of day and the eye of the scholar. He would have seen an intellectual energy starting as from the tomb, and schools and universities springing up here and there in the land.—He would have discovered literature reviving with an Abelard, and perfecting with a Petrarch and a Dante. And this vision with the banner, lance and plume of chivalry blended in the distance, would have been the gray morning of which knowledge was the day-star.

Again, as he surveyed the field of coming events, he would have observed the same principle which brightened upon them in the darkness, operating more powerfully still. He would have discovered the common people, rising from an ignominious servitude to a more equal station. He would have seen the adventurer's bark, with the aid of the mariner's compass, ploughing through trackless seas and stranding upon the shores of a new world! He would have seen the PRESS, thundering in its power, spreading knowledge abroad upon the wings of the wind. And yet more, as the clouds parted and light after light came gushing in, he would have heard the Boanerges of the Reformation, lifting up their voices against hoary iniquity and ancient abominations in high places. And as the mass of the people began to think and act for themselves—as the cry "Freedom of Inquiry!" pealed up to the heavens, this would have been the glorious sunrise!

As he extended his prophet view still further, he would have beheld the licentious and obstinate monarch of one of the proudest realms of the time, throwing off, from very self-will, the yoke of ecclesiastical domination and a new order of things rising up among his people. He would have seen that morning sun tarnished by the smoke of the faggot and the stake, and the earth drenched with the blood of a nation convulsed and warring with itself. Still would he have beheld the mighty principle at work beneath the cloud, and he would have perceived a band of stern and severe men, rejecting the temptations of the time, and hardening for the hour of trial. Anon, he would have beheld them leaving their native shore, crossing the great waters, landing upon an ice bound coast, rearing their first altar upon the rock, their first temple in the wilderness! He would have seen them increasing and spreading here and there—gradually becoming one with countrymen who had left their homes before them, and settled in a milder portion of this new world; he would have traced this one great colony amid labors and perils—warring with the fierce savage, through the pathless forest, over the rushing stream, in the warm blood of their kindred—still clinging with strong love to the land of their father's grave—still ready to defend its honor, to obey its righteous laws—still holding on faithfully, to their loyalty—until oppressed, threatened, insulted, trampled, the principle awoke within them and in the face of hazard and of death, they signed the immortal charter! And as an indignant people rose up in their might—as their shackles fell from around them—as their weapons glittered to the sunlight, this would have been his closing vision, the blaze of the noon tide!

In this brief manner, we have endeavored to follow actual prominent events, from the revival of intellect in the middle ages, down to the deed which we commemorate. We may derive a lesson deeply important from the survey. We may learn how long and arduous has been the struggle for liberty, and how dearly purchased it was at last. And impressed with the preciousness of the boon which our sires have bequeathed us, we shall learn to prize it higher and to guard it with a watchful eye. Aye, to guard it. The durability of our freedom is yet problematical. Who will say, looking at the past, that the great event which we celebrate, and its results thus far, are not links in the chain of Omnipotent design? And remembering the convulsions and the changes which have hitherto taken place, who shall say that our liberties will endure forever. God worketh by means, and means must we use to preserve our freedom, or all the strength and prosperity of the present hour will not prevent our fall.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

No. 31.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.

Utica, August 9, 1838.

DEAR SIR—I shall now (having fully and scripturally proved my fourth proposition) return to the review of your 24th and 26th letters. (The reader will please re-examine them.) These letters are an anomaly in an anomalous series of indignant and contemptuous letters. You have here given an extra touch to your former gasconade, pedantry, abuse, and effrontery. In defiance of all the rules of courtesy and decorum, you have departed from your address directly to myself, and appealing to the worst prejudices of your readers, have deliberately set yourself to reproaching and insulting me personally, the views I entertain, and the Christian denomination to which I belong.—You have unblushingly compared yourself to Michael, the Archangel, and me to Satan. You have no less than five or six times travelled directly out of your way, for the sake of ranking me and those of my faith with deists, atheists, infidels, mammonites, etc., and our views with theirs.

2. You pretend that it is "most repugnant to your feelings," and with great "reluctance" that you have pursued such a course in this controversy, and yet almost your entire letters breathe a spirit of deep bitterness and indignant contempt, of disappointed ambition and mortified pride. An opinion which I hold, but which has nothing to do with this discussion, and which you neither can, nor attempt to refute by argument, you have nine times introduced in these two letters, in every distorted form, and attempted to ridicule and reproach as the doctrine of purgatory, a name which neither myself nor any other enlightened person, ever gives it. Your leaving my address, and attempting to apologize to your readers for such a course, evinces that you have been severely lectured by your best friends, for the manner of your conducting this discussion, and that they are greatly dissatisfied therewith. How far your additional abuse and insults to me and my opinions, will tend to satisfy and pacify them towards you, I know not; but I altogether mistake their intelligence if it does not still further disgust and mortify them.

3. You have wounded yourself far more than me, and mortified and grieved your own friends far more than mine. The truth is, this is not a Papal country: for though your bulls might silence a few of your friends, (for instance, those like Spencer, who began this discussion,) they can not, with equal facility, silence all of them. They will think, and by and by they will speak. It is for your sake, therefore, and the reputation of this discussion, generally, that I regret the ungentlemanly and unchristian course you pursue. In your 24th letter, you attempt to play off your old game of sophistry, misrepresentation, and ridicule. You persist in maintaining that sempiternus is not a compound but a simple word, and say that I attempt "to find in aeternus a root and reason for ternus in sempiternus." This is false. I never attempted nor pretended any such thing. I said sempiternus was a compound from semper, always, and aeternus, [not ternus merely,] and though Lexicons generally do not mention it as a compound, it being so plain that a tyro, a child, would know it, yet I have the highest authority for the assertion. Dumesnil, in his "Latin Synonyms," than whom no scholar of the present day will ask higher authority, gives the following as the roots and definition of the word: "SEMPITERNUS (semper æternus) enlarges upon the idea of aeternus." And yet you attempt to lampoon me for agreeing with this eminent critic. Will you "call the devil a saint," now you are proved to be so great "a scholar and a critic?"

4. What you say of Kneeland, may go for what it is worth. But you have not impeached, and can not impeach the reputation of Scarlett and Creighton, whose work was highly commended by the most eminent literati of their day. It is useless to say more on aperantos: for in either derivation, the reader must perceive it is quite as applicable to time as to space. You say I give myself for authority that aidios is compounded of aei and dios. I have your own authority for saying aei forms a part of the word; and I have four Greek letters maintaining their unaltered position in proof that dios forms the other part. Suppose, Sir, a man affirms that the English compound ever-during, is composed of ever and during. You demand his authority from some Lexicon: he tells you that is unnecessary, for the statement is so obviously true as to need no proof, as a self-evident truth admits of none. You then go to ridiculing him for giving himself as authority! The same may be said of the words archbishop, archdeacon, and hundreds of other words in our and all languages. Instead of answering the questions in my 23d letter, relative to the use and meaning of the letters d i in the middle syllable of aidios, in your June number of the Harbinger you reprint them, and change (apparently on purpose) the d i into a i, (the two first letters,) and then leave them to the contempt of your readers!

5. But, Sir, the composition of aidios is a matter of small moment with me, though you talk as if the whole controversy depended on it. It is only one of ten words adduced by me in proof of the third proposition. I can very well spare it. I do not need it. The proposition is abundantly sustained without it, even by your own concession relative to the meaning of five of the other words, and Hedericus' definition of a sixth, (athanatos, defined immortalis, sempiternus, aeternus, perpetuus,) and hence, I will, for the sake of the argument, concede every thing you say of aidios—that it has but one root, one significant part, viz., aei. And what have you gained? Nothing: for though we both agree that the word means endless, yet as it is not applied to punishment, it can not prove the latter to be endless. And furthermore, its sense of endless, if you are right in its construction, must be derived from its general usage, and not merely from the force of aei. Thus neither aei, aion, nor aionios from the same root, can prove the endless duration of punishment.

6. This will further appear from the following facts: 1st. We have examined all the passages in the New Testament in which aei occurs uncompounded, and in not one of its eight occurrences there, does it signify endless duration. 2d. The numerous passages of Scripture adduced where aionios occurs in a limited, and necessarily limited sense, clearly show that this of itself can not unequivocally prove endless duration. And, 3d, (perhaps the reader will smile at the authority, and you again complain of misrepresentation!) the Rev. Alexander Campbell himself, thus defines aion, in Table XIV of the Appendix to the third edition of his version of the New Testament, 8vo. edition, 1835: "AGE, aion, (derived from aei, always, and on, being.) Its radical idea is indefinite duration. It is in all versions differently translated. We have the phrase eis aiona, or eis ton aiona, in the singular form thirty-two times, and in the plural form twenty-six times, translated in the common version 'always' and 'forever.' The phrases 'since' and 'before the aion (world) began,' occur in Luke i: 70; John ix: 32; Acts iii: 21, and xv: 18; Eph. iii: 9. The phrase sun telei ton aionos, occurs in Matthew five times, rendered 'end of the world;' by Dr. Campbell, 'the conclusion of the state;' and in Heb. ix: 26, in the plural form, rendered 'once in the end of the world,'" etc., etc. (See the whole article published in the number of the Magazine and Advocate containing this letter. And, Sir, will you oblige me by republishing the whole of it in your Harbinger?)

7. Thus, Sir, you have cut your throat with your own weapon. You say, in the unexcited hour of calm investigation, in your study by yourself, when no controversy is pending, the RADICAL meaning of aion is INDEFINITE DURATION, and we read of the END of aion five times, in Matthew, etc. Ecce homo! Behold now your unenviable position! On the first proposition you conceded that neither sheol, hades, nor gehenna, did or could of themselves express endless misery, and that aionios, your favorite term for endless, was never applied to either of them. You subsequently affirmed positively, that gehenna was never used literally in the New Testament, and never meant a literal punishment in the valley of Hinnom. I quoted from one of your own notes (on Matthew v: 29) and fully refuted that statement. You accused me of garbling and misrepresenting your note, and asked me to publish the whole. It is done, Sir, in the paper containing this letter. Will you publish it entire in the Harbinger?

8. You took the position that aion and aionios were more unequivocally expressive of endless duration, than any other word—that if they mean not duration without end, there is no word in human speech that does, and thus suspended the doctrine of endless misery upon this single hair. Your own definition of aion, above quoted, completely severs that hair, and the doctrine falls.—Where is it? "And echo answers, where?" You have conceded the affirmative of the third proposition; and I have amply proved the fourth. If, Sir, there is a single argument of yours up to this point, that is not completely transfixed to the core, and mostly by your own weapons, my judgment is strangely at fault. You remind me of king Saul in his last moment of desperation—he rushes on his own sword, and lets out his own bowels. You also remind me of poor Sampson grinding at the mill of Gaza with both eyes put out. Like him, you appear not to know where you go. Like him, you seize the pillars of the house wherein you stand. Like him, you bow yourself with all your strength. But, unlike him, in its fall, you crush only yourself in the ruins! I pity you, my friend: but really your fate seems to be richly merited.

9. I care not what you say about ex post facto words. Having fully proved my fourth proposition, I am at perfect leisure and liberty to go back to the third, or second, or even first, as often as you do. And, Sir, I assure you I intend to follow you up in all your wily meanderings, and do up this work thoroughly. You say these additional words are not in the New Testament. I did not say they were. They are equally applicable to the third proposition. And I say they are Greek words, and would be likely to be in the New Testament, and applied to punishment, had the inspired writers intended to represent punishment as endless. The misspelling of the Greek words quoted, of which you speak, happens to be, in this as well as in several other previous instances, on your own part. I follow the Greek orthography: you do not. But as your criticism here is horn-less, although it has hoofs, it is as harmless as its prototype!

10. What you say about my having "long flourished by dint of my Hebrew, Greek, and Latin lore," and being "reckless, bold, and dogmatical to a proverb," I am perfectly willing to leave to the decision of my regular readers for the last eleven years, and that they should compare my course with that of my learned opponent in this discussion. They all know right well that I have never made any great pretensions to a knowledge of either of those languages: and I think by this time they are satisfied that a very moderate share of that kind of knowledge is quite sufficient to refute the first two, and establish the last two propositions under discussion.

11. Your 17th paragraph is really amusing.—You undertake to prove your assertion that I had maintained that life was an evil. You make two quotations from me to prove it, and both of them go directly against you, and refute your charge. You then make a distorted quotation from Shakspeare's Hamlet, and assert that you have proved me guilty of the charge! A affirms he has never seen a white blackbird—he repeats the affirmation. B says he has seen one. C then stoutly maintains that, taking the assertions of both together, they positively prove that A says he has seen a white blackbird! And this alphabetical C is my friend of the Harbinger! The conclusion of your 17th paragraph, contains a palpable sophism. Show me eternal reasons for eternal pain, and I will concede the truth of the latter. Temporal punishments are inflicted for temporal sinning. Prove eternal sinning, and I grant eternal suffering. But you have not proved, nor attempted to prove either eternal sinning or any other eternal reason for eternal pain.

12. When you will show any beneficent and eternal ends compatible with the divine character and the good of the whole universe, or any part of it, to be accomplished by endless punishment, I shall be ready to consider any arguments you may offer in its favor. Hitherto you have offered none. I am not arguing for the salvation of "stage and waggon horses," (see your 18th paragraph,) but of the human family. And if you can give no better reason for the endless pains of the latter, than the momentary sufferings of the former, you must assume that God is as much worse than brutal stage drivers, as his power is greater. But instead of attempting this herculean task, you will cry "sour grapes." Your 19th paragraph, on a priori reasoning, is wholly unworthy of its author, though in good keeping with most of your 24th and 26th letters. I have "supposed no law of nature or of the divine perfections." I have "imagined" no such laws. I have adopted no "hypotheses," nor "placed my interpretation of the divine perfections for the perfections themselves." All I have advanced on this subject, has been proved by the unequivocal voice of revelation. Before, therefore, you can disprove my premises, you must disprove the Bible. Your warfare here, Sir, is with Scripture, and not with me. Read again and see. You can not, as you intimate, disprove "the origination and existence of any moral or physical evil in God's creation," with the same ease and authority as I have proved the impossibility of the existence of endless evil. For the very authority I quoted, proves the existence of temporary evil for good and beneficent purposes.

13. Your 20th paragraph reminds me of the thief who, being closely pursued, rushed into the crowd, crying, "stop thief! stop thief!" at the top of his voice!! Instead of my saying "God is too good to punish," I say he does and will punish every sinner according to the full demerits of his crimes, and there is no escape; and this punishment, designed for good, is an evidence of God's goodness. You maintain that he will pardon some and not punish them according to their deserts. I maintain that the soul that sinneth "shall surely die." You maintain they shall not SURELY die: but if they will repent and be baptized at your hands, they shall surely escape the threatened death. Who is it, Sir, that whispers like the serpent in the ear of Eve? You say I present a glass of pure water in one hand, but before it reaches your lips, I infuse into it a few drops of adulterated wine, which discolor and vitiate the whole. I present you the cup, Sir, just as the Bible presents it to me. But if vitiated, can you find nothing to heal the deadly waters? O yes, you have an antidote: add a few drops of the doctrine of endless damnation, and the "deadly pottage," like Elisha's, will be healed—there will then be no "death in the pot"—the deadly waters will be purified, and prove most delicious to your taste, and comforting to your soul!! Is it the water, Sir, or your taste, that is vitiated?

14. In your 21st and 24th paragraphs, you deny the infinity of the divine goodness, and call the position altogether apocryphal!! You are the first Christian minister I ever knew who had the effrontery to deny the infinite goodness of God! You say, it is true that "he is supremely good to the whole universe," (i. e. in general,) but you say the Bible "does not say he is infinitely good," and that "he can not be infinitely good to any member of the universe that ever suffered a single pain." Of course he can not be infinitely good to any human being; for all have suffered pain. Sir, the quotation I made from the Wisdom of Solomon, was not relied on as proof, but as a beautiful parallel and illustration of the Scripture quotations before and after it. My proof therefore was not Apocryphal. David says, "The Lord is good unto all," etc., and John says, "God is love." God is not a finite being; of course his love can not be finite. He possesses no attribute in part. If he is love at all, he is infinite love: if he is good at all, he is infinitely good. You think he is partly good and partly bad—a little good to some, sometimes, but but never infinitely good to any human being!! I leave you to settle your account on this score with the Bible and common sense.

15. My trilemma, that you think you have so completely demolished, has suffered no harm, as the following emendation of your substitute will show. 1. God could save all men from all temporal evils, but would not, (for reasons shown in the 3d.) 2. He would save all men from all temporal evils, had he not seen that their permission would result in greater good, but he could not choose the privation of the greater good for the sake of preventing the lesser evil. Therefore, 3. He neither would nor could consistently prevent all temporal evils, for thereby he would prevent the greatest possible good of the whole, in which all temporal evils shall finally end. The above sufficiently refutes your charge in your 23d paragraph, on the word possible, and shows that I consider all the perfections of God when I speak of things being possible or impossible with him. Besides, I have no idea of cutting the Divinity up into parts.

16. Your labored and wily effort (paragraph 24) to prove that 1000 agonies suffered by each of 1000 persons, or a single agony suffered by an individual, makes the universe fail by so many agonies, of all possible bliss, will be disposed of by the single remark, that these agonies, be they more or less, greater or smaller, are the very road and medium which infinite wisdom and goodness appointed through which to advance them to all possible bliss. Suppose you loan a man $1000. In due time you receive it back with interest. Are you then minus your fortune by $1000? The infinite goodness of God to each individual, is as clearly demonstrable in what he suffers, as in what he enjoys. You say your "theory is, that God's government will secure to his own universe the greatest possible good at the least possible expense of evil." And that "greatest possible good," you hold, consists in the salvation of a minority of the human race; and "the least possible expense of evil," consists in the endless damnation of a majority! Verily, Sir, you will much improve your theory by exactly reversing it!

17. The converse of the proposition God is love, is as true as the proposition itself, in the sense the word love is there used, i. e., to express pure spiritual love, or benevolence. Spiritual love, or pure benevolence, is all of God; it can come from no other source; and wherever it exists, it is so much of God, a portion of the true Divinity. So of pure spiritual light. God is not only light, but the Father of lights. Spiritual light is an emanation from God, or is God. You ask why I do not say "love is jealous, just, true, indignant," etc. I do say so, Sir, in the sense these last words are applicable to God. But these words, jealous, indignant, etc., can not be applied to God in a bad sense, or in a sense they often have when applied to men, unless we suppose him a miserable and unhappy being, tossed on the ocean of contending passions. In him they simply denote vigilance, watchfulness, righteous disapprobation, and punishment of sin, etc.

18. The doctrine of purgatory seems to trouble your brain more than any thing else. You introduce it nine times in these two letters, and have for months before been taunting and ridiculing me on account of it. Sometimes you fix its duration at a few hundred, and then at several thousand years: and next, as if in desperation for some information, entreat me to inform you more definitely about it, etc. Have I ever told you I believed in purgatory? No. Have I ever advanced a syllable on the subject till now? No. Where did you get your information that I believe in one? Not from me. And what has such a doctrine to do with the four questions between us? As much as the Mahommedan Alcoran has, and no more. During the early part of this discussion you were continually reproaching me for confining all punishment to the present state. Seeing you so often departed from the questions at issue, to belabor me for this supposed heresy, and hoping to confine you to the questions, I frankly told you I did not entertain that view, and that I held to punishment in the future state.

19. This to you was ten times as bad as the former, and the most ridiculous and inconsistent of all doctrines ever held; and you have been lampooning and reviling me about it ever since; and for no other reason than because I held that future punishment would be inflicted by the same kind Father, and for the same benevolent ends, as in this life, and would be limited in duration. Had I only conceded that it was vindictive and merciless in character, utterly useless in tendency, and endless in duration, why, then, it would have been a most palatable doctrine to your taste—a most holy and lovely sentiment!!

20. Sir, I deny that I hold the doctrine of purgatory, (i. e. the doctrine the Catholics call by that name,) though such a doctrine being held by Catholics, is by no means an objection to it. If you, Sir, call the punishments which David, Jonah, Joseph's brethren, Nebuchadnezzar, the Prodigal Son, Saul of Tarsus, and others, experienced in this life, and which resulted in their good, by the name of purgatory, I have no objections that you should apply the term in the same sense to my views of future punishment. For I believe the latter will be inflicted by the same being, for the same purpose, and with similar happy results, as the former. But, Sir, seek not to misrepresent and revile a doctrine of which you confess yourself totally ignorant, and are asking information. This question has nothing to do with our question necessarily. Will you remember it?

In my next I shall dispose of the remainder of your 26th and 28th letters.

Yours, in all good will, D. SKINNER.

SELFISHNESS.

BY U. M. FELTON.

To a person accustomed to observe, attentively, the actions of others, nothing is more striking than the propensity of mankind to overlook the ordinary comforts of life in pursuit of something which they have not. They undervalue the manifold blessings which surround themselves, by striving to obtain some fancied good, which, if obtained, seldom, if ever, yields them the expected felicity. This truth unfolds a degree of thoughtlessness, which it is painful to observe. Health, the greatest temporal good, is destroyed by luxury and pride. Composure of mind is lost in the tumultuous feelings occasioned by vain pursuits. The office of doing good to our neighbors, of imparting consolation to the sick and distressed, or of reclaiming the vicious, is too often neglected, for more pompous acts of benevolence. That pleasing good humor which constitutes the charm of domestic life, and which appearances abroad would warrant to be universal, is often driven from home by neglecting to appreciate those quiet and ordinary occurrences which contribute to real felicity. The beauties of nature, which are so profusely spread around us, are passed by unheeded, and with a strange blindness, we turn from the contemplation and enjoyment of the unbounded gifts of our great Creator, a small part of which, it would seem, might be sufficient to draw forth our wonder and admiration, and make it a delightful thing to obey His first and great commandment, to love him with all our hearts.

The plain rules of the Gospel are too often unnoticed, while religion is so wrapt up in creeds, that it is difficult to find it in its original simplicity. The attainment of knowledge is highly commendable, when applied to good purposes; yet it is to be feared that there is but a small part of modern education which rightly improves the mind, or makes the heart better, since with the impress of a God written on every thing above and around us, we not only forget to admire, but, strange as it may appear, there are many, too many, of the present day, who, possessing all the advantages of intellectual improvement, not only neglect his gifts, but deny the existence of that Being who created all things. Oh, the madness of selfishness and presumption!

PRAYER—NO. I.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

That it is the duty of man to offer prayer to God, is admitted by all Christians, and even the most hardened, in times of extreme danger will cry to God for help. But what is prayer?—"Prayer," says a chaste and amiable writer, "is the direct intercourse of the spirit of man with the spiritual and unseen Creator." "God is a spirit, and those that worship him, must worship him in spirit and in truth." It consists in adoration, acknowledgment, gratitude, confession, and supplication. Prayer may be divided into individual, domestic and social. Instances of each kind will be found interspersed throughout the sacred volume. Jesus has particularly enjoined upon mankind the duty of prayer, both by precept and example. With regard to the times and the particular forms connected with the service, he has left this matter to be regulated by the dictates of the heart. We find him, on every important occasion, engaged in ardent prayer to his Father.—At one time, he is at the grave of Lazarus, then with his disciples, and then in the garden of Gethsemane, holding intercourse with the Being who sent him to restore man to virtue and happiness. Jesus, when speaking on the subject, presented the following plain directions: "But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door pray to thy Father which is in secret, and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly.....Use not vain repetitions as the heathen do; for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking.....What things soever ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them. And when ye stand praying, forgive if ye have aught against any; that your Father who is in heaven may forgive you your trespasses." Prayer should ever be considered as a privilege granted to us by the Father of mercies. God encourages us to come to him with all the simplicity and confidence of children, to unbosom all our cares, to make known all our wants, and express all our thoughts with unreserved freedom to him. What a beautiful thought is it, that we can, under all circumstances, go to our Father in heaven, and hold child-like communion with him. Let us go, therefore, to him, and with contrite hearts pour out our souls in prayer, and we may expect a blessing from the service.

"I WOULD NOT LIVE ALWAYS."

Who would wish to live always in this world of trial, of change and disappointment? Who does not sigh at times, to fly away, and be at rest. Who that has struggled long and hard with the world, to sustain himself and family, and earnestly desires to serve God and his fellow-men—to do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly, does not feel, at times, to exclaim with the poet—

"I'm weary of the tiresome chase,
Let others run this endless race,
To catch a flying shade."

I readily admit that here we are permitted to enjoy much, but it is momentary, and soon we are called to suffer—"passing away," is written on every thing of an earthly nature; and were it not for the hope of the Gospel, how wretched and miserable should we be! Blot out the doctrine of life and immortality beyond the grave, and you might as well extinguish the sun at noon day—you leave men at the mercy of the winds and the waves. Oh! how valuable, how consoling, then, is that hope which enters within the vail where our forerunner hath for us entered in triumph; for then, although we know we must die, yet we can rejoice in believing that we shall live again—we are encouraged to press on—we can still trust in God, feeling assured that he will not withhold any good thing from us, even if it be good for us to be afflicted.

Dear reader, are you in trouble?—do the cares and disappointments of life afflict you? Trust in God, and he will remove the cloud!

"Look up! the Lord hath more to give,
By faith upon Him daily live,
And you shall find it so!

REFLECTIONS.

If there be any event calculated to excite the most tender feelings of our natures, it is the death of a young and dearly beloved friend. There is something in such a scene that softens the heart, touches the silken cords of affection in tones so sweetly sad, as to melt our bosoms in the deepest sympathy with the bereaved mourners. Even the lifeless remains of any of the human family, (perchance an enemy,) is capable of exciting those exquisite and fine-toned sensibilities, in which reside all that is ennobling in man; and if so, oh, how much more heartfelt and lasting must be those sensations occasioned by the death of one we love! Yea, of one we love! Tongue can not tell, nor language portray them. While viewing the inanimate remains of one near and dear to us, (if not by consanguinity, by companionship,) how many associations are called up, and with what pathos do they touch the tendrils of memory! If aught on earth will fill the mind with thoughts of death, eternity, and salvation, it is such a scene. Here rush, like an electric shock, the long pent up thoughts of the perturbed heart. Here fond hopes lie blasted—ardent expectations blighted. Here joys are buried—pleasures laid aside.

At such dispensations of Providence, we are prone to murmur and repine—but let us reflect: let us call to mind those immutable truths and promises proclaimed in the Gospel of our Saviour; let us look to him who is ready and willing to take us to his arms, and lead us to rich pastures beside the still waters—to regions of never-ending felicity in mansions prepared for us from the foundation of the world, in the paradise of our Father and our God. In him we may find comfort, and in him we may ground our blissful hopes and fervent expectations. Hath he said it, and shall he not do it? Hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good?

HOPE.

How emphatically is man the creature of hope. Whether he basks in the sunshine of prosperity, surrounded by the vanities of wealth and the empty sound of honor, or pines in the vale of obscurity, clothed with the mantle of poverty and writhing under the giant grasp of want: still in the affluence of plenty or in the darkness of adversity, the bright dawnings of hope fall, like gleams of light upon the dark waters of the troubled soul, and peace sways her fairy sceptre over the region of doubt or the abode of despair. Fancy in her golden dreams, paints the illusions of hope fair as the flowery fields, which are carpeted with the primrose and the honey-suckle, and through whose gentle vale meanders the softly-sighing streamlet, bearing on its bosom unnumbered sweets, to refresh and gladden the heart of the enraptured admirer. Beneath her star-gemmed canopy, no clouds obscure, no storms darken the tinsel vision of human life. Bright and balmy are her unmeasured plains. The undulating hill or the beautifully picturesque landscape; the sublime eminence or the overhanging precipice, sparkling in a thousand sunbeams; each forms an airy castle in which hope treasures with the confidence of youthful rashness, the anticipation of joys yet to be realized and pleasures yet untasted. Happiness shrouded in the dim distance of futurity unmasks the veil, and stands the polar star of hope. When the tempest of affliction heaves its angry billows about the frail bark of life; when the engulphing surge breaks and rolls its unstayed waves over earth's fairest, brightest prospects, how calm and subduing the empire of hope. Yea, when the last dying pulsation of the faintly throbbing heart is about to strike the celestial spark from its fleshy tabernacle; then, oh! then the full fruition of hope's unbounded joys, beams with undying splendor upon the immortal soul.

DEDICATION.

The Universalist meeting-house lately erected in Sharon, Schoharie county, was dedicated to the worship of one God, on Wednesday, July 11th, by appropriate services, which were performed in the following order:—

1. Voluntary, by the choir. 2. Prayer, by Br. M. B. Newell. 3. Reading select Scriptures, by the same. 4. Hymn. 5. Dedication prayer, by Br. L. C. Marvin. 6. Hymn. 7. Sermon, by Br. J. Potter, from John iv: 23. 8. Hymn. 9. Address to the Society, by Br. Potter. 10. Voluntary, by the choir. 11. Benediction.

Service was holden in the afternoon, and sermons were delivered by Brs. Marvin and Guild. The house is a neat and spacious edifice, 60 by 40 feet, and surmounted by a well proportioned tower, and withal pleasantly located. It was filled in every part with devout worshippers, on the occasion.

The society is composed of the most wealthy and respectable inhabitants of the place, and are doing themselves and the cause of the Redeemer much honor by a becoming zeal. Long may they go on prospering, and may they continue to prosper.

CHRIST A SAVIOUR.

BY REV. J. P. ATKINSON.

There is no denomination of Christians but believe, and will readily assent to the truth, that Jesus came into the world to save sinners. But whether he will be the complete Saviour of all sinners, is a question upon which there has been much disputation; one that has long moved the controversial pen. Some have contended with a zeal worthy of a better cause, that the great Redeemer was sent into the world to save a portion of mankind from sin who were elected before the foundation of the world, to joys that shall be as lasting as eternity itself, while millions were reprobated to endure sufferings without relief and end.

Another class, with unabating zeal, declare that he who spilled his blood on Mount Calvary, "tasted death for every man"—came into the world for the express purpose of saving every sinner from pollution, and to present all spotless and pure at the footstool of the high and lofty One! But in consequence of the stubbornness of man—his proneness to evil—that the will of God will assuredly be defeated in relation to some of his intelligent offspring—the mission of the Lamb of God prove abortive, and millions of the human race be lost, at last, beyond the possibility of a remedy. It will at once be seen by the unprejudiced and reflecting mind, that the ideas here advanced represent "Jesus of Nazareth," only as a partial Saviour—and not only as a partial Saviour, but the destroyer of a part of the intelligent creation of God. The idea is not only abhorrent to every benevolent feeling of that soul in whom the love of Heaven has been shed abroad, but is in opposition to every act of the great Mediator and Redeemer—the object of his divine mission—his awful death—his triumphant resurrection and glorious ascension, and the glowing words he uttered to his apostles when the spirit of madness pervaded their bosoms:—"I came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them." To declare that the Messiah will redeem only a part from the thraldom of vice and error, represents Deity to be partial in his nature—sporting with the frail creatures of his power, and contradicts the all-conquering truth that the wisdom of God is "without partiality." But, thanks to the Universal Parent, the truth is clearly revealed, and bursts upon the mind in a manner not to be resisted, that the Father sent the Son (not to save the elect alone, or those, only, who come to the knowledge of the truth in this transitory life, but) "to be the Saviour of the world." The proof in relation to this subject is overwhelming. And while I shall appeal to the sacred Record to sustain the truth that "the Son of God" will purify all intelligent beings, and raise them to the kingdom of unending joys, let the reader divest his mind of all prejudice, so that the truth may have its full force upon the heart.

The question then is, whether Jesus will save the whole world, or not? Certainly it is one of vast importance, and in the decision of which, we should feel deeply interested. St. Paul, in a letter to Timothy, affirms that "God will have all men to be saved." And the blessed Saviour declared while on earth:—"All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out. For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is the Father's will who sent me, that of all which he hath given me, I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day." And Holy Writ informs us that "The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hands."—Hence, the conclusion must be inevitable, that our divine Lord will, in his own time, by the controling power of love, renovate every soul of man—subdue every discordant passion, and reconcile the whole world to God. In agreement with language so consoling, is the testimony of the disciple whom Jesus loved. "We have seen," said he, "and do testify, that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world." Here we are informed of the mission of Christ. It was to save the world.—And shall we call in question the veracity of this witness? "His character is above reproach.—Next to his exalted Master, on whose bosom he learned to inhale a double portion of its celestial inspirations, his veracity is to be regarded as an adamantine foundation, on which we all safely recline." "We have seen and do testify." The bosom friend of the Saviour had seen that to which he testified. Not he alone had seen it, but we. There were many witnesses to this enrapturing truth. "We have seen and do testify, that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world." Consequently opposition must cease—sin be no more remembered—all hearts knit together in love—the will of man lost in the will of the divine Being—the kingdom delivered to the Father by his Son—and the whole world freed from sin and imperfection, guided safely to God and happiness unending.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;

FOR SUNDAY, AUGUST 12, 1838.

GAL. V: 16-26.

Though selected from a different letter of Paul, and to a separate people, this paragraph may be very appropriately considered as a continuation of the exhortation we had under review last week.

In the commencement of this chapter the apostle, as an inference from what he had previously said, urges upon the Galatians not to submit any longer to Judaizing teachers who would bind upon their necks the yoke of Mosaic bondage, but to stand firm in that freedom from obligation to that law, wherewith Christ had made them free under the dispensation given by him. And in the three verses immediately preceding our present paragraph, he continues the subject by exhorting the Galatians not to abuse their freedom from the services and ceremonies enjoined by the law of Moses, by making this freedom an apology for unrestricted indulgence of their appetites and inclinations; especially not to so abuse it as to give unnecessary offence to their weaker brethren, who still thought the injunctions of Moses obligatory upon them. This abuse of their freedom would be a direct violation of the great law of love, in obedience to which, and not in opposition to the law of Moses, consists our chief duty as the servants of Christ. This offensive conduct to weaker brethren tends to arouse the worst feelings of their animal nature—anger, contempt, dislike, discord, revenge, resulting in devouring one another, instead of serving each other in love.

In the present paragraph, the writer proceeds to command with apostolic authority an obedience to the dictates of their better nature—of that spirit which characterised their Lord and Master, and in this way, he says, they will prevent the effusions of the baser feelings of their nature, which we above enumerated. He tells the Galatians that they should be at some pains to form a habit of obedience to the dictates of their better nature and better judgment; for the desires and propensities of their baser nature were so contrary to those of their better nature, that without cultivating the above named habit, they would find it hard or impracticable to walk, at all times, according to the spirit. The same course of habitual attention and obedience to the dictates of reason and conscience, we must pursue if we would gain a victory over the lower propensities of our nature. We can not serve two masters, and the better master can not be served without a considerable effort, at least at first. For our encouragement to such a course of virtuous, perhaps arduous, adherence to the requisitions of our better nature, let us reflect upon the encouraging consideration given to the Galatians; which is, that by this habitual obedience they will rid themselves of slavery to their lusts or baser inclinations, and of that sense of degradation and of guilty fear with which conscience oppresses its violators. Besides this, the apostle may mean to say that no law whatever, of God or man, would condemn them while practicing the requisitions of their better nature, for in verse 23, he says that no nation ever held the work of the spirit, as worthy of condemnation, or liable to punishment. As a farther encouragement and motive to his readers to walk according to the spirit, that is their better judgment, Paul sets before them the hideous nature of those works, to the performance of which, a neglect of their conscience, and a supine indulgence of their lower propensities would, in course of time, lead them, and, on the other hand, presents them with an enumeration of those amiable and excellent virtues, to the practice of which, they will in due time be gradually led on, by a faithful adherence to the plan of duty which he has been recommending.

Looking at these two opposite pictures, it is very easy to decide which of the two we would wish our conduct to make the nearest approximation to. The plan to be adopted to secure this approximation is above indicated; and the judgment and experience of every reflecting man will approve of that as the most efficient means. In the prosecution of our object we will meet with difficulties; our self-denial may be so painful as to bear to be compared to the pains of crucifixion: but these are more than counter-balanced by the joys and rewards of a resolute adherance to the dictates of conscience and God. Let us, for encouragement in overcoming these difficulties and struggles with the baser propensities of our nature, look to him, who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the pains of the cross, and held in small account the ignominy attached to such a death. While every victory will bring its own consolatory rewards, let us look forward to the height of perfection to which a continuance in well-doing will bring us at last, and at the joys which then await us. On the other hand, let our energies of resistance be aroused by the prospect of those detestable and miserable vices to which indulgence will, at length, bring us, and in the practice of which we can never taste the joys of heaven. O, may these opposite pictures of what man may become, have their due influence.

RETROSPECTION.

Every man has his seasons of sober thought, when the scenes of the past, in which he has been a prominent actor, come up before him with almost the spirit and color of the present. It is in this way that man can live his life over and over again; and though he can not amend what is past, yet that past should be a beacon light and a warning, not to abuse the present, or neglect the future. Much of our dearest association centres in the magic thought of home, and the scenes of childhood and youth, ere we had wandered from the paternal halls, or ceased to listen to the instructions of a mother, as we sat by the much loved "Ingle side." There is a melancholy pleasure in mingling with those seasons which are now blended into eternity, that will render it a profitable exercise. The back-ground of the picture, the general outlines, will be presented to nearly every mind in the same strong and impressive coloring. The thoughts, as they roam backward through the short race which we have run, will pause to reflect on the destiny of those with whom we associated in school-boy days; but where are they? The friend of our youth, the laughter loving satirist, the serious minded peace-maker, the bold and thoughtless mischief maker—where are they? Reader, you remember, perhaps, one: a serious minded youth who was educated by friends to believe in the horrid, cruel doctrine of endless wo, but who believed, also, that he could escape all punishment by the single process of repentance. Being taught by professed ministers of the Gospel, that there was a pleasure in sin, which was above all the worldly enjoyments of the Christian, he determined to enjoy it, and trust to repentance for an "eternal inheritance." Do you ask where he is now? Go with me to the haunts of vice; behold him reeling under the influence of the intoxicating bowl. Tell him that he is doing wrong, tell him that he is laying a foundation for deep anguish and sorrow in his sober moments—"I know it," says he; supporting himself by his educational prejudices; "I know it, but I intend to repent before I die." See him desecrating the Sabbath, cursing the institutions of God and his country, uttering horrid blasphemies to Him, whom he should have loved and adored—and yet for all these, he means to repent some time or other. Another you remember, who, rejecting these unnatural ideas, has flown to the opposite extreme, and instead of believing in a God as cruel as he is represented, denies his existence entirely, and looks upon religion as an imposition. Another, in the warmth of his youthful spirit, was your friend and playmate, became a bigot, and deserted you, if you happened to differ with him in faith. His religion, or what he calls religion, instead of making him kind, affectionate, and charitable, has made him despise his former youthful associates, and to say to them, "stand by, come not near me; for I am holier than thou." These are no fantasies, they are real events. And it is remembrances of scenes similar to these which form alternately, the faint pencillings of the past in every mind.

But the foreground of the scene, the strong coloring, the lights and shades of human life, in which they themselves, have acted a conspicuous part, is different to different individuals, according to the nature of the part which they have acted. One man remembers the time when his spirit was blithe and happy in the anticipations of his young heart. Hope beamed upon his soul, and shed its invigorating rays around his path, and he scarcely thought of the darkness and gloom through which he might be called to pass, in future life. But as he casts his eyes along over the events of succeeding years, a dark spot presents itself to his mind, for its events are engraven upon his memory forever. The sweeping pestilence of modern revivalism, infected the moral atmosphere around him, and he became a victim to its fanaticism, its crime, and its soul chilling pangs. His secular duties were neglected, home was almost deserted, to attend the blasphemies of madness. Friends whom he had long cherished, he looked upon as the victims of insatiable and eternal hatred, and he hated them too. And though he could not hate his parents, yet the dreadful doom which he supposed they were exposed to, added bitterness to his life. He remembers too, perhaps, the time when his heart first felt the influence of that Gospel which breathes peace on earth and good will to men. Again his heart was buoyant with gratitude and love. Again he felt that he could repose in the smiles of peace, and he felt that the fiery trials through which he had passed, taught him never again to trust in the creeds of men.

Again, another thinks of a different scene. In his youth he became impatient of parental restraint, and prodigal like, fled from his home and his kindred, to sail on the proud waves of ocean's briny deep. And thus, far, far from the scenes of his juvenile folly, he receives the intelligence that his parents' eyes are closed in death. How often amid the forgetfulness of the moment do the thoughts of those cherished, though slighted ones, revive in his memory, and restrain him from the commission of some untoward act.

Go to him when facing a hostile foe amid the boom of cannon and the flying missiles of death, and when the deep scowl of vengeance sits upon his brow, and his arm is raised to fire the powdered train—whisper to him the loved, the almost forgotten name of mother, and that man is changed! The countenance will sink down to sorrow and regret, and the arm will fall powerless to his side. You have awakened in his mind a train of painful thoughts. Such are some of the scenes called to mind by a process of retrospection. Will the reader finish the picture for himself?

MR. CAMPBELL vs MR. CAMPBELL.

Our readers will recollect that Rev. Alexander Campbell has accused me, while discussing the word gehenna, of garbling and misrepresenting his Note on Matthew v: 22, and requested me to lay it before my readers. He says that in that note, he only says, "Jesus alluded to this [burning alive in the Valley of Hinnom] and other punishments to convey certain instruction to his disciples. I appeal to the whole note taken together." The whole note here follows. The reader will perceive that Mr. C. says in the note, that "In the common translation of this verse, there is a confounding of things present and future, of things human and divine, that badly comports with the dignity of the speaker. What affinity exists between judges, a council, and hell-fire? Why should one expression of anger, only subject a person to human judges, and another subject him to hell-fire in the usual sense of these words?" etc., etc. And then in order to keep the subject distinct, and avoid confounding things present and future, human and divine, he says, "The fact is that the allusions in this verse are all to human institutions and customs amongst the Jews: and the judges, the Sanhedrim, and the HELL-FIRE here introduced, are all human punishments," etc. He further says—"The following translation [of the latter clause] of this verse, is expressive of the full sense of the original:—'Whosoever shall say, apostate wretch, (the highest expression of malice,) shall be obnoxious to the gehenna of fire,' or to being burned alive in the vale of Hinnom. This translation is in substance approved by Adam Clarke and other critics of respectability."

Notwithstanding the clearness and positiveness of this note, Mr. C. now has the temerity to deny that gehenna ever means in the New Testament, a literal punishment in the literal Valley of Hinnom, and accuses me of misrepresentation for saying his note countenances such an idea! Moreover, contrary to his own maxims, he attempts now to confound things present and future, things human and divine, and to make out that one thing is alluded to, and another, and a very different thing, meant.

All that Mr. C. has written upon aion in the pending discussion, that has the least semblance of weight against my views and arguments, is completely and triumphantly refuted by his own definition of that word, which here follows, taken from the 14th table in the Appendix to his Testament. We may occasionally hereafter edify our readers by copying a few other of Mr. C.'s notes, definitions, or translations, by which he refutes himself. Let us see whether he will have the courage to copy them into the Harbinger.

D. S.

FROM "NO. V" OF THE APPENDIX TO MR. CAMPBELL'S TRANSLATION.

"Thomson translates Matt. v: 22, thus: 'Whosoever is angry with his brother without cause, shall be liable to the sentence of the judges: and whoever shall say to his brother, Raca, (a contemptuous word,) shall be liable to the sentence of the Sanhedrim; and whoever shall say, Morch, (a reproachful word,) shall be liable (to be sentenced) to the vale of fire,' or to the Gehenna of fire.

"In the common translation of this verse there is a confounding of things present and future, of things human and divine, that badly comports with the wisdom and dignity of the speaker. What affinity exists between judges, a council, and hell-fire? Why should one expression of anger only subject a person to human judges, and another subject him to hell-fire, in the usual sense of these words? Now if the terms in this verse conveyed the same meaning to us, which they conveyed to the audience which the Saviour at that time addressed, we would discover a propriety and beauty in them which is not manifest in the common translations of them. The fact is, that the allusions in this verse are all to human institutions or customs amongst the Jews; and the judges, the Sanhedrim, and the hell-fire here introduced, are all human punishments. Parkhurst observes on the phrase Gehenna tou puros, (a Gehenna of fire,) that, in its outward and primary sense, it relates to that dreadful doom of being burnt alive in the valley of Hinnom. 'The valley of Hinnom lay near Jerusalem, and had been the place of those abominable sacrifices, in which the idolatrous Jews burned their children alive to Moloch, Baal, or the sun. A particular place in this valley was called Tophet; and the valley itself, the valley of Tophet, from the fire stove in which they burned their children to Moloch.' [See 2 Kings xxiii: 10; 2 Chronicles xxviii: 3; Jeremiah vii: 30–32; xix: 5, 6: xxxii: 35.] It appears also that burning a person alive was a punishment inflicted under the law. Leviticus xx: 14; xxi: 9.

"The design of the speaker in this passage goes far to solve the difficulties which awkward translations of it have thrown in the way. The great error which the Messiah, in this part of his discourse, so severely reprehends, is a disposition to consider atrocious actions as the only evils which would subject men to the judgment of God. He proceeds to inform his audience that, under his reign, not merely atrocious actions, but improper thoughts, contemptuous and reproachful words, would subject men to punishment. In order to exhibit the discriminating spirituality of his reign, he alludes to human discriminations regarding criminal actions, and the diversities of punishment to which transgressors were obnoxious, according to the supposed malignity of their deeds.

"The sentence of the city councils, which extended, in certain instances, to strangling a person, is one of the allusions. These councils were composed of twenty-three judges, and were an inferior court amongst the Jews. The Sanhedrim or council of seventy-two senators, whose sentence authorized stoning to death, and which was the superior court of that people, constitutes the second allusion. The burning a person alive in the vale of Hinnom, is the third. By these allusions he teaches his audience that anger in the heart, anger expressed in the way of contempt, and anger expressed with manifest malice, would, under his reign, subject men to such diversities of punishment, as they were wont to apportion to atrocious actions, according to their views of criminality.

"The following translation of this verse is expressive of the full sense of the original. 'Whosoever is vainly incensed against his brother, shall be obnoxious to the sentence of the judges, (the court twenty-three;) whoever shall say to his brother, (in the way of contempt,) Shallum, shall be obnoxious to the Sanhedrim: and whoever shall say, Apostate wretch, (the highest expression of malice,) shall be obnoxious to the gehenna of fire,' or to being burned alive in the vale of Hinnom. This translation is in substance approved by Adam Clarke, and other critics of respectability."

FROM TABLE XIV. OF THE APPENDIX TO THE 3D. EDITION OF MR. CAMPBELL'S TRANSLATION.

The Table is headed thus:—"Apostolic words and phrases, which have been subjects of controversy: alphabetically arranged and defined from their current acceptation in the Christian Scriptures."

"AGE, aion. (derived from aei, always, and on, being.) Its radical idea is indefinite duration. It is in all versions differently translated. We have the phrase eis aiona, or eis ton aiona, in the singular form, thirty-two times: and in the plural form twenty-six times, translated in the common version, 'always' and 'forever.' The word aion in other passages, also alludes to duration. The phrase 'since' and 'before the aion, (world) began,' occur in Luke i: 70; John ix: 32; Acts iii: 21; xv: 18; Eph. iii: 9. The phrase, Sunteleia tou aionos, occurs in Matthew five times, rendered 'the end of the world'; by Dr. Campbell, 'the conclusion of this state'; and in Hebrews ix: 26, in the plural form, rendered, 'once in the end of the world.' Also, 1 Cor. x: 11—tele tou aionos, (end of the world.) 2 Peter iii: 18, we have it connected with day—'the day of eternity'—tou aionos. Also, with King—'King of eternity,' or 'King of ages'—'eternal king.'—Tim. i: 17. It is also found, Eph. ii: 7; iii: 21; Col. i: 25, rendered ages, Com. Ver. and Eph. iii: 11, rendered eternal. Besides the above, we have the present world, or 'this world,' Matt. xii: 32; Mark x: 30; Luke xviii: 30; Gal. i: 4; 2 Tim. iv: 10; Titus ii: 12; Eph. i: 21; Rom. xii: 2; and 'the world to come,' Matt. xii: 32; Hebrews vi: 5.

"To these may be added, 'cares of this world,' Matt. xiii: 22; Mark iv: 19. 'Children of this world,' Luke xvi: 8: xx: 34. 'Disputers of this world,' 1 Cor. i: 20. 'Wisdom of this world,' 1 Cor. ii: 6. 'Rulers of this world,' 1 Cor. ii: 6, 8. 'Wise in this world,' 1 Cor. iii: 18. 'God of this world,' 2 Cor. iv: 4. 'Darkness of this world,' Eph. vi: 12. 'He made the worlds,' and 'The worlds were made,' Heb. i: 2; ii: 3. Once only it is rendered course, in connexion with kosmos, world, Eph. ii: 2, 'The course of this kosmos.'

"More than sixty times in the common version, aion is rendered by such words as express the longest duration. It also indicates a state of things, or course of arrangements, which we sometimes call a dispensation, state, or age. It is found about one hundred times in the Christian Scriptures.

"The word kosmos, translated almost uniformly world, which is found one hundred and eighty-four times in the New Testament, is in some respects very different from aion. Concerning the word kosmos, we would have it noticed, that it is never found in the plural form in the Christian Scriptures. There is but one kosmos, though different aions, found in this volume. Kosmos denotes the material world with all its elements—sometimes the universe; and, by a figure called metonomy, which substitutes the thing containing for the thing contained, the human family is often called the world. God is said to have loved the kosmos, but not the aion. The kosmos is said to have been founded; but the aions disposed, arranged, or constituted. The phrase 'foundation of the world,' occurs ten times, and always kosmos. But wherever mere time or continuance is implied, it is always aion, and not kosmos.

"As we have given all the places where aion is translated world, the English reader can easily ascertain where kosmos occurs. This data will afford him matter for reflection."

OPPOSITION TO REASON.

Every faculty which God has given us, has its legitimate and proper use; and we are not only justified in so using them, but a neglect in using them when the occasion demands their use, becomes a sin. If the blessings which he has conferred upon mankind, were given with the design to accomplish some definite end in the purposes of Jehovah, then, to neglect, or violate the manifest design of those blessings, is to violate the laws of God and nature. The fact, that God is the author of the human faculties, is proof that they were not instituted without a design, and their being bestowed upon man, is proof that they were created for his use. It is true, these faculties may be abused, or perverted, and applied to vicious purposes; but, because men do not appreciate the bounties of Heaven, it does not follow that they were not designed for a wise and good purpose. God has given us the faculty of seeing, and he has spread before us innumerable scenes of sublimity and beauty; thus affording to us the most wonderful sources of delight.

No one will dispute that there are mysteries in nature, which all the wisdom, the craft, and the ingenuity of man, have been hitherto unable to solve. But because of these mysteries, shall man say that it is unlawful to gaze upon them? that it is improper to gain what information he can, by observing their operations? No! By the use of his eyes, he has learned that the sun shines by day; that vegetation springs from the earth, and clothes it with the green fragrant mantle of Summer—that the planets and stars career among millions of revolving worlds, whose boundaries are the immensity of space, and whose centre is God—these he beholds, and though he can not tell how or why they are, yet he knows that they do exist.

But suppose that mankind had awaked from the bosom of eternity, ignorant of every thing sublunary? and suppose, farther, that they had first opened their eyes upon this world, in full possession of all their mental powers, just as the light of morning had begun to tinge the unclouded eastern sky, and beheld the gradual enkindling of golden light upon the azure curtain; and after trying in vain, for a few minutes to discover the cause of all this splendor, they closed their eyes and persisted in the resolution, never to look upon the scene again; urging, as an excuse, that it was unsafe to trust to their sight—that they should be liable to deceive themselves if they tried to solve the mystery by observing its operation and development. Would mankind ever have arrived to the knowledge which they now possess in relation to these things? Never! The sun would have shone without their knowledge. Vegetation would have sprung up, ripened and returned again to its native elements, and they would have been none the wiser.

But no! man sees too many splendors to pass them by unnoticed—too many beauties in the natural world, to regard them with indifference. The truth is, that of all the powers which a benevolent Father has given to us, the power of reasoning, of mentally penetrating the wonders of nature, and searching out the long hidden treasures of truth, alone has had human bounds set to its exercise. That, and that alone, it has been deemed prudent to restrict in its profitable exercise. And what is more singular than all the rest, mistaken men have set up their own unsupported authority in defence of that limitation. They argue, that because in a few isolated cases it has apparently led men into serious errors and difficulties, therefore reason is a dangerous guide. I say apparently, for I think it is not so in reality. It is rather the want of sufficient reason than the use of it, which has led men astray. They have had sufficient to discover certain immutable principles, and here their reason has failed them; and they have supplied the deficiency with sophistry, which from the force of prejudice or some other cause, they have been unable to detect. This has led them astray, not reason.

But suppose it were admitted that reason had actually led some men into error; what will the admission amount to? Is it not a fact that where one man has been deceived by reason, ten thousand have by the same means discovered all the truths they possess? Nay, farther, is it not true that the same individual who has adopted a few erroneous sentiments, has by the use of reason, acquired many, very many valuable truths?—Yes, none will deny it. And shall we, then, reject all means of acquiring useful knowledge, because in a few instances we may have fallen into errors? Certainly not. As well might the man refuse to study the planetary system, because he might at first sight, be led to believe that the sun moved around the earth, instead of the earth around the sun.

It is not always safe to rely upon the sanction of reason alone, but this is not necessary. We have an unerring assistant, when properly consulted, in the word of God. So that we are not compelled to depend upon our own resources to determine the truth or fallacy of our reasoning. But here I am met with a singular species of logic. I am told that I must not reason upon Scripture doctrine. This statement may be believed by those who are in the habit of believing unreasonable theories, but it requires too great a stretch of credulity to be adopted by reflecting persons. The farmer finds it necessary to reason on the best manner of cultivating his lands; the mechanic must use reason in his occupation, or his work will never answer the object designed; the merchant must reason, or he will be unable to meet his obligations, and so must the lawyer, or he will violate the very law which he professes to support—in fine, all men must reason, in every capacity, if they wish to be useful. Shall it be said that the Christian alone shall not reason upon that most important of all subjects, the Christian religion? So it is said. But under what circumstances? Why, the limitarian meets an unbeliever, and begins to talk to him about religion. He reasons upon the importance, the value of, and the necessity of embracing religion. He sets it forth in all the loveliness of truth, he urges its claims upon him, portrays the consequence of neglecting it; and his reasoning is so powerful, so convincing, that the man is compelled to admit the justice of his remarks. But alas! let the unbeliever attempt to reason in like manner with his adviser, upon some of the absurdities of limitarian tenets, and he will be told that he must not reason upon those points.

Why is this? why this sudden hostility to reason?—It is because the individual has some few darling errors which he wishes to support, but being conscious of his inability to do it by the assistance of reason, he seeks to screen them from investigation. It is because he is sensible that he is clinging to unreasonable doctrines. So long as he had reason on his side, he did not hesitate to use it as one of the most effectual weapons of defence; but no sooner does that fail him, than he goes to work, and demolishes the whole fabric which he has raised, by destroying the foundation upon which the superstructure was erected.

Such is the course adopted by modern revivalist preachers. Instead of telling their hearers to take heed how they hear, or to be always ready to give a reason to him that asketh, of the hope that is in them—Luke viii: 18; xxi: 8. 1 Peter iii: 15; they take a directly contrary course. The inconsistency of their actions and doctrines is so glaring, and so easily detected, that they cunningly tell their hearers not to trouble themselves about investigating them; not to listen to, or examine the arguments on the opposite side, but to get what their teachers call religion, as fast as they can, and trust to after considerations to determine whether what they have got is true religion or not. "If they can not look through the fence they must look over it"—that is, if the absurdities are too great to be glossed over with the appearance of truth, they must look over (overlook) them. But I want no greater evidence of intolerance, than that which is exhibited by preaching sentiments which can not be supported, and then commanding the hearer, under penalty of endless misery for disobedience, to swallow without reflection all that is said, and denouncing those who do not, as heretics and villians.

Now I ask, how am I to receive the Bible as the truth of God, unless it appears consistent with itself? And among the multitude of contradictory explanations of that sacred book, how can it be made to appear consistent, without the assistance of reason? Let my opposer lay aside reason for a moment, and read any book which he pleases, and what will he understand by it?—Just as much as he would to trace the characters of a hieroglyphic inscription, and no more. Let him lay aside reason, and attempt to describe goodness, or virtue, or any other principle, and his words would be a senseless jargon, as empty and unmeaning as the chimerical whisperings of a disordered brain. If then he can not make himself intelligible without reason, why expect others to adopt the same error? When the Quixotic opposer of reason will show that the Scriptures were given as a substitute for reason, and that the Bible may be understood without appealing to that judgment, to which it invariably addresses itself, he may succeed in supporting his beastly theory, by making man perfectly insane.

DUELLING.

Duelling is incompatible with the present improved social condition of mankind, especially so, with the habits and feelings of the great body of American citizens. To what are we principally indebted, for the present social comfort and refinement of a whole people? Certainly not to the genius of the duellist, nor to the usages and customs dictated by his spirit; but to the revival of literature, and the cultivation and improvement of the arts, and above all, to the influences of religion. Every advance in these, has been productive of, and accompanied by a corresponding advance in benignant and pacific principles, and a consequent elevation of the social character of mankind. It is the spirit of amity and kindness, then,—that which "makes man mild and sociable to man," that makes the present age what it is, and what distinguishes it so much and so justly from most of those which have preceded.

Now take into account, the principles and practices that, in the progress of society, have been exploded as nuisances and barbarisms. Among these, reckon what has a decided bearing upon our subject, the system of chivalry. Let it be admitted that knight errantry was an advance upon the social character of the ages that preceded—that Europe was visibly improved in mind, manners and morals by the different orders of knights, and that courtesy and refinement, such as they were, were spread far and wide by their efforts and influences And who then? Must we infer that the system of knighthood in all its parts and bearings, would be tolerated now? No—Richard Cœur de Lion, or even the chevalier Bayard, would be considered the corporeal representative of the impersonal Don Quixotte, and would be treated with the same contempt. Nor would the matter end here—they would be abhorred as a couple of blood thirsty bullies, fit only for the prison, or the mad house. It can scarcely escape the observation of any one, that the reason of all this, is comprised in the single fact—that chivalry like a thousand other institutions of former times, has become obsolete. It is behind the age. And to say nothing of the peace of society which it involved, it is deemed subversive of all the rules, and regulations of a well-ordered community.

And so it is with duelling. The duellist is an upstart knight, without his spurs, his principles, or his cool and deliberate courage. His principles are yet darker than the age from which they have descended; and exclusive of the injury which he inflicts, he awakens feelings, and diffuses a state of ferment and excitement in the public mind, inconsistent with good order. The onward spirit of improvement is the means, and the enjoyment of the highest and best social blessings are checked in their progress, and community feels itself thrown back upon an age of barbarism. It may indeed admire the heroism of the knight of the thirteenth century—or the desperate ferocity of the Highlander in even a later period. But its admiration begins and ends in the mere historic fact, or in the creations of the author of Waverly. It revolts at the atrocious and vindictive temper, which would bring up and embody on earth the crimes of by-gone days, and attempt to render them respectable in the middle of the nineteenth century. The pretence that dignity or honor is vindicated, or sustained by duelling, is both false and impudent—by it, both are frequently sacrificed at the shrine of revenge. S. R. S.

SUNDAY SCHOOL BOOKS.

We frequently receive orders for Sunday school books, which are so indefinite that we do not know what kinds to send. We have the "Catechumen's Guide," by W. I. Reese, "Scripture Doctrine," by S. R. Smith, "Jewish History," by M. H. Smith, "Life of Christ," by W. S. Balch, "Easy Lessons," by O. A. Skinner, "Ballou's Scriptural Catechism," and "Paige's Questions for Sunday schools and Bible Classes," all of which are designed for classes, and each school would want a number of each in proportion to the size of the different classes.—Besides the above, we intend to keep a good assortment of books suitable for libraries. Those who order, will in future please state whether they want the catechisms, and if so, how many of each, and what proportion of the amount they want in library books. G. and H.

A SLANDERING LIAR DETECTED.

This may seem too harsh a term with which to head an article; but when a man professing great piety and godliness, deliberately and wilfully utters that which he knows to be false, for the base purpose of ruining the moral, professional and Christian character of a fellow-being, merely because that fellow-being is a Universalist preacher,—when, I say, a man is so base, dishonest, and slanderous as to do all this for such unworthy and unchristian motives, I leave every honest man to say if the term liar is not well applied. But let the following letter speak.

Mr. Grosh—Sir—Believing that you advocate the cause of truth, I shall offer no apology for the following. Not knowing the place of Mr. Whiston's residence, I thought proper to inform you of a report circulated here respecting Mr. O. Whiston, by a man named Mr. Eli Clark, which I am confident is entirely false. Clark commences,

1. By saying that he formerly was a Universalist, and
2. That he was the founder of the Universalist society in Oswego, and when advocating the cause he was strong, but when alone he trembled.
3. That he first hired Mr. Whiston in Oswego as pastor of the Universalist society.
4. That Mr. Whiston told him that he did sometimes doubt the doctrine of universal salvation, but it would not do to say so.
5. That Mr. Whiston had become a miserable creature; the last time he saw him, he was so drunk that he could not sit still in his chair.
6. That he had since understood that he had become a perfect sot.

I have made inquiry, and am informed, and I verily believe (being somewhat acquainted with Mr. Whiston,) that there is not one word of the above true. The said Clark told me of persons belonging to the society in Oswego, that never did belong to any Universalist society. But I think the whole is a wilful, malicious falsehood, told for the purpose of injuring the reputation of Mr. Whiston.

Mr. Eli Clark now lives in the town of Hannibal, Oswego county, and is, or has been since living there, a Methodist class leader.

If Mr. Whiston should wish any further information on this subject, he can forward a line to John Gould, Fulton P. O., Oswego county, and it will meet with attention. Respectfully yours, John Gould.

Granby, July 30, 1838.

In reply to the above, so far as I am personally acquainted with circumstances, I answer—

1. Mr. Whiston has always been in good standing in the Universalist denomination—no charges of immorality have ever been preferred against him, as undoubtedly there would have been had he become intemperate.

2. I have known Mr. Whiston for upwards of eight years—during that time I have enjoyed considerable personal intercourse with him, and known intimately many others who were his most intimate friends and acquaintances—his neighbors and hearers—and during all that time I never heard any one even intimate a suspicion that Mr. Whiston was intemperate, or inclined to be so. I never saw any thing in his conduct which led me to suspect him of any such vice. And I appeal to all who saw him, whether even his appearance indicates such a practice.

3. Mr. Whiston is now, and for more than a year past has been, the pastor of the Universalist society in Cooperstown—settled with and among as moral a people as any I know of—and as highly respected by the virtuous of all denominations, in regard to moral character, as any man in that section—as any clergyman in that beautiful village.

I might add other statements not derived from personal knowledge, but I have written enough to satisfy all who believe my word, that if Mr. Eli Clark, of Hannibal, Oswego county, now or lately a class leader in the Methodist church, has told the foregoing tales, he has basely slandered a virtuous man—told that which he knows to be untrue, and richly merits the reprobation of every honest person.

I hope, for the honor of our common nature, and of our common belief in Christianity and its moral precepts, that the Methodist church of which Mr. Clark is a member and officer, will purge itself of such a rotten and unholy pillar in its edifice. A few such members would ruin the best society in the State, in the estimation of an honest and decent community, unless measures were taken to reform or expel them. We pray God that Mr. C. may repent of this his wickedness, and be led to pray God, if perhaps the thought of his heart may be forgiven him; for any one may easily discern that he is, indeed, in the very gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity. A. B. G.

P. S. Perhaps it would be well for Br. Whiston to let the public know about this Mr. Clark's Universalism, his membership in the Oswego society, and his share in hiring Mr. W. to preach there. If he can give no better recommendation of Mr. Clark's Universalism, than the above does of his Methodism, we shall be inclined to think that the man always had a religion "of the worst kind." A. POETRY.

[From the Universalist Watchman.]

MOUNT CALVARY.

What mean those hollow murmurs, that along
The heaving earth are heard? Why is the song,
Flung from the wind harp wild, so fraught with sadness?
Why hushed the thrilling tones of mirth and gladness?
See, fearful horrors gather round the sun,
The azure sky is veil'd in sackcloth dun.
The feather'd songsters fold their shining wings;
No more the air with wildwood music sings;
But sickly gloom, and horror shades the pall
That on the earth now seems about to fall.

What mean these portents dire? See through the sky,
Pale shadowy forms, on brightning pinions fly,
As from the cold dark grave they take their flight,
To blissful realms of everlasting light;
The earthquake's shock has rent the strong barr'd tomb,
The startled dead rise from the oblivious gloom.
Old hoary ocean wakes his angry roar,
Th' affrighted billows lash the trembling shore;
Earth's strong foundations to the centre rock,
And universal nature owns the shock.

Why rend the rocks? Why heaves the mighty deep?
Why wake the sleepers from their long, long sleep?
Why is the temple's vail now rent in twain?
Why brood those horrors round the holy fane,
Where erst the glory of the Lord appear'd
Like fleecy piles above the sunset rear'd?

See yonder on mount Calvary's bloody steep
A lone, dejected band of matrons weep;
And far away upon the green hill's slope,
With wistful eye, and heart bereft of hope,
The scatter'd remnant of that trusting band,
Who lately saw their much-lov'd Master stand
Above the billowy deep, when tempests peal'd
The eddying blast, and the frail vessel reel'd
Within the strong wind's grasp; he spake the word
"Be still," the sea obsequious own'd its Lord.
At his command back to the coral caves,
With shell like murmurs shrink the trembling waves,
Now raised on high, nail'd to the cursed tree,
The Saviour hangs in death's last agony;
Faintly life's visions flit before [illegible]
The damps of death are gath'ring on [illegible];
His plaintive prayer is murmuring o[illegible]le,
And the last throes his sinless heart assail.

For this the azure sky has laid aside
Her gorgeous robes, for this the sun doth hide
His blaze of glory in a shroud of gloom,
Dark as the banners that o'ershade the tomb.
O sight of sorrow! see the purple flood
Stream from his side, and stain the unconscious wood;
It is the crimson seat of covenant grace,
The testament of love to our frail race;
Love that o'ersweeps the dark'ning shades of night,
And bids our spirits rise on wings of light,
To view by faith the far and "better land,"
Where round the burning throne wing'd harpers stand,
Chanting melodious songs of ceaseless praise
To Heaven's King—Ancient of endless days. ANNETTE.

ORATION

Delivered in the Independent church, Richmond, Va., July 4th, 1838.

BY REV. E. H. CHAPIN.

Fellow citizens; I fear not the attacks of the foreign tyrant or invader upon our liberties. The day is too far advanced for them, and they are almost impotent.—Knowledge and reason are abroad with their light, and they would wither in the glare. To put the fetter upon our limbs and the yoke on our necks, they must roll back the wheels of half a century's progress, and check the mid-day sun. To prevent the course of opinion and sprinkle the free thought, they must bind the chainless winds, and stay with their puny arms the "down rushing waters" of the cataract! The meaning of the illustration portrayed upon the banner of your commonwealth is deeply understood, and "SIC SEMPER TYRANNIS" is graven in the hearts of the people as with letters of fire! Understand me here. I hope that the day for the use of physical weapons in our land is past. I hope that with moral power we should be successful against the foe. But, I repeat it, I fear not for my country, the outward enemy. If ruin comes—if darkness broods over the land—I fear that they will emanate from its own bosom! Let me impress upon your minds a few remarks upon this topic.

In the first place, then, if we would preserve our liberties, let us not be too eager for wealth. We should strive for an honorable independence, but should beware of a thirst for riches which sacrifices all else to its gratification. Money, it is true, is a great aid to the prosperity and power of a country; but remember also, that it has corrupting and enervating influences. What reduced nations of the olden time from their glory to weakness and slavery? Do we stand firmer? Is our course more brilliant theirs? If so, so it will not always be with us, if we yield up our very hearts to the attainment of wealth and great possessions. Strange! emerging as recently as we have done from poverty and obscurity, that we should take such rapid strides towards luxury and effeminacy. Wealth, it is true, has dug our canals, and constructed our rail roads, and built up our thriving marts. But these are not all a nation's glory. The requirements of the intellectual and the moral are superior to the physical, and if these are neglected, as they can not but be when they are devoted to golden dreams, we do worse than commit an error—we sin! And I would ask, if the monuments of our moral and intellectual greatness are equal to those which display our wealth and power? Are our morals any better than they were fifty years ago? Are they as good? Depend upon it, there is too much grasping after riches—too much avarice among us. I fear that we neglect too much the substantial, to attend to airy schemes and visionary El Dorados! It is a fact, that acquisitiveness is a predominant propensity of the age. It contracts our social feelings—cramps our literary energies, and threatens to poison the streams of our prosperity. Let us act upon these startling truths—let us be up and doing!—Surely, surely, my friends, it is better to live like the frugal Spartan even with iron coin, than to perish like the miserable and voluptuous Chaldee, amid the banquet and the revel!

Secondly, we must maintain the supremacy of the laws. They are the guardians of our property—our lives—our social ties—our best and dearest privileges. If we suffer one barrier of restraint to be levelled, even for a moment, we open a floodgate, through which may rush destruction, licentiousness, and death! Anarchy is one of the worst enemies to freedom, and it is only by justice and righteousness rigidly observed, that we can keep down the foe. This warning is called for. Events of fearful omen have agitated this land during these few years past. Mad Riot and lawless Force have stalked through our streets, our dwellings and our high places, with violence and with flame. Remember, if we take the [illegible] in our own hands, we take that which is not our right, we assume a power which only the people can delegate, and we commit public robbery by the assumption! Besides, by yielding to our own passions or the passions of others—by giving way to mobocracy and the excitement of the moment—we are weakening our moral power, and exposing ourselves to the designs of the bold tyrant or the crafty demagogue—those who shall rise up from our very midst and bind us. At first, gently they will lead us along; artfully they will insinuate concerning "oppressive laws, and antiquated customs:" little by little they will avert our eyes from our glorious institutions; until we are blinded—given up to man-worship—chained to the will of a leader—powerless! Then will the deceptions mask fall from the malignant features of a Caligula, or, extended from under the assumed garb of Liberty, the armed hand of a Cromwell will crush the last remnant of our freedom in its grasp! Oh! as ye would preserve that freedom—your noblest rights—your dearest privileges; rally around and support the laws of your country!

Thirdly, "The union must be preserved;" "United we stand divided we fall," is a true motto, and as true now as ever. The weakness of the one, the strength of the associated many, all can perceive. The horrors of civil war, of fraternal bloodshed, who can describe! Sorrow for our country, when the ties which were linked in the hour of danger, and cemented amid blood and battle flame, are torn asunder! Fellow-citizens; I have stood by the grave of the first martyr of Liberty, at Lexington, and my feet have pressed the green sod of Bunker's Hill. Several years of my life have been passed near that field of Bennington, where the brave mountaineer defeated the Briton, and gave the first impulse to those successes which resulted in victory. And now, I am far from my birth place, in your clime of the sunny South. Yet I am not an alien here, I can look proudly around me and exclaim,

"This is my own, my native land."

I am yet surrounded with monuments of my country's fame. I stand in a place hallowed by great names of my nation. I am in the vicinity of Yorktown, crowned with the glory of triumph. I am in the home and the birth place of Lee, and Henry, and Jefferson, and Madison, and Marshall! I am on the soil that embosoms the ashes of WASHINGTON.—You are proud of these; so am I—what American is not? And do we talk of dissolving the Union? We can not sunder the common soil that holds the dead, the illustrious dead, who were united in their lives, "and in death were not divided!"—Do we talk of dissolving the Union? Who claims an exclusive right to our red and holy battle-fields? Who will be the first to erase one star from that old, triumphant flag, that above our united hosts, has so often "braved the battle and the breeze?" Let us remember our common glory—the ties entwined around the hearts of this whole great nation—and feel that our honor, our happiness, our interests, are inseparably connected with Union.

Once more—as a preservative of our freedom, I recommend the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. In its purity, I urge it upon the attention of our countrymen. Not for the connecting of Church and State, not for the building up of one sect, not for the crushing of free thought, not for the increase of intolerance, bigotry, and fanaticism, but for the prevention of these and of other evils. I commend it, that its mild and benevolent spirit may pervade the hearts of the people. That its wisdom may direct our statesmen, our legislators, and all to whom are entrusted the destinies of our country. That its loveliness and its power may be known in all the extent of our vast territory. That the fountains of principle may be purified by it, and all our actions correspond to its precepts. That surrounded with the atmosphere of moral purity, which it is able to impart, our land may shine forth to the nations, beautiful and fadeless,

"While the earth bears a plant, or the sea rolls in waves."

The darkest realms of earth, are those where the Gospel is not. How they succeed who reject and trample it, read in the history of the French people. They contemned its authority, invoked Liberty, and Anarchy came. In storm, and darkness, and blood, it came!—Yes, it was Anarchy that obeyed the call, for they had contemned and thrust by the very dignity of Liberty!—With this chart of history before our eyes, let us avoid the rock upon which they split!

Guided by the blessed light of heavenly truth, and obeying the dictates of unerring wisdom, we will hope for the preservation of our freedom. God was with our fathers in the hour of peril; let him be our stay and worship in the hour of prosperity!

(Concluded in our next.)

DEATHS.

In Norwich, July 2d, ASA PELLET, aged 71 years.—The deceased had resided in this town for many years. He adorned to usefulness and virtue, a numerous and respectable family. His amiable and surviving companion grieves for the loss of a kind and faithful husband, and her children for a tender and affectionate father.—His love of justice and truth, his benevolent and philanthropic disposition, and his persevering habits of industry rendered him a patriotic and valuable citizen, a worthy friend and neighbor, and obtained for him the esteem of the whole community. With the sublime and blissful anticipations of an immortality of holiness and happiness for the whole human family, he calmly and peacefully sunk to rest in reconciliation with God and man.

By the request of the deceased, the writer performed the funeral services and gave a discourse in the Episcopal church to a large assemblage of sympathising friends and acquaintances. N. D.

BR. GROSH—It becomes my duty to announce the death of my revered father, WM. ROUNSEVILLE, which occurred on the 22d of May last, in the 65th year of his age. For more than thirty years, and long before he ever saw a believer in the doctrine, he cherished an unwavering faith in "the restitution of all things." This faith enabled him to endure the pains of sickness with composure, and even with cheerfulness—to look forward with joyous anticipation to the period, when he should meet, not only his family and friends, but a redeemed and purified universe in a better and happier world than this—where parting shall be known no more; and this faith, when his voice was almost stilled by the icy touch of death, enabled him to pronounce the cheerful anthem of praise, the joyous "Hallelujah to God." To one who questioned him as to the strength of his faith, and its efficiency in the hour of death, he replied, "My faith is unshaken—it must be true, it is so good to die by." Thus have we one more to add to the innumerable instances which prove, that a belief in the final triumph of holiness, will support the spirit in the hour of dissolution, "Let my last end be like his."

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.

NUMBER FIFTEEN.

BY S. R. SMITH.

RESPONSIBILITY OF UNBELIEVERS.

There are probably few persons, who do not suffer themselves to be deceived in respect to their views of the influence, which their opinions and practices may have over others. And there is, consequently, a similar liability to mistake the nature of human responsibility. For to say nothing of the deep-felt consciousness of responsibility to some higher power—it must obviously be graduated to man, by the ratio of influence which we may exert over him for good or for evil. And there is certainly something due to ourselves—to the high place which man holds in the scale of being—to his own character for moral perception and intelligence. So that were he isolated from his species, we still expect him to think and act like himself—like a man.

Men may be, and often are excessively indifferent to their own and the interests of others—but they can not absolutely wish to subject themselves to all the inconveniences of ignorance, inattention and vice. And from the nature of human feelings and attachments, they are never entirely reckless of the welfare of their friends. Such however is the astonishing effect of habit, that like inconvenient fashions, even deformities become unexceptionable. And thus it is with the moral caprices of mankind. However ridiculous, or stupid, or mischievous the moral habits and opinions of any one individual may be—there are always persons enough, who are ready to imbibe them, and in turn exert a new, and yet greater influence in their propagation. We need not confine our search for matter of illustration to any Christian sect, however extravagant; fresh and numerous examples abound among skeptics and unbelievers in every age and country. For insensible as the infidel may be to the light with which he is surrounded, he will probably retain sufficient influence to induce some one to shut his eyes with equal resolution. And this, not because there is truth and consistency in the procedure, but because there are young, or confiding, or untaught minds which can be charmed with singularity and absurdity. To such, it is no inconsiderable inducement to affect disregard for public opinion with unyielding perseverance. because it displays their spirit and gives them notoriety.

1. Were we to meet a man groping about with his eyes shut, we should not hesitate to advise him by all means to open them as soon as possible. We should tell him, that he owed the effort to himself, to his friends and to community. And that he was depriving himself of the benefits and enjoyments of seeing—and others, of all the usefulness of which he was capable. It is true, that such advice though it implied as much—would not absolutely prove that he could see; or if he could, that he would perceive only the same objects in every instance which were seen by others. But it would prove that they thought he would be immediately and greatly benefited—that he would escape many personal dangers and sufferings—that he would find an immense number of means of enjoyment, of which he could now form no possible conception—that he might be vastly more useful in society, and add one more to the number of those whose personal influence tended to the mitigation of human wo.

But this same man may be supposed, to keep his eyes closed, all this time. And it is not beyond possibility, that all your urgent suggestions, arguments and entreaties may prove unavailing. He may in defiance of all you have said, or can say, instead of opening his eyes, or using one effort to do so, reply—"I see nothing, indeed there is nothing to see. It is true, most people seem to think that I am in the dark; but so long as I am satisfied with my condition, it is no concern of theirs. They tell me of a thousand strange things about light and colors, the appearances of the earth and the heavens, and of the aspects and expression of the human countenance, concerning which my senses furnish no evidence, and which I shall never condescend to believe without proof to my own satisfaction. And from all that I have experienced, I have come to the conclusion that this great parade about my blindness and their sight—my misfortune and their privileges and enjoyments, is mere jugglery, a trick of imposture which they mean to carry by majority. For my own part, I am out of all patience with their pretensions, and shall stop my ears against hearing any more on the subject. And in the meantime, I intend to leave them to settle their superstition in their own way—except by occasionally endeavoring to convince them that they are a set of hypocritical knaves, or the dupes of such, and that they can never be otherwise till they adopt my opinions, pursue my course, and become philosophers."

It is difficult to suppose that such a person can be earnest—but if this be admitted, it will be inferred that he is not in his right mind, or that he has unfortunately become a fanatic to his theory. But you have no alternative in this matter. He will not admit either one, or the other—but on the contrary, he insists that he alone is in his right mind, and wholly exempt from fanaticism. And he is to be treated as a reasonable being, with all his feelings and attachments, influences and responsibilities about him.

Such in many respects, is the situation of the skeptic, or unbeliever. He is surrounded by those, who verily believe him to be in darkness. They insist that they now enjoy higher privileges, richer mental blessings, purer moral feelings, and more—infinitely more comforting hopes, than can be understood or appreciated by one who denies a divine revelation. And how does he dispose of these things? Just as the blind man does of the most urgent entreaties that he would open his eyes. He perceives nothing, and therefore concludes there is nothing for any one to see. Nor will he condescend to make a single effort, from which he can expect, or reasonably hope for the least mental or moral illumination. His reason is the eye of his soul, by which he will not question, it is his duty to test and determine the importance of every proposition. But does he employ that noble faculty? Has he done it, in the process that has led him to his present proposition—to the attitude in which he stands? Does he yet do it, or has he ever done it, as he would have others in reference to himself and his opinions? No—never. Nor has he originated one-half of the objections to a divine revelation, which he urges with such pertinacity, and confides in with so much assurance? In a vast majority of instances, these have been transmitted to him from infidel predecessors, or derived by him from some skeptical publication. These have been—these still continue the only sources whence his reasoning takes its direction, its color, and its character. On these all his arguments are founded, to them, they are inseparably bound.

Now it is plain, that he who can not originate every objection to Christianity, is also incapable of discovering all the answers and arguments which reason will and must approve, in its defence. And hence, on the ground of his own experience and practice, the unbeliever is bound to examine both sides of the great question at issue. He owes this to his own understanding—to the improvement and correctness of his reason. For on the supposition that his reason would have been imperfect without the assistance of infidel works, what right has he to presume that it is correct and infallible, without the further aid of the Christian argument? He despises the Christian as a bigot, who will not examine the objections to revelation; and ridicules his pretensions to reason in matters of religion, who has confined his researches to the doctrines of the sect of his adoption. Let it be admitted then, that such a mind is but imperfectly and partially enlightened, and that the Christian is responsible for every degree of ignorance and intolerance which adheres to such a course. And what then? Is the Christian alone responsible for his intellectual offences at the judgment seat of reason? Or is he the scape-goat on which the mental aberrations of skeptics are to be laid, and borne away into oblivion? Neither. Whatever his responsibility is—it is as great and as obvious in the unbeliever on the other side of the proposition. If he reasons exclusively on the objections to revelation—if he refuses to examine the answers to those objections, and the arguments for Christianity, he is plainly liable to the charges which he hurls against others, of inveterate prejudice and blind partiality. For thus doing he knows not, and can not know the strength or weakness of his position—whether his opinions are right or wrong, or whether his reasonings are correct; or warped and perverted.—And whether he is aware of these things or not—whether he has ever heard or thought of them or not—whether they affect him or not, is quite immaterial to the truth and propriety of the conclusion, that he is deeply responsible to his reason, and bound to purify it from prejudice and enlighten it with every accessible means of truth.

2. But the responsibility of the skeptic, or unbeliever, does not terminate in his obligations to his own mind. He is a man—with all the feelings and wants incident to other men. He must suffer where they suffer, and he must be sustained—if sustained at all, by the same means and influences which support them. He is not only liable—but actually subject to all the cares, perplexities and disappointments which fall to the lot of other men; and he seeks for such relief under them, as in his judgment is best calculated to effect the mitigation of those he can not cure. And he is like all others greatly concerned and interested to know the best means of acquiring and supporting a reputable character, and of securing the enjoyment of rational happiness.—These facts would seem too evident to require argument or proof. Nor would either be required, were it not that they involve in the present instance a train of responsibilities, in some respects peculiar to unbelievers.

As a general truth, the foundation of a good reputation is laid in personal integrity and virtue, illustrated in all the affinities and intercourse of man with man. It may not always be the immediate pass to distinction, but it is the only criterion of honorable and enduring fame. In proof of this it is only necessary to institute a comparison between King Alfred and Richard III—between Cardinal Woolsey and Howard the philanthropist, and between Bonaparte and our own Washington. This comparison may be extended to an indefinite length by the reader, and continued through every period of correct history. It may comprise in its scope, both Heathens and Christians—I should perhaps do so, in order that the universal sense of mankind may be taken on the relative worth of human character. Everywhere, in all ages, and under all varieties of condition, it will be found to rest in final approbation of the good and upright man. It concerns the skeptic or unbeliever personally then, to be fully acquainted with the best principles and maxims of practical virtue; and it is no less important, that the highest possible motives to their observance should be understood and appreciated.

But neither the light of nature, nor infidelity under any of its forms and modifications, has yet furnished either the best moral rules for the regulation of human conduct, or the highest and most effectual inducements to obedience. Nor need we go out of our own country for the evidence, that morality is generally considered by unbelievers, as mere matter of expediency—an accommodation of the practice to the prevailing taste and habits. The motive then—the prominent inducement to the practice of virtue, is reduced to the single point of public opinion. And if that opinion can be deceived—if the public eye can be avoided, where then is the motive to virtue?—There is none! Doubtless, there is much deference due to public sentiment—and every man is to be honored for the respect which he yields to its authority. But its influence should be suspected, when it becomes the invariable rule of human actions—and that morality must be of a very doubtful character, which is exclusively founded upon its sanctions. To fix the principles, and to ensure the practice of morality, higher and more worthy motives must influence the mind.

It is too well ascertained, to admit of confident denial, or successful contradiction—that the only true morality is inculcated by the Bible. For if it were admitted that the dictates of reason were sufficient to lead men to the very fountain of moral purity, still it must also be admitted, that by the mere light of nature, no people under heaven ever yet made the discovery. It can scarcely be supposed that the Hebrews could have done so, while the polished and philosophising Gentiles made for ages, no approaches towards correct principles or unexceptionable practices. And were it contended that the Jews had sufficient sagacity to discover without divine aid, the system of morals which they have transmitted to us—it would imply their immense superiority to all other people. This no skeptic would willingly admit. But he is denied even this consolation—for they constantly affirm that they received it by revelation.

Hence, on the ground of public opinion alone, the unbeliever is responsible for his conduct—for his perception of right, and for his views of morality. If he wishes to be respectable in the eyes of his fellow-men, that wish can only be gratified by a virtuous life. And as he has no reason to suppose that the mere influence of public sentiment will sustain him in every trial of his integrity, he is further responsible for his views of the motives calculated to support and direct him, when this pole-star of his philosophy fails. What the compass is to the mariner, the Bible is to the moralist. And its sanctions sustain him in his course of uprightness, when all other motives lose their power. For there he perceives, that though every mortal eye may be closed, and all human opinion may be indifferent to his actions, there is the eye of a Father—his own Father—upon him, by whose laws he is bound to conduct like a moral and rational being. And he owes it to human nature to inform himself of the morality of the Bible—to understand its superior claims to his adoption, and to acquaint himself with the enduring motives which it furnishes to a life of virtue.

But the unbeliever has still other personal responsibilities. He is a man, and feels and suffers like other men. And when perplexities throng in his path—when sickness stays the career of his thoughts, and lays him down to ruminate upon the past, the present, and the future, or when sorrow puts forth its might, and touches his very heart, how is he sustained? Above him, and around him, he sees no intelligent providence—no skilful and powerful hand, that can open his pathway, and which, by the aids of its own energy, can enable him to bear up in the full possession of his soul, while waiting for emancipation from the toils with which he is surrounded. And if he turns his eye back upon the past, he reads the history of a solitary wanderer, an isolated member of a numerous family, who has forgotten and forsaken his Father. He now feels the utter helplessness of his condition. Death, the tyrant of the living, stands before him in all the array of terrors—for he comes to close up the account of life forever; and there is no succor, no rescue, no reprieve. And in prospect—what a prospect! the cold, silent grave—a sleep that "knows no waking"—an utter extinction of being! Nor then, nor over the grave of kindred or friend, does hope yield any mitigation of his wretchedness, or mingle one ray of light with all his gloom. To be, was his only privilege—the very wish to be again, accumulates around him a deeper darkness, and an unavailing despair.

From the Bible, the Christian learns those truths which greatly alleviate the cares and sorrows of life, and which most effectually disarm death of its mightiest terrors. It teaches him that every moment of life is under the guidance, supervision, and guardianship of an intelligent and benevolent Providence; and that in the darkest and most trying scenes through which he may be called to pass, there is a latent good to be developed, of which he shall finally be the recipient. He may not be able to comprehend the means or to understand the process by which such a result is to be brought about. But arguing from what is known and obvious, he concludes that the general plan is still in progress, whatever may be the ways and means adopted for its accomplishment. These considerations give him a fortitude to endure, and a patience and serenity under the load of human sufferings to which the unbeliever is, and as an unbeliever, must be forever a stranger. He does not see how this great difference in mind can consist with a perfect similarity of situation. But perhaps he may form an idea from the situation of two children—the one perpetually conscious of the economy of an affectionate parent; the other left to buffet the storms of life, insensible to a father's care, counsel, or protection.

From the Bible, also, the Christian draws the evidence of those facts on which are founded the hopes that comfort him in his sorrows, and sustain him in death. He takes a last farewell of his kindred and friends, with the full assurance that they shall meet again where separation shall be no more—where life shall be exempt from suffering, and from sorrow forever. And he looks down into the grave opened for himself—and through its deepest gloom he sees death its only and final occupant. And he yields himself to the victor, now satisfied that he shall rise from the dust a conqueror, "through him that loved us."

And does the unbeliever fancy that he is under no responsibility for his contempt of these things! A rash or undutiful child may feel none, for his indifference to the commands or the benefactions of a parent! But is he therefore under none? Certainly, unbelievers have too much good sense to doubt that every such child is abusing his own privileges, insulting his benefactor, and meriting the sufferings which he daily endures. We are not now arguing respecting the authority of the Bible—we speak of it as it is—the fountain whence flows to the Christian, the strength that supports him in his trials, the comforts which soothe him in his sorrows, and the light that sheds a radiance and a glory over the "shadow of death." And the unbeliever knows that this book is accessible to himself—and he is urged and entreated to look into its pages, to sit down to the sober and dispassionate consideration of its contents—and yet he will not do so, because he does not already believe them, and because he is pleased to think that he is under no responsibility for his omission. But he is responsible as a thinking being; and he can not sustain the reputation of a philosopher, or a man of candor, until he tries the correctness of his philosophy by the moral principles of the Bible, and his reason and candor by the arguments in defence of a divine revelation.

3. The unbeliever is responsible for his opinions and practices, to every individual within the sphere of his influence. It is a common proverb, that such or such a man "is only his own enemy." But it is a common error, for nothing is more palpably untrue. And he who traces causes up to their legitimate consequences, will feel himself compelled to admit its absurdity. Particular actions may indeed bring down immediate, and alarming, and visible results upon their perpetrator. But no fact is more universally sustained, or in general better understood, than that serious and long-lasting consequences attach to others who are involved by kindred or condition in a given transaction. Take the drunkard for an example—of whom it is too often said, "he is his own worst enemy." Follow him to what is called his home, read in the face of his suffering and helpless wife and children, the tale of his folly and his unkindness, and his degradation, and then ask whose enemy he is? Who is the enemy of that wretched household? Who has blanched the cheek of her who smiled upon her infant charge, till want and shame changed smiles to tears, and stamped upon the face of peace the features of despair? Who did all this?—One who felt no responsibility to others, for his opinions and actions! One, who claimed the right of treating with contempt or indifference the arguments, the entreaties, and even the example of his friends!

All this, the unbeliever perfectly understands. He comprehends the nature and the force of the connexion which, in defiance of mere opinion, binds the consequence to the cause, and makes the drunkard responsible, whether he will or will not acknowledge his obligations. It is by no means intended to insinuate that the infidel is a tipler, or a sot. But he is bound to society by the same ties as other men, and is as certainly responsible for what he thinks, and says, and does, as any of the human race. And with his permission, we will now accompany him to his home, and see what is passing there. He too has a family of children, who look up to him both for support and instruction—for precept and example. His wife, after years of ridicule and reproaches—after hearing till her ears were dull, the reiteration of objections to her Christian profession, and oaths and imprecations against her puritanism, has become confused, and in despair has renounced all pretensions to religion. She has finally imbibed the temper and the genius of infidelity. And in doing so, has sunk into sullen dislike of all those topics which once occupied her thoughts—or with flippant and disgusting effrontery bandies the subject of religion as the butt of scandal and the object of her sovereign contempt. She too has resolved all virtue into expediency, and can maintain without a blush, with some of the most distinguished and literary champions of infidelity, that even adultery were no crime, if it were more common!*

And what influences may not be expected from such principles, and such admissions—not to say examples. When the fountain is vitiated or impure, the streams are so by natural consequence. The children of such parents, have no proper ideas of religion—they have no just conception of the nature and necessity of moral virtue, and they have none of the feelings of veneration and respect for a superior Being. The most daring blasphemy is uttered by them without shame and without remorse; and they grow up to spread in turn the influence of the moral contagion with which they are infected. No mother's soft and whispered prayer to God, steals in holy power upon their recollection when weighed down with years, or in a strange land, or bowed and crushed by the hand of affliction. They have no God but self—no pursuit but personal and physical gratification—no hope, no futurity, but the grave.

Happily, infidelity has not generally led its votaries thus far, in the road to moral ruin. But such are its legitimate tendencies. And it is believed that infidels themselves must perceive them, if they will but allow their minds to consider the steps which lead on to these results. But whether they will do this or not, their responsibilities are the same—to themselves, to the public, and to all within the sphere of their influence.

PRAYER—NO. II.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

In our last, we made some general remarks on the subject of prayer, and observed that it might be divided into individual, domestic and social. We wish now to bring before the reader the importance and necessity of domestic prayer. By this, we mean the introduction of prayer into the family circle. This kind of prayer is very much neglected, especially in our own denomination. True, there are few who will not acknowledge the duty and obligation. But then, so much the greater is the condemnation. "Happy is he that condemneth not that which he alloweth."

In the first place, it should be considered that the relation sustained by parents and children is the source of many blessings. Surely then, there should be some outward expression of gratitude for such favors. Parents should pray that their children may become useful to society; that they may be preserved from the vanities to which childhood and youth are subject. They should pray for themselves, that they may receive grace and wisdom to enable them to exercise such a government as shall fit them for eminent and useful stations in the world. For the relation involves peculiar responsibilities, in the fulfilment of which all need special guidance and direction.

In the second place, domestic prayer is urged upon us by its effects upon the young. It associates with religion all the recollections of childhood and all the sympathies of home. It gives to parental advice the sanction of religion, and in after life, recalls the mind to a conviction of duty to God, with all the motives drawn from a father's care and a mother's tenderness.

Instances of prayer in the family circle are found recorded in the Scriptures. Thus, it is said of Cornelius, that he was "a devout man, and one that feared God with all his house, which gave much alms to the people, and prayed to God always." While thus engaged, he was directed to send for Peter, who afterwards preached in his dwelling. We learn from this circumstance that God ever hears our prayers when offered in a suitable frame of mind. This alone, should be a sufficient inducement to engage immediately in the service, especially in the domestic circle.

AN ANSWER.

BY. REV. J. G. MCADAM.

"If Universalism be true, what is the use of believing it?"

The reason is very plain; viz., because it is true—a reason which is sufficient for every honest mind: and those who believe in any system, for any other reason, may never believe a truth in their lives. I would say, if Universalism be true, let it not merely be believed, but let it be preached, and spread wide as the heavens around us.—For it is a system as commensurate to man's spiritual wants, as the fair creation of earth is to his temporal wants. Like that system, it displays a golden sun by day, which is reflected back by a silvery moon by night; and in star-like beauty from behind every obscuring cloud. And, as the sun in the heavens knows no setting, until these magnificent witnesses of God's supremacy are ready to burst forth with their silent song of praise, and to invest the earth with a halo of heavenly splendor; so neither shall the sun of man's redemption, cease to pour its effulgence over the world, until its reflected radiance shall, in the rich garnishing of a Christ-bought world, lead the pure hosts of heaven to shout over a world redeemed, as over a world created, their long, loud peal of joy.

You may, or may not believe this doctrine; but the heavens declare it true. You may, or may not believe it, but reason unfolds its loveliness.—You may, or may not believe it, but we must believe it who wish to bend at the shrine of truth, whether that truth be approbated by the world or not—we must believe it, who prefer the Bible to human creeds, and the smile of God to that of man, for "this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth."

REFLECTIONS.

The following thoughts were occasioned by attending a funeral, and hearing in the prayers, sermon and address to the mourners, the distinguished sentiment of those Christians, who believe in the final separation of the human family, dwelt upon and enforced. The deceased was the wife of a respectable man; they were both of middle age. They had been united by the matrimonial bonds but a few years. The wife was taken ill, a lingering sickness ensued, and she was removed from earth. For her, the speaker entertained a hope that she was numbered with the blessed.—For the bereaved husband, in his present situation, he had no hope. He even considered the present dispensation of Providence as a judgment or punishment.

And is this the prospect which Christianity unfolds to the view of the children of mortality, that those who are here united by the most tender ties, are to be forever separated, and their situations made infinitely dissimilar; one raised to the highest degree of felicity, and the other consigned to the regions of interminable wretchedness?—Some may think so—I can not. The riches of the Gospel reveal a prospect more congenial with the better feelings of our nature, and infinitely better calculated to afford consolation to the bereaved and afflicted. In the Gospel we learn, that God is our Father, that we are the offspring of one common parent, destined by his own immutable purpose finally to enjoy one and the same everlasting home.

Many reasons may be adduced to show that the views advanced on the occasion referred to, can not be in accordance with the Gospel of Christ.—And in the first place, they altogether fail of affording consolation in seasons of bereavement, when our kindred and friends are taken from us. This is one of the characteristics of Christianity, it is capable of satisfying the desires and wants of man, and of giving solace and comfort in seasons of adversity and sorrow. This principle of the Gospel is recognised by the prophet, when he represents the Lord as saying, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money, and without price. Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread, and your labor for that which satisfieth not? Hearken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness." Isa. lv: 1, 2. The same characteristic is plainly pointed out by our Saviour. "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up unto everlasting life." John iv: 14.

Now any supposed view of Christianity, which fails to satisfy our spiritual wants, and to comfort our hearts, must be, and is necessarily wanting in something requisite to constitute it the "pearl of great price." He who has drank deeply at the Gospel fount, has no distressing apprehensions in relation to those who have departed this state of being. The well-instructed Christian trusts in God, that in removing his creatures to a future state of existence, he will not cease to bless; that there as well as here he will regard them with a Father's love and mercy. Happy, thrice happy, are those who possess this faith.

And how important is it, that he who would impart the balm of consolation and hope to the sons and daughters of affliction, should come "in the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ." It is impossible, however, for those who entertain the common views on this subject, to console the mourner with the words of hope. "They rather give despair than consolation."

In the case which elicited these remarks, the bereaved husband was exhorted to regard the voice of God speaking loudly to him, to believe and repent that he might have eternal life, and thus it was implied, secure an inheritance in the mansions of blessedness with his departed companion. No hope of this could be indulged without an immediate preparation. In the language of the text, chosen on this occasion, he was exhorted to be "also ready." To comply with the speaker's requisitions was represented as "casting anchor in the blissful bay of heaven." But when righly viewed, how cheerless a hope is this! All rests upon the steadfastness of our faith and the stability of human virtue. How many of those who "entertain a hope," through the weakness of human nature, return to the beggarly elements of this world. Life is not more uncertain than that those who possess this faith, and are now in the path of virtue, will remain firm and faithful to the close of life. All is depending on human effort—yet how uncertain is life, how frail and changeable is man.

Another reason why we consider the views advanced on the occasion referred to, erroneous, is, it is impossible that they should ever be realized. That is, it is impossible for a part of those whom affection and kindness have united here, to be happy hereafter while the others are miserable. It has been most truly said, that the same blessings we ask for ourselves we desire for our friends.—How strangely my fellow Christians err on this point! Expect to be perfectly happy while your friends and relatives are miserable!—I might as easily be convinced that I am to be, and not to be at the same time.

Heaven—a home, a state of felicity for all—all of every kindred, clime, character and condition—this is a heaven worthy of our contemplation.—Its happiness will consist in part, in knowing that those who were separated by death's cold power, are reunited in a state where death and separation are unknown.

OLD AGE.

To the young and buoyant, there is something in even the thought of old age, seemingly horrid and dreadful. They regard it as the period of helplessness, misery, and pain. They imagine a thousand attendants of mature age, as fraught with naught but ill. Such is the nature of man, his proneness to repinings and discontents, that he frequently mistakes in his conclusions. An all-wise Providence has so fashioned us, that in whatever in situ we may be placed, we may be content with our lot. Happiness is not confined to the restless, short-lived season of youth, but is found in every grade and station of life. 'Tis not confined to the rich or poor, great or noble—the pure in heart alone can find it. ASA.

GAL. VI: 1-10.

Man's mission upon earth is one of warfare.—Against evil, in all its forms, he is perpetually called upon to act as sentinel and soldier.—The scene of hostile action is within. There the enemy, assuming the garb of friendship, makes his insidious approaches; there, attempts the citidel of conscience. There, upon a throne of authority sits judgment, as the representative of Deity, piercing the disguises of the enemy, and directing against him all the powers of resistance and of conquest with which the soul of man is gifted. There, the flesh warreth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; or, in other words, there the perverted propensities of our nature clamor for the unrestricted regulation and direction of our conduct, while there, also, conscience sits in stern severity commanding the intruders to silence, and charging the soul to resistance of temptation, and to an unflinching performance of right, of duty.

Of thousands of the conflicts waged by these antagonist principles, no eye, save that of Heaven, is witness. But we must all confess how oft we fall before the assault of the baser foe. We may conceal our frequent discomfitures from the eye of man, but in our own souls we know how frequently the wily temptations of the enemy prevail against our better judgment. To this melancholy and self-condemning consciousness the apostle exhorts his brethren, and us, to repair when, upon some occasion or other, the similar failures of others come before the recognition of man—when we are tempted to be severe in our judgments, censorious in our remarks, and harsh in our conduct. Against such unjust and ungenerous conduct towards others when they fall before the power of temptation, we should be proof were we only to reflect how frequently we, perhaps unseen of men, fall before the same, or equally unworthy temptations, and ask ourselves how we, in similar circumstances, would wish to be treated by our brethren. Yes, this is the true moderator of severity in our judgments, and harshness in our conduct towards an erring brother.—The Christian reader can readily recur to an instance in which his Master and Teacher appealed to the same consciousness of failure, and thereby checked the cruel ebullitions of a censorious spirit.

There are numerous instances in which the happiness of mankind would be much promoted, if this charitable conduct were to supersede the too common rigorous severity of treatment with which those who are "overtaken in a fault" are generally visited. The recollection of our own imperfections and liabilities to fall, and the thought of that different and kinder manner which we would wish exhibited to ourselves in similar circumstances, would check in legislative proceedings, in conversation and in the heart the ready disposition to censoriousness and severity. Every one will readily grant that an undue severity has been manifested towards moral delinquents by legislators, and by neighbors. Our penal enactments are, undoubtedly, undergoing a salutary amendment in this respect, which we are disposed to ascribe to increasing knowledge of the true character of the Deity and his government, and of the moral constitution of man, as well as to the lessons of experience. But were the apostle's principle of action carried into operation upon all occasions, we would behold not only improvements in the penal code, but also in all our social relations, affections and transactions, in our domestic and scholastic discipline, and in our capabilities of enjoying as well as diffusing happiness. When a brother was overtaken in a fault, we would feel almost as if we had fallen before the power of temptation ourselves, and we should be nearly as anxious as himself to do away with all the stinging recollections of the fault, and to have him strengthened for the next encounter with a panoply of defence which the power of temptation might assail but never overcome.

> Then, gently should we scan our brother man,
> "Still gentler, sister woman," knowing, and giving full weight to the bard of Scotia's couplet,

> "What's done, we partly may compute,
> But know not what's resisted."

The best method to be convinced of the apostolic exhortation, is to make trial of it. To let no opportunity pass, where we were wont to be severe, without endeavoring to be more sympathising, and more charitable in our judgments, remarks, and conduct, will go farther to produce an abiding and influential conviction of the propriety of the enjoined course, than all the earnestness of men, or all the eloquence of angels. When thus endeavoring to assist our neighbors in bearing their burdens, we will enjoy the ennobling consciousness that we are fulfilling the law of Christ. This will be a rich reward, and a powerful persuasive, also, for continuance in that well-doing which we have had under consideration.*

There is another topic in this paragraph which well merits the attentive consideration of every one who aspires to Christian excellence and perfection. In the 6th verse the apostle exhorts the Galatians to impart a share of the good things they enjoy, to those who devoted themselves to instructing them in the doctrines and duties of religion and morality—in the things which related to the newly introduced revelation from Heaven. To convince them of the appropriateness of this support, he says that it will naturally flow from a disposition to cultivate and improve their mental and moral condition—their spiritual or higher nature. He tells them also, that those who manifest no disposition to cultivate or improve their higher capacities, could expect to reap none of the fruits which can be obtained from this part of our constitution when duly cultivated. This was a law of the moral world just as invariable as that in the physical, which holds that without sowing there can be no reaping. As God's laws, therefore, were fixed, they need not deceive themselves with any false expectations of advancing in mental or moral excellences, without a proportion of their time, labor and attention being devoted thitherward. And if they had a desire of such improvement, they would encourage among them such teachers as they found capable of promoting these desirable ends. Lastly, the apostle informs those to whom he writes, that from a devotion of the whole of their time, wealth, and energies, to the gratification of their physical wants and capacities of enjoyment, would yield them only short-lived joy, whereas from a dedication of themselves supremely to the improvement of their higher nature, they would not fail to derive enjoyments pure, unalloyed, and everlasting.

These are, certainly, truths of "great pith and moment." Are we sufficiently attentive to them?—we, in this age which vaunts so loudly of the "march of intellect." Are we as individuals, as members of a family, of a nation? Or regardless of them, are we supremely devoted to the gratification of our animal and lower propensities, engrossed in procuring the necessaries, conveniences, and luxuries of the flesh? Are we deceiving ourselves by expecting noble or lasting pleasures, while neglecting the cultivation of our better natures? In the age of the apostle there were few books, and copies of these were only to be had by the opulent. Are we so solicitious for our advancement in knowledge and virtue, that we neglect no aid of books, of living teachers, of conversation, of meditations, of practice, within our reach, to accomplish these purposes? If we had the wish would there not be a way? If we were in earnest, what aid would we neglect? "We pause for a reply."

THE GOSPEL.

The apostle Paul in his letter to the Galatians, writes: "and the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the Gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blest." The promise here referred to, is first recorded Gen. xii: 3. It is several times repeated in the Scriptures, with trifling alterations in the language: so that the passages in which it occurs, when taken conjointly, read, "In thee, and in thy seed, (which is Christ,) shall all the nations, kindreds, and families of the earth be blessed." It should be observed—

1st. That this promise is universal. It embraces every human being who ever lived, or shall hereafter live. For there never was, there is not, neither can there be, upon the earth, a single individual who was not, is not, or will not be a member of some nation, family, or kindred. And

2d. It is unconditional. There are no contingencies of any character or description connected with it. The plain declaration is, that all shall be blessed in Christ.

This promise proves Universalism. Just so certain as the Deity is a God of truth—just so certain as he is faithful in the fulfilment of his promises—will all mankind be eventually blest in Christ. This conclusion can not be avoided.—The most plausible objection ever urged against it, is founded in the supposition that the promise being noticed does not relate to the future state of being. It is supposed that it has reference to a period, when all who are then living upon the earth, shall have a knowledge of the Gospel, and be blessed in the enjoyment of its faith. But this view of the subject is attended with several difficulties, which can not be set aside.

1st. The promise under consideration is called the Gospel. It can not, therefore, relate to any time, circumstance, or event, that shall occur upon the earth: for the Gospel brings "life and immortality to light." 2 Tim. ii: 10.

2d. The common view of this promise involves an absurdity. If the Gospel promise refers solely to a period to take place upon the earth, when all who are then living, will be blessed in or for believing the Gospel, when that period arrives, the people will be blessed simply for believing that they are blessed; for the Gospel promise being then fulfilled, there will be nothing else for them to believe.

3d. The promise does not affirm that all who live upon the earth at a certain time shall be blessed in the earth. There is nothing of this kind intimated. The declaration is plainly, that "all the nations, families, and kindreds of the earth shall be blessed in Christ." The promise as evidently refers to those nations, etc., that have already gone down into the grave, as to those who are yet unborn. And as many of these former were never in this world blessed in Christ, the promise must relate to the resurrection state.

4th. St. Paul so understood it. It was beyond the grave that he looked by the eye of faith for its fulfilment. In his defence before Agrippa, he said: "And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers.....For which hope's sake, king Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews." And he immediately adds the question: "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead?" (Acts xxvi.) In another place, he says: "Touching the resurrection of the dead, I am called in question this day." (Acts xxiv.)—Here the apostle maintains that he is accused of the Jews and judged for the hope of the promise made by the Deity to his fathers, and he so closely connects that promise with the resurrection, as to declare that it is "touching the resurrection of the dead he is called in question." What has the resurrection of the dead to do with the matter, if the promise relates to circumstances to transpire in the earth? Nothing is more evident, than that the apostle believed this Gospel promise would be fulfilled in the immortal state, when all the nations, families, and kindreds of the earth shall awake from the slumber of the tomb, to an "inheritance, incorruptible, undefiled, and which fadeth not away forever." Hence he affirms; "And now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first fruits of them that slept.....For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." When all who die in Adam are made alive in Christ, all the nations, families, and kindreds of the earth will be blessed in the seed of Abraham.

Such is the promise of the Gospel. It was given by our heavenly Father for our comfort, support, and happiness. It is calculated to sustain us in all the varied circumstances of life, and to impart consolation when laboring under the afflictive allotments of Providence. In believing "we enter into rest," and "rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." J. H. G.

LIBERALITY.

Brs. GROSH AND HUTCHINSON—Permit me to state a few facts, and let the public judge of the spirit which prevails in the Calvinistic Baptist church of Maryland, Otsego county, N. Y.

After it was ascertained that the friends of Universalism in this section had employed Br. E. E. Guild to preach a part of the time in Maryland and Worcester, the Partialists became disturbed, and on the third Sunday of May last, Elder N. D. Wright, of the Baptist church in Maryland, either from curiosity or for the purpose of discussing with Br. Guild, came to hear him preach.—After the sermon, Elder W. sought an interview with Br. Guild, and in a gentlemanly manner introduced the subject of Universalism, and gave his views in objection to the doctrine, with that candor which characterizes the sincere inquirer after truth. On the third Sunday in June following, Br. Guild received a polite challenge from Elder W., requesting him to appoint the time and place for a discussion of their respective sentiments.

It had previously been ascertained that the Baptist meeting-house in Maryland, where Elder W. occasionally preached, could be obtained for Br. G. to hold a meeting on the third Sabbath in July, by consent of Elder Mumford, the present pastor of that church; and, consequently Br. G. made the arrangements as follows—that Elder W. would preach a sermon in the forenoon of the third Sabbath in July, at the Baptist house, from any text of Scripture that he might select, in proof of the doctrine of endless misery: and that Br. G. would preach a sermon from the same text, in reply, according to the terms of the challenge given by Elder W. Notice of the above arrangements were given to Elder W. and accepted by him.

As soon as the discussion was announced to the public, a wonderful commotion took place in the church of which Elder W. was a member, and of which he had been the faithful preacher for fifteen or twenty years—in fact, until within a few years past, when his health having become poor, they employed Elder Mumford. But when the state of Elder W.'s health would permit, Elder M. always requested Elder W. to preach. But at this crisis, Elder M. and his brethren became alarmed—a church meeting must be called—and the proposed discussion must be taken into consideration by Elder M. and his church members. The result of the discussion was anticipated by Elder M., and he very cautiously advised his church to pass a resolution that Elder W. could not have the privilege of holding the discussion in their house! Elder M. assigned as his reasons, that Elder W. would have the affirmative, and Br. G. the negative, and that Br. G. would close the debate, and that the people generally did not understand the Scriptures, and could not distinguish sophistry from truth, and, therefore, Elder M. concluded that Br. G. would have a decided advantage over Elder W. The church not desirous to have their creed examined publicly, and tried by the testimony of Divine truth, passed a resolution that the discussion could not be held in their house!

This act of the society towards Elder W. evinced a spirit of illiberality towards a man far advanced in age, and known and esteemed for his good character, Christian deportment and liberality, both as a private citizen and as a public teacher, in the community in which he resides. Elder Wright's friends were disgusted with the proceedings of the church, and the Elder himself felt mortified that his church would thus treat him. Finding that he could not occupy the house for the discussion, he left the place for Auburn, some few days before the appointed time for discussion.

The Baptist house was built by voluntary subscription; a number of Universalists, and the community in general having paid tolerably towards the tion of the house, with the express understanding, that when the house was not in use by the Baptists, it was to be opened to all other denominaerections. In accordance with that understanding, and from the fact that Elder M. had previously given his consent to have Br. G. preach in the house on the third Sunday in July, according to appointment, Br. G. went to the church with the expectation of preaching a sermon in the afternoon—not for the purpose of discussing with Elder W., but with the intention of fulfilling his appointment previously made at that place.

Elder M. made an appointment at ten in the forenoon. A very large congregation assembled. Our friends attended from 30 or 40 miles distance. Elder M. took the desk, and after the usual ceremonies, he selected for his text, "For the Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost." Luke xix: 10. The Elder, after recovering from the embarrassment under which he apparently labored, proceeded with his discourse, and after "repeating," and "further remarking," and saying it "being evident from every other consideration," and numberless like expressions, with which he detained the congregation from two to three hours, left off wholly exhausted.

I appeal to the common sense of all unprejudiced minds present, if they could ascertain what he wished to have his hearers understand was the meaning of the text, other than that the Son of man mentioned in the text meant Jesus Christ. For he cited several passages to prove that it was true, and pledged himself to his hearers that he could cite a great many more passages to prove the same fact.

After Elder M. had pronounced the benediction, Br. G. asked permission to explain to the assembly the reason why the discussion was not held as appointed. That was granted. Br. G. then gave the reasons in exoneration of Elder W. and himself, which were satisfactory to the hearers, who had taken the trouble to attend for that purpose. Br. G. then asked permission to use the house that afternoon for religious worship, inasmuch as Elder M. had not given out any appointment for the afternoon. Elder M. then stated that he did not know how the church would feel about it, and said some thing about the trustees. Br. G. then inquired who the trustees were.—Elder M. said he did not know who they were, and although some of the trustees were present, and were very kindly asked (by those who had paid towards building the house,) for the use of the house that afternoon, yet Elder M. and some of his friends refused to allow Br. G. the use of the house, although it was called for by three-fourths of the congregation present!

The course pursued by the Baptists produced general dissatisfaction among the people, and a respectable number of the members of the church expressed their entire disapprobation of the whole proceedings on the part of Elder M. and his coadjutors in illiberality. S. S. BURNSIDE.

UNITED STATES CONVENTION.

A question as to the powers and duties of the U. S. Convention of Universalists has been raised in Maine, and the delegates from the Maine Convention are instructed to press it at the session in September next.—Br. Drew, of the Gospel Banner, has publicly requested the Union, Trumpet and this paper to publish the opinions of their Editors upon the subject. The question is this—"Are the members of all the State Conventions necessarily in fellowship with each other, in virtue of the fact that the respective Conventions with which they are connected belong to the U. S. Convention?"—Br. Drew further states a case—"If so, may not a person expelled by one Convention as unworthy of its fellowship, remove to another State whose Convention pays no respect to the acts of discipline of the first Convention, and there succeeding, by some means or other, in gaining the fellowship of that body, is he now in fellowship with the Convention which expelled him?" If sent as a delegate to the U. S. Convention, can the delegates of the first Convention recognize him as in fellowship?

Br. Whittemore in reply to a reiterated demand for an opinion on the subject, says he is in doubt, but will wait and see what others say on the subject, when he will endeavor to come to a correct conclusion respecting it. When an Editor so much my senior finds it convenient to wait for others, I would scarcely be blamed for observing similar caution in committing myself, and shouldering a little responsibility on an important question—but as an opinion from my pen is worth nothing more than a similar opinion from any body else; and as a timely expression of various opinions may enable those in doubt to take sides, with clear minds, for or against the desires of the Maine Convention, I feel willing to forego all praise for prudence and modesty. So, here goes!

The United States Convention can neither give nor withdraw letters of fellowship from individuals, or societies, or associations. It, therefore, knows delegates to it, only as the representatives of their several State Conventions. It gives fellowship to, and can withdraw fellowship from, only those State Conventions. And in my humble opinion, the only grounds on which it can withdraw fellowship from those State Conventions, are, 1st, a violation of the Constitution of the United States Convention and the rules and laws framed in accordance therewith; and, 2d, a violation by a State Convention, of the Constitution which it had at the time of its admission into fellowship, or of the laws and rules which it has passed in accordance therewith. I can conceive of no other proper cause for withdrawing fellowship. To disfellowship the N. Y. State Convention for not observing rules enacted by the Maine Convention, would be as ridiculous as to declare the State of New-York out of the Federal Government, because it did not observe the laws of Pennsylvania forbidding the circulation of notes less than five dollars.

I consider the cases perfectly analogous. Each State Convention is independent of all other State Conventions in regard to its own Constitution, by-laws and regulations; and the United States Convention has no right over them, save to require of each of them obedience to its respective constitution, and to the Constitution of the U. S. Convention. Of course, if the State Convention sends the proper number and the proper kind of delegates required, the U. S. Convention has no more to do in the matter—the Convention sending them must be its own judge of the qualifications of those whom it selects as its representatives. If, as a member of the Council, any delegate so appointed, acts unworthily, the Council can, of course, take him in hand and try, acquit, or reprimand, or expel him in accordance with their own rules; but not for acts committed when he was not a member of the Council, nor yet at the request, nor in obedience to the laws of a State Convention of which the said delegate is not a representative or even a member.

Suppose a case for illustration.—The Vermont Convention passes a rule that any preacher engaged in secular employment, or not preaching more than one half of his time, shall have fellowship withdrawn from him as a preacher of the Gospel. Br. A. B., living near the New-York line, a man of good moral character, falls under this rule and is disfellowshipped. He moves into New-York, where no such rule exists, is fellowshipped, and is sent as our delegate to the U. S. Convention.—The Vermont delegates ask that their rules and acts of discipline be respected by the New-York Convention, and that A. B. be expelled, and the New-York delegation be so far vacated. What would this be, but compelling the New-York Convention to adopt the Vermont rules for fellowshipping ministers? Br. Drew may rely upon it, that such a stretch of power in the U. S. Convention would shake off the State Conventions from its support, as the north wind scatters leaves from the trees in a frosty Autumn! No—let the State Conventions remain sovereign and independent, as are the States in which they severally are located—as united as you please in the U. S. Convention, but sovereign and independent of each other.

"But," Br. Drew may say, "the question proposed was not intended to embrace rules of mere form and expediency, but moral considerations." Well, all I have written was intended to bring forth that explanation; for, certainly, the question was a general one. I have considered it as a general one, for I desire to caution those who lay down rules, lest they make them arbitrary, and cause, ultimately, a violation of first principles. The principles I have laid down at the beginning of this article, are, I firmly believe, correct; and if correct, they will furnish a solution of, and allow a remedy for, Br. Drew's difficulty.

Moral obligation is universal, while conventional forms are only local and temporary. Every State Convention acknowledges a good moral character to be indispensable to its fellowship, whatever it may say or do in regard to literary attainments, duration of trial, or portion of time employed in ministerial labor. In my opinion, therefore, while the U. S. Convention has neither the right nor the power to compel any State Convention to respect the merely conventional rules of another State Convention, it has the right and should have the power of compelling a State Convention to regard its own acknowledged moral obligations. By "compelling," I mean, simply, that it can ask obedience, and if that is refused, that then it can and should withdraw fellowship from said Convention.

I have given my answer fully and plainly as I can. It would have been given sooner, but other and (to me) more important matters caused me to forget Br. Drew's request. Be my opinion worth reading or not, it is simply this—

1. That no rules of any one State Convention, not based on strictly moral obligation, are binding on any other State Convention; and that the U. S. Convention has neither power nor right to interfere between them, in regard to such rules, or with their members or delegates fellowshipped contrary to such rules.

2. That all moral obligations and rules are universally acknowledged as binding upon all, and that the U. S. Convention has the right and should have the power (if it has it not), to insist on each State Convention's observing them; not because another body requires it, but because itself admits that observance to be just and necessary.

3. That if Br. Drew's question, and the instructions of the Maine delegation embrace the first position, their demand will be dangerous as it is improper, and must be resisted, even at the hazard of losing that Convention from the United States Convention—yes, even unto the dissolution of the United States Convention itself.

4. But if it embraces only the second proposition, then the request of the Maine delegation should be complied with, as soon as may be in the power of the United States Convention to grant it.

As to whether the U. S. Convention has now the power—or if it has not, which would be the best mode of procuring it or exercising it, these are minor questions, and can soon be settled, when the subject under consideration is fully understood and agreed in.

A. B. G.

NEGLECT OF PUBLIC WORSHIP.

There is a strange and unaccountable neglect of attendance on the public worship of God, among several classes of people, who, nevertheless, profess to love the Gospel of Christ and to revere the institutions of religion. This neglect is the more inexcusable, because in many instances it occurs among those who have no rational excuse to offer—who are in perfect health—in circumstances that would enable them to attend the stated ministry of the word on every Sabbath in the year—who can assiduously attend to all their secular business and never lose a day—whom no weather can detain, no storms prevent in any worldly pursuit—and yet they are scarcely seen in the temple of divine worship twice in the year! We propose noticing two or three classes of these worship neglectors, and the frivolous excuses they offer for such disregard of acknowledged duty and of a distinguished Christian privilege.

1. There is a class who occasionally speak of this neglect with apparent regret, and some seeming compunction. But they attempt to excuse themselves by saying they are not in a condition to render any pecuniary aid to the society with which they would choose to worship, and they feel a degree of embarrassment and self-reproach in attending meetings statedly and regularly, and yet contributing nothing towards the payment of Church debts, the support of the ministry, or other necessary expenses of the society. This excuse, may appear somewhat plausible at the first view, or to sordid or superficial minds; but it is in reality utterly groundless and unsatisfactory to every enlightened Christian. It is true, pecuniary aid is always acceptable, and always necessary to be derived from some source, where societies are in debt for their meeting-house, or have a salary to raise for their minister. But "the poor shall have the Gospel preached to them." And no Christian society would desire those to contribute pecuniary assistance, who could not do it without injuring or distressing themselves or families. But suppose they are able to do a little without injury. That little is as much for them and is as acceptable as the much from the rich. But again, suppose they are not able to give any pecuniary aid.—Is it hence right, is there any propriety in their wholly absenting themselves from public worship? Surely not. It is a sin against God, against society, and against their own souls. The Gospel is free, and "whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely." There is always room—there are always vacant seats—and the society is always glad to see them there.

Each individual counts one—each fills a vacancy—each has either family, or connexions, or friends, with whom he has some influence; and his example is of importance to them. Is it right because you have no money to give, that you should withhold what you can give, and give, too, without injury, nay, be the gainer by giving? your presence, your influence, your example. Think of it, and think what a miserable excuse you have been attempting to give for the neglect of an acknowledged duty.

Are you poor? Then you need the consolations of the Gospel to sustain you in your poverty. Are you destitute of money, or this world's goods? Then strive to be rich in the things of the kingdom—rich in faith, rich in example, rich in praise and devotion to the God who made you, to the Saviour who became poor that you might be spiritually rich. Think of the ingratitude you manifest towards the Saviour. Think of the bad example you are setting before your family, your friends, and the world. Think of the good you might do to your own soul and to the cause of truth by a regular attendance on the public worship of God, and by interesting yourself in that cause and inducing your neighbors and those with whom you have influence to attend with you. If you have no money to give, you ought to feel under quite as strong, or stronger, obligations to exert all your influence otherwise to make up the deficiency.

2. Another class of neglectors of the worship of God pretend to excuse that neglect by saying that they are so busy through the whole week, so incessantly occupied from Monday morning till Saturday night in their necessary avocations of business, in their secular pursuits, that they want some relaxation, some pastime, a walk, or a ride abroad, in order to take the wholesome country air, etc., that they may be fitted to resume the coming labors of the week with renovated vigor.

So, then, you worship mammon so devoutly through six days of the week that you can not worship God even on the seventh! Who gives thee strength to labor six days? Who feeds, and clothes, and nourishes thee?—Who gives vigor to thy frame, health to thy countenance, and strength to thine arm to perform thy necessary labor? And canst not thou give to him and his worship one day, or a part of one day, in seven? We are not of the number of superstitious and fastidious bigots, or snarling cynics, who would make it a mortal offence for a man to walk or ride out on Sunday for air or exercise. But surely you do not wish to ride all day, nor walk all day. You have ample time both to ride and walk, and to attend the worship of God besides. Can you not spend 90 minutes in the A. M. and 90 in the P. M. in public worship, and still have time enough for all necessary exercise. Suppose a part of your exercise should consist in riding or walking to church, (according as the distance may be,) what harm would it do you? Would it not give exercise both to body and mind—ay, and a healthful exercise too, that would do you good "as it doth the upright in heart"? Are you willing to forget God and neglect his worship during life, because you can not find time to attend to it? You can find time for any thing and every thing else. What can be of greater or more solemn moment than this?—How will your families and your friends regard your religious character if you pursue such a course of utter neglect? And what say God and your own conscience? "Awake to righteousness, and sin not."

3. Another class is made up of loungers who are too lazy to do any thing else on the Sabbath, but to pervert Scripture to countenance their neglect. They say the Sabbath is emphatically a "day of rest," and they mean to rest on that day—that "the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." But instead of resting as rational and immortal beings, they "wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction," and fairly stagnate in both body and mind, as if inactivity were positive happiness. They cry "a little more sleep, a little more slumber, a little more folding of the hands together." They will lounge upon the bed, or doze away under the shade of trees, and gape and yawn, from morning till night, impatient for the day to wear away, as if for that day they were but a herd of fattening swine.—The consequence is, as to the body, they are not actually as much refreshed with rest, nor as fit for labor on the following day, as if they had attended on the worship of God a part of the time, and quietly and rationally employed the rest of the time at home. And as to the mind, it becomes stupified, stagnant, besotted and barren; like the desert of Arabia, it yields nothing to the visiter but clouds of sand to fill his mental eyes and suffocate his moral lungs.

Man was made for activity both of body and mind.—Either, if allowed to be inactive, becomes torpid and powerless, and inflicts a severe penalty on the transgressor of the laws of physical and moral nature. The Sabbath surely is long enough for attendance on public worship, if any where within a reasonable distance, and for all necessary rest. And he who bows in humble and grateful adoration before the all-bountiful Giver of his being and all needed good, and listens to his sacred word on the Sabbath, is better prepared to fulfil the task of the week and the duties of life, and surely better able to bear up under trials and misfortunes, than the idle lounger who squanders that blessed day in inglorious and besotting lethargy.

Let, then, the poor who has nothing to give but his heart, his presence, his example and influence, be sure to give them. They are always acceptable to God and the church, and will make him rich in faith and spiritual wealth. Let the lover of exercise and pure air, at least exercise himself so far as to "walk to the house of God in company" with his worshipping children on each returning Sabbath, and inhale the pure air of rational devotion. Let the yawning and lounging idler, who kills time and injures his own physical and moral nature by indulgence in disgraceful laziness, awake to a sense of duty and the dignity of the nature with which God has endowed him, and no longer neglect or abuse his high prerogative. And let all who habitually neglect the house and worship of God, remember that this is not only a great sin against God, society and themselves, but that it exposes them to the contagion of many other sins and vices, that public worship would happily tend to save them from, and deprives them of one of the greatest privileges and sources of happiness that man enjoys on earth. ELOCUTION.

This is a subject closely connected with excellence and usefulness in all public speaking, and properly understood and practiced, must add immense weight and energy to the preached word. The teachers of it have not yet been sufficiently encouraged in the interior of this State, and their labors, as well as the subject itself is seldom appreciated by community at large. It should be more attended to in our common, and especially in our higher schools. Every man and woman who wishes to become a good reader and speaker in the social circle, or even to understand the precise sense and beauty of what they read in private, should bestow considerable attention to, and receive lessons on the subject. Mothers, from whom the infant receives its first rudiments of speech, should learn enough of its principles in relation to the simple elements of sound, to enable them to teach understandingly and rightly their precious charge. What numerous cases of defective speech, stammering, and erroneous habits of pronunciation would be prevented thereby—what music added to the inflections of the voice—what pain, and mortification, and ill health, even, would be saved to the unhappy subjects of erroneous early education!

Professor King has been lecturing on the subject in this city, and from his lectures and illustrations, as well as from the praises which have been bestowed on his instructions wherever he has been engaged in teaching elocution and reading, and in curing defects of the voice, I am satisfied that he thoroughly understands, and is able to communicate agreeably his instructions on the subject. Mr. King is travelling westward, previous to an attempt to get up a class in this city, and most cordially do I commend him, and the subject of his labors, to the favorable attention of the public.—They will find his lectures full of valuable instruction, and his readings and recitations chaste, dignified, and interesting. There is nothing violent or extravagant in gesture or manner; but ease, grace and nature preside over all—and his analysis developes the full and precise meaning and beauty of all he reads or recites.

THE EXPOSITOR.

The Expositor, due in July, but delayed for want of copy, has just been received. I have not had time carefully to peruse it, but from hastily running over its contents, it appears to me nearly if not quite equal to any of its predecessors. An investigation of the miracle of Manna in the wilderness, and the Scriptural references to it, forms the leading article, and appears to be a thorough one. The several articles by the Editor, are in his best style, and that on Christ and Christianity, by T. B. Thayer will be found worthy of careful perusal and consideration.

It is to be regretted, (for the Editor's sake, not for the sake of his readers,) that so few correspondents are ready to sustain the necessary variety of this work by their labors. It makes the labor of the Editor too great—it displays a coldness, or indolence, or inability on the part of our brethren which should not be displayed, and it lessens the interest of laymen in the work. May this complaint not exist long. A. B. G.

"THE UNIVERSALIST REGISTER, WITH AN ALMANAC, FOR 1839."

Just published, and for sale at this office, wholesale and retail, at $3.50 per hundred, 50 cents per dozen, and 6 cents single.

CONTENTS.—An Almanac calculated for the Eastern, Middle and Western States, generally—with tables of high water for Boston and New-York, Chronological remarks, and objections to Universalism answered. A Register containing a list of 448 Universalist preachers, and their address, in the United States, territories and British Provinces.—Fifty eight societies formed, and twenty-eight meeting-houses erected, within the past year, or omitted in previous years—fifteen Conventions and fifty-four Associations, with their times of meeting, Standing Clerks' address, and date of organization—miscelianeous information of churches organized, Institutes formed, schools established, etc., etc.—and a list of Universalist periodicals, their Proprietors, Editors, places, times and terms of publication. The articles in support of Universalism, are among others, "The Balances. The false Balance—The just Balance," "The Propriety of the title Universalist," "The Will of God," "According to The doings of man—The purpose of God," "Wages—Gift," "An Enigma," and "The Creed of A. C. T.," (the two latter are poetical,) by Ev. A. C. Thomas, of Philadelphia; and "1837-38," "Dormant Societies," and "A short sermon—Eph. i: 13, 14," by A. B. G.

GLAD TIDINGS AND LADIES' UNIVERSALIST MAGAZINE.—The first number of volume one, New Series, is before us, enveloped in a spacious cover, which is to be given quarterly, while the paper itself is to appear weekly hereafter. It is edited by Br. S. A. Davis, as usual, and from its hitherto advancing course, the ability of its Editor, and the neatness of its appearance, it gives evidence of increased and increasing zeal and numbers of Universalists in the region of Pittsburg. Success to it, for it is worthy. A. B. G.

THE RECORD.

Other matters have prevented my earlier attention to this subject, and there is now a long list of arrears to bring up. I commence with CONVENTIONS.—The Pennsylvania Convention met in Easton, May 16th. J. Wood, Moderator, and S. P. Landers, Clerk. Brs. J. Kingsbury, Sheshequin; S. W. Fuller, Philadelphia; and S. A. Davis, Pittsburg, were appointed Committee of general correspondence—Brs. Thomas, S. W. Fuller, Bartholomew, and Davis, (clerical), and E. Dallett, F. Bailey, S. Hartz, A. Swart, J. M. Keim, and W. Taylor, (lay) delegates to the United States Convention; and Landers, Hussey, and S. W. Fuller, to designate the day and place of next meeting. Adjourned. Sermons were preached by Brs. Hussey, Thomas, Landers, and Bartholomew.

[The excellent circular letter having been published in our columns during my absence, must be my apology for thinking that an abstract of the minutes had also appeared in our paper.]

The New-Hampshire Convention met June 16th, ain Walpole. Hon. J. Healy, Moderator; A. L. Balch, and J. V. Wilson, Clerks. The Committee on fellowship and ordination, reported letters granted to Brs. J. W. Bailey, N. Gunnison, E. Dow, A. A. Miner and W. M. Fuller; and ordination conferred on W. S. Cilley and J. W. Bailey. Appointed Br. M. Ballou, Standing Clerk; J. Moore, Woodhouse, and M. Ballou, Committee on fellowship and ordination; Willis, Moore, and Balch, Committee of discipline; A. L. Balch, preacher of the next occasional sermon, and Willis of the Communion sermon; A. L. Balch, Shrigley, Claverley, and J. Moore, (clerical), and D. Farnsworth, J. Cheever, A. P. Smith, A. Alexander, and A. Waterman, (lay) delegates to the U. S. Convention; and A. L. Balch, to prepare the minutes and circular.—Thanks were presented to Br. Sanford, for the occasional sermon; to the inhabitants of Walpole, for their hospitality; to the Congregational society, for the use of their house; and to the Moderator for his services. At the passing of this vote, the venerable Moderator made a feeling address to the Council. Sermons were preached by Brs. W. S. Ballou, Sanford, H. F. Ballou, J. Moore, and H. Ballou. Fifteen preachers from New-Hampshire; three from Massachusetts, and three from Vermont, were present. Four Associations were represented, and more than 200 sat down to communion on the second day of the Convention.

Adjourned to meet in Nashua, on the third Wednesday and Thursday in June, 1839.

The Illinois State Convention met on May 11th, in Henderson, Knox county. Brs. E. B. Mann, Moderator, and A. R. Gardner, Clerk. Fellowship was granted to Br. A. Kinney, of Juliet, and the society in the same place. Adopted the reports of the Committee of discipline—"no complaint"—and of the Treasurer of the "Institute." Appointed Brs. A. Kinney, J. Brewer, and J. B. Spare, Committee on fellowship; L. Chapin, L. Hamlin and E. Rose, Committee on discipline; J. P. Fuller, Henderson, Standing Clerk; T. Buswell and L. Hamlin, Trustees of the Institute. J. B. Spare, a delegate to the U. S. Convention; A. Kinney, to preach the next occasional sermon; and Kinney, C. Ewalt, B. Chadsey, Spare, D. B. Emery, and J. P. Robins, Committee to solicit funds for the Institute.—Resolved to meet in Extra session in Juliet, on the third Saturday and Sunday in September next, for the purpose of transacting business not infringing on that belonging to the annual session.

Eight sermons were preached by Brs. Mann, Kinney, Wadsworth, Gardner, and probably one other—Br. Fuller taking part in the services. Adjourned to meet in annual session in Rushville on the second Friday in May, 1839. A. B. G.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE CELESTIAL BIRTH.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

See the poor spirit here encased in clay,
Spins it a shroud of sins and mortal woes,
Then draws itself within, and seeks repose.
And hath it yet no brighter, better day?
Lies it thus hopeless down to dull decay?
When the bright morning of redeeming love
Opens the rose-buds in the fields above,
Then the sin-woven shroud shall fall away,
And the tired spirit wake, and float abroad,
Robed in celestial beauty like its God!
Then shall it rest where mortal woes ne'er come,
And nestle in the arms of seraphim,
Whose soft, entrancing smiles are never dim,
As thro' long years they welcome spirits home.

THE WORSHIP OF NATURE.

The ocean looketh up to Heaven,
As 'twere a living thing—
The homage of its waves is given
In ceaseless worshipping.
They kneel upon the sloping sand,
As bends the human knee,—
A beautiful and tireless band,
The priesthood of the sea.
They pour the glittering treasures out,
Which in the sea have birth:
And chant their awful hymns about
The watching hills of earth.

The green earth sends its incense up,
From every mountain shrine,
From every flower and dewy cup
That greeteth the sunshine.
The mists are lifted from their rills,
Like the white wing of prayer,
They lean above the ancient hills,
As doing homage there.
The forest tops are lowly cast
O'er breezy hill and glen,
As if a prayerful spirit passed
On nature as on men.

The clouds weep o'er the fallen world,
Even as repentant love,
Ere to the blessed breeze unfurled
They fade in light above.
The sky is as a temple's arch,
The blue and wavy air
Is glorious with the spirit-march
Of messengers of prayer.
The gentle moon—the kindling sun—
The many stars are given,
As shrines to burn earth's incense on,
The altar-fires of Heaven!

ORATION

Delivered in the Independent church, Richmond, Va., July 4th, 1838.

BY REV. E. H. CHAPIN.

[Concluded from our last.]

[We can not occupy this part of our paper better nor more acceptably to our readers, than with the remainder of this Oration, which contains the addresses, and will be found touchingly affecting—that to the children unites simplicity with this quality. "Would that we could have heard the whole Oration," is the general wish of the Author's friends. A. B. G.

A few brief addresses, and I close.

Old men—Fathers of the Revolution, wherever ye may be! Life, truly, is uncertain, and many of the young may go down to their graves before you. But, in the usual course of nature, it will not be long ere you pass from the scenes of earth, to rest with the honored dead. To some of your number, it is probable that each return of this day is "the end of the mysteries," and the gratitude of full hearts poured around them is "the closing libation." Time, who has laid his hand so sternly upon your ancient brows, is an ever-faithful monitor. Look around you, then, with your dim eyes once more, and tell us if you ever dreamed of a time like this? Tell us if hope of such a day, cheered you at that solemn time, when you left the plough mid-furrow or the harvest half gathered? When the call of battle was at your thresholds, and your wives and children hung, trembling, upon your lips? Oh! tell us, if, in the dark hour of conflict, amid smoke, and flame, and death, when the companions of boyhood were falling on your right hand and on your left—when your little band grew weaker and weaker, and the foemen pressed hard upon you—tell us if then, "through the thick gloom of the present," you indeed saw the "brightness of the future, as the sun in heaven?"

Old men!—Tell us of that hour of danger, for soon the seal of death will be upon the kindling eye, and dust upon the eloquent lips. It is a history which we would have impressed upon us, and we would hear it fresh from the warm hearts of those who saw and felt, for we fear that we shall hear it but coldly from the formal record of the crumbling trophy. Fathers "leaning upon the tops of your staves," bless us before you die!

Mothers in the land!—Teachers at the cradle-bed and the hearth-stone! To you belong high responsibilities. He whose name is the loftiest upon our annals, felt a mother's influence. You know its power; you know that a mother's voice, soft and low, speaks to us like conscience in all future years. Mould, then, the young mind aright. Gently lead it in all the ways of virtue. Teach it to love its country and its God! And when the time of peril shall come—when sacrifices are to be made—you may present your children as your richest gift, exclaiming like the Roman matron, "these are my jewels!"

Ye who are the influential and acting men of the age: Be firm, be just, be true. You are our examples, and may we learn from you wisdom and righteousness in conducting the destinies of our country. The eyes of the world are upon you, and as you act, so may our land become a by-word or a blessing. Fill the stations which you occupy with dignity and with virtue—with honor to your forefathers—to yourselves—to posterity!

Young men—Companions! Do we learn deep wisdom from a day like this? Our Fathers will bequeath the places of trust, of honor, of profit, unto us, and we shall stand up among the nations. We shall take our stations as the rulers, the guides, the voices of this vast and mighty land. Are we ready for our duty and is our armor on? What vicissitudes shall fall to our lot, the All-wise only knows. May we be nerved with moral strength for the hour of trial, temptation and danger. And may the God of the nations be our aid!

Children!—You have been looking upon things which are meant for the celebration of a time, when those old men whom you see around you occasionally, went out with muskets and gleaming swords to fight against those who would have made them slaves. You will know more of this, by and by. Your mothers will relate it to you, and these same old men will take you upon their knees, and tell you stories of bold and famous deeds. Do not forget what you have heard this day. And when you hear the word "Liberty," remember that it means a precious principle. And if one asks you, if you would give away your Freedom, tell him, that many years ago, your fathers crossed the great ocean and made their homes here, and suffered, and fought, and died for freedom, and answer "No!"

Fellow-citizens!—Ours is a pleasant and goodly inheritance. Pleasant and goodly, with its fertile fields, its vallies and sunny hills, its noble rivers and broad lakes, its grand and awful mountains! It is truly a great land. Our eagle, so feeble at his starting, soars upward and onward, the proudest and the best! Wonderful are the changes which within a few years, have been wrought in our country! Powerful are we in the van of civilization and improvement! But remember the moral power which we are called upon to exert; for we are examples to the rest. Remember that from us the nations have learned, and may yet learn, Liberty. Let us strive with moral energy for the universal extension and triumph, not only of political, but as connected with this, of intellectual and moral freedom. We hope for that day. We may not see it. Our children may be denied the sight. But if it may not be that our mortal eyes shall be blessed with such a view, yet we hope that the rays of that glorious morning may beam upon places now dark and desolate, and that the notes of the mighty jubilee will swell and thunder above our graves! May the Poet's vision be realised. May the nations, indeed, like those in the ancient "torch-race," pass the glad light from hand to hand, until the flame is kindled upon every altar, and every sea and every shore is lighted by the blaze.

MARRIAGES.

DEATHS.

DEATH OF BR. SNEATHEN.—Rev. STEPHEN ABBOTT SNEATHEN, pastor of the Universalist society in Brunswick, Me., expired about 12 o'clock, on Sabbath July 22d, an appropriate day and hour indeed for him to enter his final rest in the Sabbath joys of heaven. Br. S. was a young man of good talents, handsome and ready address, of a character without blemish, and was very useful in the cause of divine truth and righteousness. The society in B. were greatly attached to him, and in turn, he was devoted to them for his Master's sake. As a preacher, Br. S. dwelt but little on contested points of doctrine. Believing Universalism to be true, and exhibiting it as the great basis of his sermons, his labors were mainly directed to the promotion of the experimental and practical duties which that doctrine requires. And in this the past year, through his instrumentality, the society in B. has enjoyed a revival of religion, which has shown itself in the devotional spirit of his people. But his labors on earth are ended, and he has gone to the enjoyment of that happiness which constituted his hope on earth. By his death, our cause has sustained a serious loss.

We are not sufficiently informed of his history to give a biographical notice of our deceased brother. He was born in Salem, and commenced his ministry in Massachusetts. We understand he was twenty-seven years of age, and that he had labored as a Gospel preacher about five years. He had been in Brunswick about two years. Early in life he met with a serious casualty, which rendered him a cripple, and his constitution was feeble. His funeral took place on the Tuesday following after his decease.—Gospel Banner.

In the town of Ohio, Herkimer county, July 19th, WM. FOX, aged 21, of consumption. This withering disease, weakened his frame, and destroyed his physical powers. But his mind firmly stayed on the God of salvation, increased in beauty and strength, becoming more and more meet for the inheritance of the saints in light, until in the final hour of dissolution, his soul repaired to his Father and his God. Funeral services by J. G. McADAM.

PROPOSALS

For publishing by subscription, a volume of REV. WM. C. HANSCOM'S sermons, late pastor of the First Universalist society in Waltham, Mass., together with a memoir and likeness of the Author.

Since the death of Rev. William C. Hanscom, many of his friends have been desirous of encouraging the publication of a selection of his sermons. It is almost needless to say that wherever he was known as a preacher, his pulpit services were in a high degree acceptable, and that many of his discourses were heard with admiration and profit. He has now departed—and as he a short time previous to his death, directed that his manuscripts should be placed in the hands of the subscriber, it has been judged proper to issue proposals for the publication of a select number of his discourses.

It can not be supposed that considerations of a pecuniary nature should induce us to take this step. Another motive prompts us. We do not feel willing that the valuable sermons of our departed brother should all be silent, even now, that the hand which penned them, writes no more. He can speak to us in the voice of truth, although in the grave. If, therefore, sufficient encouragement be given, the work will be issued without delay. JOHN G. ADAMS, Malden, Mass.

CONDITIONS.

The work will be printed as soon as a sufficient number of subscribers shall be obtained to defray the actual expense.

It will contain a short memoir of the Author's life, with a likeness, and a sufficient number of his sermons, and other productions, to make a volume of upwards of two hundred pages duodecimo, neatly printed, on good paper and fair type; at seventy-five cents per copy, payable on delivery.

These "Proposals" will be forwarded to the ministers of the denomination generally; to the special friends of our departed brother; and to others known as friends of Gospel truth. These are all affectionately requested to act as agents in obtaining subscribers.

☞ Subscriptions to be returned as soon as the first of September, to G. W. Bazin, (Trumpet Office,) or Abel Tompkins, 32 Cornhill, Boston. ☜ Subscriptions received at this office.

"Search the Scriptures."—JOHN v: 39.

Our Lord Jesus Christ was the author of our text, and the Jews were the persons he addressed. As the books of the Old Testament were all the revelation which they had in possession at that time, and these were then properly the Scriptures, these and these alone must have been intended. We shall not, in this stage of our subject, attempt to prove that the obligation is equally binding upon us, and that it is equally necessary that we form an intimate acquaintance, both with the Scriptures of the Old Testament and the New. We think the necessity and the propriety of this course, will eventually be manifest to all. We do not say that the Scriptures are the only revelation which we have from God. He has exhibited his wisdom, his goodness and his power, in the living, moving, speaking world which surrounds us. We need not ascend up into heaven, or descend into the lower parts of the earth, to find evidences of a God, or to learn that his powers are infinite. Every object which surrounds us, from the mountain to the mole hill —from the grandest to the humblest of nature's works—are witnesses of the power, and the wisdom, and the goodness of their great Creator.

But how came we to form these conclusions and these conceptions of a God? Thousands have had these same works, these same evidences before them, and yet have drawn no such inferences.

The answer is ready. Revelation pointed us to God—taught us to look upon these things as the work of the all-wise, omnipotent Creator; and we found in them a confirmation, an assurance of the truth of Scripture, while the Scriptures, in turn, illustrated and explained the works of God.

In fact, without revelation, the book of nature, as it is called, had been a volume sealed to man. The former has been the key which unlocked the latter, exhibited it to the view of man in all its perfection, its glory, and its beauty, and enabled him to see that God was indeed a God of wisdom, of order, of harmony and love. You see that man is an inhabitant of earth. You see too, that he is subject to a law which he can not control. He is mortal, and must die. This, and a thousand evidences of a superior power, have convinced mankind in all ages, that they were the production of a power superior to themselves. Now among those who are destitute of revelation, or having it, deny its teachings, what account do we have of the origin of man? We answer, a thousand contradictory fables. Take the account of the creation as recorded in the Bible—take it, I say, and compare it candidly with any and all other accounts of man's origin ever given by man, and if you value truth or consistency, you must prefer the former.

But I am to consider that I address believers of the Scriptures—those who feel and acknowledge their dependence upon God—those who recognize the sacred volumes as a revelation from him, one which is able to make them wise unto salvation, and which contains rules for the regulation of our conduct in all the events and circumstances of life. It is a lamentable fact, brethren, that even among professed Christians, the Bible is either very little read, or else read much to very little purpose; for it is obvious to every man, even of limited information, that no one book so extensively circulated, is so little, so very imperfectly understood. Now there is somewhere a cause for this. I, it is true, may be incorrect in my opinions, still, in enforcing the duty of our text upon your consideration, I can not consistently, with my appreciation of duty, avoid noticing some of those reasons why men do not read the Word of God more, and why they do not understand better when they read.

If I were about to direct a person on his way, in a road where I had travelled, I should be likely, not only to give him information in relation to the route he should pursue, but also such cautions as my own experience or observation should dictate. If I had been misled from want of caution or deceptive appearances, or had seen others mistake the road at some one point, I should endeavor to give him such information as would prevent him from being turned aside from his route by similar causes.

This is the course I intend to pursue upon the present occasion. I have been some times a reader of the Bible, when I felt and knew that I did not understand it; and I supposed that I never should, until it pleased God to perform some thing he had left undone. I have read it, too, when I found little in it but seeming contradictions, and I have left it unread, because, to speak plainly, I hated to read it! I have seen and conversed with others in similar situations—have heard them express their opinions and feelings, and from these sources, have made up my mind in relation to the causes of men's indifference to the Scriptures—their want of understanding of the Bible, and their rejection of the Word of God.

One reason of the indifference of men to the Scriptures, and their dislike to the Bible, is, I believe, to be found in their early education.—You have all noticed how much children dislike study, as a general thing—especially studying what they do not understand—and how eagerly they engage in the ordinary sports of youth.—Now it is an incontrovertible fact, that the mind requires its exercise as well as the body; and if the exercises provided for the mind were as well adapted to its wants, and as judiciously selected, as bodily exercise is, the person would engage in it with corresponding eagerness. Let a man send his boys to the field to play ball, day after day in succession—let them be required to continue their sports without cessation, except for meals and sleep, and how long do you think it would be, before they would beg and entreat to go to school to study, or to labor upon the farm?—Take, yourself, a dictionary, or a city directory, and sit down and try how long you can amuse yourself by learning a succession of words or names. When you have become tired, throw it aside, and note the time that has elapsed. Try again the same experiment with some book which you understand, and which interests your feelings, and mark how long it will be before you become wearied. Now, a book which a child does not understand, is as barren of interest, as insipid, as tiresome, as disgusting to him, as a dictionary was to you.

Again—you do not expect that a child—a boy of ten or twelve years—will be able to perform as much labor in the field, as a full grown man.—Neither ought to expect that his mind will have the strength and capacity of maturer years.—Therefore a study may have interest for you, which has none for him.

Once more. I think it very probable that you might, for a week, or a day, interest yourself in the house of the President of the United States, in viewing the house, its different apartments, its furniture, pictures, etc., etc., pass the time very agreeably. But let bolts, and bars, and locks be put to the doors, and I doubt not you would be making efforts to get out, in less than an hour. Well—the secret of all this is, you like to be led, and dislike to be driven.

Still, again—you have appetite, and perhaps prefer a particular kind of food. You would, however, dislike very much to be continually kept upon it, or to eat an excessive quantity at a meal. Let me also say, that the mind has its wants—its appetites, if you please—but still they are limited, and demand variety. Now, for one moment look at the course pursued with children in their religious instruction. The Bible is put into a child's hands, and he is commanded to commence and read it through in course, or required to read a certain number of verses or chapters, some where, every day. Reading is what is required—but understanding is another question. Now suppose that the child absolutely reads as is required of him. He performs it as a task; it is, in fact, to him, a task of the most irksome kind. He reads, just as you could con over so many words in a dictionary—anxious to get through, that he may mix in the sports and plays of his companions. Soon the child begins to view every hour and moment devoted to reading as so much subtracted from his time for amusement, and actually wishes there was no Bible for him to study! I have known instances (more than one) where a child has been compelled, as a punishment for a fault, to commit a certain number of verses to memory, from the New Testament!—And can you wonder that children thus dealt with, should regard a similar task as a punishment, under other circumstances? In looking at the first lesson selected for Sunday school children, some time since, I found that the first chapter of John had been selected for them to commit to memory. It begins—"In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." Certainly there is very little in the first part of the chapter in the least graduated to the capacities of a child; and it was probably selected, not on account of its interest, but because it furnished alleged proof of a feature of the doctrine of the trinity. Now the doctrine itself, is, by the acknowledgement of its advocates, a mystery—incomprehensible—and this we may say, fairly represents the course pursued, as well as the character of the instruction communicated. So far as the child is concerned, it is to him a mystery, and the result of his education is generally the committing of a certain number of incomprehensible passages to memory, without any knowledge of the beauty and harmony of Christianity as a perfect system.

But it may be said, that unwearied pains are often made use of by parents, in order to explain what is read by their children. I know it. But how is the parent to explain to the child, that which he does not himself understand? This, I venture to say, is the case with at least a majority of parents who pursue this course.

I know from experience, that when I discovered what I believed was inconsistent, or attempted to obtain information in relation to some of the dark points of Calvinism, my inquiries were generally met with the assurance, that the carnal mind could not understand these things—or astonishment was visibly manifested, that I should presume to question any thing which God had revealed, and that was so plainly taught in the Assembly's Shorter Catechism. I would not have any one imbibe the impression that I am averse to a child's reading the Scriptures, or to his receiving religious instruction. No. I would as soon advocate the propriety of their being brought up in ignorance, because schools had been mismanaged. The truth is, the mind requires exercise. The religious feelings implanted in the human bosom, will have scope. Let them then have a right direction—let the Bible be put into the hands of the child—let him be directed, from time to time, to such portions as he can understand, with the conviction, that a little read and understood, is better than much committed to memory, when he is ignorant of its meaning. Give the young the means of religious instruction—give them such means as are adapted to their capacities—encourage inquiry, listen to their objections, manifest less anxiety to indoctrinate them in particular views and opinions, and more, that they may be upright, understanding Christians. People may speculate as they will upon the causes of infidelity—may talk as they will about men's hating the Scriptures on account of their doctrines—but I never, as yet, knew a man who liked to read any book that he did not understand; and I feel morally certain, that no method could have been adopted, better calculated to induce men to hate the Scriptures, than the course which has been pursued with many of the children in our country.

I lament the indifference among mankind in regard to religion—I deplore the disposition which is leading many to scepticism—but truth requires that I say, that I am convinced that much of this is to be justly attributed to the injudicious method which has been too generally pursued with the youth of the land.

I would have the youth obey the injunction of our text, and "Search the Scriptures"; for I am confident that if there be indifference among them in relation to this important subject, it arises from the errors of education—from opinions grounded in mistaken ideas of the doctrines and truths communicated in the sacred volume. I can well remember when I thought that, to be religious, was to be gloomy, unsocial, and unhappy—to engage in tasks and duties of the most unpleasant kind—to pursue a path planted with thorns, and to deny myself all innocent mirth and pleasurable enjoyment. But, alas, how much did I misconceive and misunderstand the character of my heavenly Father! He promised peace in his service—assured me that wisdom's ways were ways of pleasantness, and I foolishly sought it in violating his laws—in being the author of my own misery, and then fretted against his providence, because I was disappointed! We do not see a person seeking enjoyment, by foolishly thrusting his hand or arm into the heated and glowing embers. And why? We answer, because he has learned that to do this, would be to burn himself and cause him pain. Now, who would say, that it would be a hardship to render obedience to a law which should require him to abstain from making himself miserable? We answer, no one. Yet such is, in reality, the language of every one, who supposes his pleasures are to be circumscribed by obeying Jehovah. God, my friends, is not a tyrant! He asks no service from you, without some intention, and the object of demanding your service is your good. He requires you to abstain from nothing, but what your own good judgment would lead you to acknowledge you must abstain from, to secure present enjoyment. If you do not already know this, I would beseech you to "search the Scriptures," and see if these things are not so—see if you have not misconceived his character, and done injustice to your heavenly Father.

Very many, in reading the Scriptures, err from want of method. They read a little here, to-day—a little there to-morrow; and next day, a little somewhere else. They do not take into consideration, that one part of the Scriptures was addressed to one people, and another to another—that their situations and circumstances were often different, and required a different course of instruction.

Again—men have been informed that, upon religious subjects, they had no right to reason—they must receive them just as they were, without question. But how is a man to read, think, or judge, without the exercise of his reasoning faculties? Let him lay them aside, and what is he? An idiot, a brute!—no, not a brute, but far beneath him, for be it known to all men, that even brutes reason. Then, talk not of a man's laying aside his reason, and believing. You might, as consistently, call upon a dead man to converse, or walk with you.

It is the part of a reasonable man to do business methodically—with some kind of system. We will suppose, then, you wish to be informed in relation to the character of God. You take the Bible and learn, that God is almighty in power, infinite in wisdom, in goodness, in justice, in mercy and in truth. Now you have a standard by which you may try every doubtful or questionable passage in the Scriptures—for no one can be so interpreted as, in the least, to infringe upon the character of Jehovah. Suppose, for an instance, you should find some passage in your reading, which should be claimed as proof of the final defeat of the Almighty. You try it by the standard. God is almighty in power—almighty power can not be defeated—for there can be no power except what emanated from, and is inferior to him. The question is settled, and a new meaning sought for the disputed passage. I might pursue this subject farther, by supposing cases which you must try by the goodness, the wisdom, justice and mercy of God; but I will leave it, remarking, that it must ever be remembered, that the attributes of God so harmonize, that he is just without being unmerciful, and merciful without being unjust.

The character of God—the nature and object of his moral government—the intention and end of the mission of the Saviour—man's duty, and final destiny, constitute the important and great leading truths of revelation. These are such as every one is interested in; and a knowledge of these truths may be acquired from the Scriptures in far less time than what is generally spent in in idleness, every season. Do not understand me, my friends, to say, that a man may acquire all the knowledge he will ever need in any given time. I mean, that he can acquire sufficient knowledge to have an understanding faith upon these subjects; and when he has done this, I have no fears but what he will make the word of God the man of his counsel—it will be a new book to him, and he will wonder how he could ever have read so much of the goodness and love of God, and never have observed it before! Children do not like to read books that they do not understand, and men are but children of larger growth. But let them once begin to learn, begin to understand and feel interested, and they do not need driving or urging to the task.

One reason among the many, why the Scriptures are not read more, and better understood when read, is to be found in the fact, that very many expect, that at some favorable period, God will so open their understandings, that in a very short time, and with very little trouble on their part, they shall be able to know all that is necessary to be known, (at least all that is necessary to be known to get to heaven,) which seems to be the alpha and omega of their labors. There never was an idea more injurious to the interests of mankind, than the idea of the miraculous interposition of divine Providence at this age of the world. I firmly believe in an overruling, superintending Providence, but yet every person knows that the age of miracles passed about eighteen centuries since.

It is true that in the apostolic age, the preachers of our Lord's Gospel spoke with new tongues, so that the dwellers of different countries heard in their own language of the wonderful works of God. God listened to their prayers, and when they laid hands on the sick they were healed. But who performs such miracles now? We answer, no one. The truth is, the age of miracles terminated with the circumstances which called for them. If a man now wishes to preach in Greek, he must first learn Greek; and notwithstanding the much which has been said about men preaching the Gospel who were ignorant, they have, by their ignorance, convinced mankind that they could communicate what they had learned, and nothing more.

Suppose, brethren, that a man should neglect to till the soil, and sow the seed, in the proper season to commit it to the bosom of the earth, and should then set his empty casks in the field and pray to God to fill them. Men would charitably conclude, that the person was insane. For no one would suppose that one in sound mind, could expect that God would work a miracle to encourage indolence. I would ask, can a person in this land of Bibles, surrounded by the means of instruction, suppose that God will miraculously reward him for disobeying the solemn injunction of our text?

I readily admit that some have greater capacities for learning than others. Some have a greater aptitude for teaching—greater powers of oratory—and some less. But if it be a miracle that men of one profession are thus constituted and gifted, it is equally a miracle in others. In truth, brethren, you have the Scriptures, and you cannot understand them without searching, any more than you can understand science without study.

Another reason why men do not understand the Scriptures, is, because they do not search them for that purpose. Such a declaration may appear, at first sight, rash and unwarrantable. Very many in our land, read the Scriptures very little, if any, after they arrive at manhood or womanhood—until they become members of a particular sect.—Then, when they have joined the church, professed its faith, and most solemnly obligated themselves to believe and defend it—then they begin to read. If their minds were not made up in relation to the teachings of the word of God, they solemnly subscribed to a falsehood. If they were, I need not say, that very many have decided a most solemn question with far less consideration than they would give to a project requiring the expenditure of ten dollars. But the question is decided—the Bible is read—and no reasonable person can wonder that the judgment should be biassed by the force of these previous opinions. I have been frequently pained by the declarations of individuals of this class, and their sweeping denunciations of all who presumed to disagree with them, or question their theory. Their misquotations of the Bible—their utter ignorance of revelation, their knowledge extending often not even to a defence of a single article of their faith, is calculated to excite no very pleasing emotions in the mind of a lover of Christianity. But while they are so deficient in a knowledge of the truth, we cannot anticipate any very bright exhibitions of the graces or the charity of a Christian faith. To such persons we have only to say, "search the Scriptures"; and if it should please God to incline their hearts unto wisdom, we feel confident that they would be less dogmatical in their assertions, and more charitable to all who differ from them.

Brethren, It is our duty to "search the Scriptures." When I say that it is our duty, I would be understood that there are good reasons why we should do it, and that we shall reap a reward for our labors. We, it is true, understand the moral government of God—realize that it is paternal—that he is our Father, and the Father of all intelligencies. We regard him as infinite in perfection, and believe that his name and nature are are LOVE. We look upon Jesus Christ as our Saviour, and the Saviour of all mankind. We look back to God as our origin, and to heaven as our peaceful and eternal home. We have been taught, too, from the blessed pages of revelation, that God rules and governs in the earth—that his kind and overruling providence continually watches over his creatures for good—that even our sorrows have been, by his kindly hand, tempered in the soft fountain of pity, and are evidences of a Father's care and a Father's love. But all we have learned of God—all our studies and discoveries; serve to remind us that there is an infinite field before us—one which we can contemplate with joy unspeakable while life shall last, and in which we may range throughout the wasteless ages of eternity. But, brethren, we did not make these discoveries without exertion, and exertion is the price of new and higher attainments. We need the knowledge which we have acquired, for our own consolation, our own comfort and support. We need it, too, in the instruction of our children; for, be it known to all, if we neglect them, there are those who will take advantage of our slothfulness, to sow the tares of error in their tender minds. We have the means—abundant means, and these, judiciously applied, will render the study of the Scriptures interesting and pleasurable to the youth of our families. We need this knowledge, too, for other purposes. We are, as Christians, commanded to be always ready to give a reason for our hope. The circumstances of the world around us, as well as our situation, require an intimate knowledge of the Scriptures. Assertions may pass with some, as scriptural reasons; but from us, men ask evidence, and we expect to give it. More than this—we are often compelled, not only to defend our own faith, but also to rectify the misquotations of those who assail us.

Brethren, these considerations, and a multitude of others which might be named, admonish us that it is our duty—to ourselves, to the cause of Christianity, and to the world—to "search the Scriptures."

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER EIGHT.

JUDGES.—This book has its name from its containing the history of transactions, during the government of the Israelites by temporary judges, before that of kings; from the death of Joshua to the time of Samuel. It comprises the history of about three hundred years, and is thought to have been written by Samuel. It was evidently written before the taking of Jerusalem by David, as may be inferred from chapter i: 21.

Judges, ix: 23.—"Then God sent an evil spirit between Abimelech and the men of Shechem," &c.

We here find the first mention of an evil spirit. Every thing being by the sacred writers ascribed to the providence of God, this dissention between Abimelech and the Shechemites, is said to have been produced by his sending an evil spirit among them. We are not to infer from this, that it was actually a personal evil being which was employed on that occasion. For bad men are very apt to quarrel without any supernatural instigation.

Judges, 15th and 16th chapters.—There are various opinions respecting the account contained in these chapters of the exploits of Samson.—That there is some mistake in the translation is generally conceded by the learned. Dr. Priestly says, respecting the fox story, that the word translated fox should have been translated jackalls, which he says were very numerous in that country, and may be caught in great numbers. Others are of the opinion that Samson took two sheaves of wheat, and tied them together, and put a firebrand between them, and threw them among the standing corn or grain of the Philistines. It is said that two sheaves of wheat, tied in this manner, were called foxes.

In regard to the one thousand men, said to have been slain by Samson with the jaw-bone of an ass, Priestly says, "It should be—'he smote them, killing some and dispersing the rest.'"

The great destruction of the Philistines, which took place at the falling of the temple, (for such the building was,) is not improbable; as these temples were something constructed so as to be made to rest on two pillars, the removal of which, would cause the whole to instantly fall to the ground. Pliny tells of a theatre in Rome, which was so constructed as to depend on one hinge; so that he wondered at the madness of the people in venturing into a place, the safety of which was so uncertain. Had that hinge failed, he says "more people would be killed than at the battle of Cannæ." Shaw says that he saw, in Algiers, buildings in the form of a large pent-house, supported by only one or two pillars; on which were many hundreds of people, diverting themselves with exhibitions in the court below.

It appears on the whole, that Samson was a man endowed with great muscular strength; of which his killing the lion and carrying off the gates of Gaza, is abundant proof. But the common or vulgar opinion, that his strength lay in his hair, (as it is expressed,) is certainly erroneous; although when his hair was cut off, his strength departed. But this only proves, that the Divine Being from whom he derived his strength, saw fit, when this was done, to take it from him. It did not return again with the growth of his hair, as some suppose; as may be seen by consulting chapter 16th, verse 28th.

TWO INCONSISTENCIES.

BY REV. O. WILCOX.

To my Partialist brethren I will say, do you not think that the person who professes to believe in a God that is good unto all, and that will forever bless all his children, is inconsistent and even hypocritical, when he calls on this same God to damn, or send to hell, a part of them?

The answer will be, "yea." Let me now turn to my Universalist brethren and say, Do you not think that there is great want of consistency, and a show of hypocrisy in the conduct of those persons who profess to believe in a God that has made a hell in which he is determined to torment some of his children, without mercy and without end? And still they are laboring, beseeching and praying this same God to save all. Here again the answer will be, "yes." That there is inconsistency in the profession and practice of both these classes of individuals, will, I think, be allowed by all candid persons.

The former believe God to be too good to answer their requests for him to damn to hell those that they call on him to send there; and therefore they act the part of hypocrites in making the request. And the latter believe him to be too bad to save those whom they pray him to save; and therefore their prayers are faithless. In short, the one says, in effect, if I could persuade God to be as good as myself, he would convert and save all those poor, miserable beings. And the other says, if he was as passionate and revengeful as myself, he would damn a large portion of them. Now I wish to propose a remedy for both these inconsistencies. Let those professed Universalists believe in and worship the Partialist representations of God, and then they can have the pleasure of believing in a God who is as bad as themselves, and can call on him to damn their neighbors in good faith. And let those better hearted Partialists believe in, and worship God, as set forth by Universalists, and then they can have the pleasure of praying "in faith, nothing doubting," for the salvation of all men.—Brethren, try the exchange, and if you reap no other advantage from it, you will have the pleasure of being consistent in your profession and practice.

QUERIES.

BY REV. R. THORNTON.

If the heathen, who die ignorant of the Gospe and a knowledge of the truth, are saved; when are they brought to this knowledge and changed from hatred to love—from wickedness to holiness! Are there idolators in heaven? If not, where are they made acquainted with the living God, and born of the spirit?

Do Limitarians believe in the future happiness of those who live and die heathens?

If they do not, are they not damning them for not doing impossibility—for not believing in Christ, of whom they have not heard, and for not accepting his salvation, when it was never offered them?

If they do, are they not criminals in sending the Gospel to them, and thereby giving them an opportunity to reject to their eternal ruin? Are they not cursing them with the means of their damnation?

THE DEVIL.

Many people have supposed that the Devil was once an angel of light—an inhabitant of heaven—a holy messenger of the Most High, and that he rebelled against the Almighty, fell from heaven and became a Devil. Now the Bible says, he was "a liar from the beginning," and that "there was no truth in him." If, therefore, he sinned "from the beginning," how could he once have been an angel of light? And if he was once an holy intelligence, must he not have been faithful and true, and the record false, which says, "there was no truth in him."

EXPOSITION OF SCRIPTURE.

In Jude, verse 7th, Sodom and Gomorrah are represented as being "Set forth as an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire."

This language is supposed to refer to another state of existence; but that such is not the reference is plain from one fact. In 2 Peter ii: 6, we are told that those cities were "an ensample unto them that after should live ungodly." If eternal fire means endless misery, how could it be an ensample unto them that should after live ungodly?

Indeed the term example necessarily implies an after period, in which the effects of witnessing it may be realized. But eternal fire, if it mean endless misery, can have no afterward; and of course can not be an example. Hence, as eternal fire, in the above passage, was an example, and an example, too, to them that should AFTER live ungodly, it follows that endless misery can not be intended. A HINT TO UNIVERSALIST MINISTERS!

There are several townships adjacent to, and on the confines of, the counties of Erie, Warren and Crawford, Pa., many of whose inhabitants, we think, are now hungry for the true bread of life. And though some of them have never heard the sound of a Universalist sermon, still, doubtless, near one half of their inhabitants are friendly to, and many we trust are firm believers in, the blessed doctrine. And though we are sure "it is the Lord's doings, and is wonderful in our eyes," yet we believe in a still further agency. Our means are limited, and we have as yet no meeting house, but as we have school houses, barns, and shady groves, sufficiently spacious to contain us all; if preaching the Gospel to the poor is considered a miracle, let it no longer be said that the day of miracles has entirely gone by.

MARRIAGE.

BY REV. L. L. SADLER.

The following strictures on one of my articles on Marriage, published several weeks ago, would have appeared earlier but for their length, and my labors in preparing the Register. It will be seen that Br. Sadler has entirely mistaken the spirit and intent of the article, and has, therefore, replied as if his own conscience condemned his celibacy!!! I will add a few notes, as brief as possible, to save a formal reply, and, perhaps, a controversy on this subject. A. B. G.]

Br. GROSH—It seems that you and Br. Austin have commenced a crusade against the bachelor community, and are determined, if possible, to coerce them by rigorous measures to let go their hold of their native birthright—a state of celibacy. And from the profuse manner in which you deal out your censures and denunciations, one would be led to suppose you had long been schooled in the condemnatory institutions of Partialism, where it is practicable to reproach and villify such as do not come up to the standard there furnished. It is not enough that they are deprived of the joys, the pleasures, the bliss, you so feelingly and eloquently represent as associated with the connubial state—it is not enough to be doomed to the lonely, anti-social, friendless, splenetic, state of unnatural singleness—living without object and without aim—strangers to friendship, and the better sentiments of sympathy and affection; and left at last to pine, sicken, wither and die, unpitied, unwept, and unmourned—but they must be branded with infamy, anathematized with many an odious epithet, and held up to public view as a spectacle

> "——— For contemptuous scorn
> To point her slow unmoving finger at."

If there be any class of people, deserving the sympathy and pity of their fellows, it is the celibates, allowing your statements true, concerning the superior advantages of the marriage state over that of a life of celibacy. But instead of mercy and fraternal friendliness, they are doomed to meet at your hands cold severity and bitter reproaches. From your humane spirit, exhibited in remarks offered on prison discipline, and on the treatment due sinners, I had expected that a milder, gentler spirit would be manifest, when these delicate matters of social affinity, concerning which every one supposes himself his master, were made the topic of remark and discussion. "It is easier to preach than to practice;" and we find ourselves very often deviating from the rules prescribed to others. "Happy is the man that doeth not that which he disalloweth."(a)

I would not be understood as entering my protest against the marriage institution, or as wishing to gainsay, or controvert, any thing you have offered in regard to the nature, value, tendency and design of such connexion. And had it not been for the attempt to heap opprobrium on the heads of such as have, from considerations best known to themselves, stood aloof from the entanglements of wedded life, I should have rested in silence.—But when censorious calumny marks an individual his victim, or labors to bring public opinion to bear in sneering frowns on any respectable class of community, is it not humanity, is it not justice, to stand out in defence of the injured and abused? Who can read sentences like the following, and not think one justifiable in pleading the cause of the offended party?

"Abounding as matrimony does, with numerous advantages and beneficial incentives; and with so great an amount of social and domestic enjoyments, it is hardly supposable that any person can be found who voluntarily abstains from the marriage state. Yet many there are who exhibit this eccentricity. By way of distinction, they are denominated 'Old Bachelors.' They are anomalies—exceptions from all earthly existences—a kind of monstrosity, put forth through some unaccountable freak of nature—a species of Ishmaelites, 'whose hands are against every man, and every man's hand against them.' The contemner of woman, the voluntary bachelor stands before the world as one who violates the laws of nature, disregards the commands of God, and opposes the designs of his Maker in the creation of the human race."—Austin.

"My bachelor brother, I do not mean to be uncourteous, or to press you too hard on this delicate subject; but be sure your own conscience condemns you not, before you ask others to acquit you of such a highly compounded SIN, as is living alone."(b)—Grosh.

Such is the wholesale denunciation—such the "courtesy" the bachelor receives from Hymen's votaries—such the condemnation pronounced, without regard to their apologies or pleas of defence. Surely, this is a kind of Catholic, inquisitorial, summary way of disposing of offending brethren. The necessity and propriety of putting forth these essays on the subject of matrimony, is to be found, I suppose, in the declaration incorporated in your first number—"the number of celibates is too great among both sexes in our land." And hence means must be adopted to diminish that number, and secure some important accessions to the multitude of worshippers who bow before the altar of Hymen.

I can not agree with you in this statement.—That some might be happier, more virtuous and useful, had they married in early life, I am not disposed to deny. But then, again, what an incalculable amount of suffering and misery might have been prevented in our world, had multitudes who have entered the connubial state, abstained from such alliances! How many a hapless wife, and poverty-stricken, unfortunate husband—how many a sorrowing mother and care-worn father—how many a child, and destitute, heart-broken widow, would have been spared the bitter pangs that have called up the deep drawn sigh, suffused the cheeks with tears, and rent the bosom with anguish, had not the relative ties been created by marriage! The fact is, marriage, like liberty, is one of Heaven's greatest blessings, when man is properly qualified and circumstanced to appreciate and enjoy it, but a curse when incompetent for its duties and responsibilities. And it must be obvious to every observing, reflecting mind, that there are more who enter the marriage state, incapacitated to appreciate and enjoy it, and to discharge its numerous obligations, than there are who abstain from such connexions, that would be bettered by the change, all things considered. There should be more celibates instead of less.(c)

The young are apt to be inconsiderate in regard to this most important circumstance of human life. They are generally fanciful and romantic in their views, impressions and imaginings concerning the conjugal state. And the charms, the fascinations, the enchantments, that are thrown around wedded life, associated with existing, instinctive impulses, renders man much disposed to change his condition from celibacy to wedlock. The youth look on the married state, much as an individual looks on a picture, who fixes his eye intently on the light and sunny spots, and does not notice the darker shades with which they are contrasted; and consequently, are extremely liable to become enamored, and rush precipitately onward to secure possession without calculating consequences. There seems to be need of cautioning and admonishing the young to ponder well the paths of their feet, to sit down first and count the cost, before they engage in an enterprize that fixes their destiny for life, rather than to urge the few in "single blessedness," to worship at the altar of Hymen, or to denounce them as reprehensible, odious and sinful.(d)

Br. Austin says, "It is hardly supposable that any persons can be found who voluntarily abstain from the marriage state." If this be true, it is probable that those who do so, feel constrained to do it reluctantly, by the circumstances of the case. If they bring their feelings to yield to the voice of reason, conscience and judgment, they are worthy of all praise, and should be applauded rather than condemned.(e)

It would seem you would have us believe, that it is the duty of bachelors to secure wives, even if apprehensive of trouble and disaster on the stormy sea of life, so as to have sharers of their sufferings. This is indeed humane! It is an ennobling sentiment! Were an individual to fail in business, he would like to have his neighbors involved in the same calamity, so that they could sympathise with him in his misfortunes! To know that a dear wife and a family of lovely children were brought to participate with me my trials, and sufferings, and cross providences, and afflictions, would but augment my wo. Were it not for these I might endure the shock, but how witness their distresses also, and survive the pelt-ings of the pitiless storm? Demons may exult and be glad that others suffer with them, and share of their miseries; but even "the rich man in hell" had too much humanity left to desire that his brethren should come to his place of torment, to partake of his tortures, and to sympathise in his distresses. And though I am fond of sympathy, I would have it come from a friend, that can feel for the afflicted, and be excluded from a lot in such an inheritance. Rather than involve others in my misfortunes, I would "tread the wine press of the wrath of God, alone." But you tell us, that the exercise of sympathy affords delightful satisfaction to the one who exercises it. This is true, but attended, in cases of want and difficulty, with a superabundant amount of pain. Who do you suppose would link destinies with another merely for that privilege, or even with the expectation of such a fate? You think that redoubled efforts would be made to rise again, where the interests of a family were at stake.—This is probable. But ten chances to one he had not fallen, were it not for the additional care and expenses of the family. And if he had, how trifling the consequence, compared with that which involves the fate of numbers. Besides, it would

(a) "Open rebuke is better than secret love," and our Saviour rebuked even sharply the open, deliberate transgressor—of course, with intent to benefit him—yes, even "a whip made of small cords" may sometimes be salutary. If I have done worse in means or in spirit than my Master, let me be rebuked; not otherwise. I feel unconscious of any deviation from a Christian spirit, or a good intent, in this matter.

(b) Br. Austin speaks thus only of the "voluntary" celibates—the "contemners of woman"—evidently meaning those whose circumstances and opportunities permitted marriage, but who voluntarily, deliberately, or out of contempt for woman, abstained from it. Does Br. Sadler mean to defend and approbate such "monstrosities"? I think not. He must have misunderstood Br. Austin, as he has misunderstood me. I adhere to my assertion. (But why does Br. S. omit "my maiden sister"? Does he defend the bachelors—the "stronger sex," only? This is not gallant, to say the least!) Celibacy is contrary to nature, and requires strong and particular circumstances to justify it. All celibates should therefore be sure that their own consciences justify them, before they ask others to excuse them. Br. Sadler would not call this "wholesale denunciation....without regard to their apologies or pleas of defence," if his sensitive feelings had not led him to take it closer to his own bosom than I laid it—i. e., if his own conscience does not condemn him. All apologies admitted to be invalid by their own consciences, should not be regarded by others.

(c) Quite eloquent! But remember, good brother of mine, that the evils of celibacy are its legitimate fruits—its necessary and natural results; whereas those you recount as those of matrimony, are not the necessary and natural results of marriage, but of the abuse of it, or of the neglect of other duties. To all such we may say, "these duties ye should have performed, and not have left marriage unperformed." Yourself, then, being judge, celibacy is the cause of evils connected with it, whereas marriage may have evils connected with it, but they belong to other causes.

(d) Good! This extreme, (precipitancy,) is to celibacy, as too much zeal is to total indifference—it is hard choosing between two such great evils.

(e) I have set this misapprehension of Br. Austin's language, right in note b.

not require as much exertion to retrieve his broken fortunes with none to provide for but himself, as it would had he others to attend to.(f)

It seems to me improper for a person to take on himself responsibilities and obligations he is incompetent to discharge. And if a man have not prospective means for providing for the wants of a family, ought he to adopt measures for possessing one?

Again, I suppose you would not be understood, that marriage would be conducive to the promotion of human happiness, unless love—deep, ardent, devoted LOVE, cemented the union. Now, how many instances are there in the world, of individuals who have looked in vain for objects of interest, to whom they would bestow their heart's best affections—how many, of persons who have been riveted by ties of strongest attachment to the objects of their choice, and have had their hopes blighted by the samiel blast of disappointment, that left no substitute to fill the place? how many, of those that yield their hearts to others and are doomed to be unloved in turn, yet care for none besides! And are these to be blamed and spurned, because so unfortunate as not to be able to answer their wishes—and henceforth prefer to remain as they are, rather than to change their condition under existing circumstances! I had hoped for better things.(g)

I do not think the case an extraordinary one, that would justify an individual in abstaining from marriage. I once knew of an individual who lived a bachelor for the sole reason, that he thought it probable if he had a family, he might rear children to immortal misery. He could not bear the thought, and chose to live alone.—His motives were pure and benevolent; and of course justifiable in the course he pursued. And so would be any man, who should refrain from entering the marriage state, if apprehensive by so doing he should bring trouble on himself, and rear up children in ignorance, poverty and disgrace.

It could not be a duty for the soldiery and seamen to obtain wives, when they must constantly peril their lives—be most of the time from home, and unable from existing circumstances to protect their families and provide for their wants. Neither could it be for others, whose situation and condition in life were unfavorable to such cares and responsible duties.(h)

But to come a little nearer home. When a young minister of our denomination looks about him, and sees many a father in Israel, and superannuated preacher of the Gospel, "who has fought the good fight, finished his course and kept the faith," and who, by the most rigid system of economy, has sustained himself and family hitherto, now dependent on the cold charities of the world, and left to beg, to starve, or to die unregarded—when he sees others, who might be useful in the high vocation to which they are called, compelled to abandon the ministry in order to provide for the wants of their dependants—when he beholds others obtaining credit for like purposes, and lastly doomed to lose their reputation for want of means to pay their debts, and with it their usefulness in their profession—when he sees the widows of deceased brethren, who once labored successfully for the good of Zion, in a state of want, and seeking in vain for help, would he not be justifiable in the perpetration of the "highly compounded sin of living alone?"(i)

"It is enough that the servant is as his Lord. Jesus Christ has left an example, that we should follow his steps." But "in carrying out the designs of God, in his creation," he did not marry. And shall ministers be more perfect than their Master?(j) Paul has probably given as good counsel as any man can give on this subject; and he advises in very strong language, celibacy as preferable to the conjugal state. If it be said in reply, it was on account of the perilous posture of affairs then existing—I have only to remark, this is my plea.(k) And if an individual thinks he sees a storm ahead, and he is afraid of breakers, if he puts out to sea on the ocean of matrimony, let him be prudent and remain in the port of celibacy, without being subject to the taunts and jeers of those who have stronger vessels with which to buffet the storm. And while our clergy are so circumstanced, that they can barely live during their health and height of usefulness, let not one brother find fault with another, because he chooses to imitate Paul, rather than sacrifice his profession on the altar of domestic felicity, or suffer a dear family to come to poverty and misery!!!

(f) This whole paragraph is a singular (but doubtless an unintentional) perversion of my meaning—I think, of my language. I certainly did not mean to urge the consideration of a wife's sympathy, as a reason why the bachelor should get a companion in his sufferings, merely; but, as there is more happiness than misery in nearly, if not quite, every one's life—as the single life is, in my opinion, contrary to religion and nature, and therefore more miserable than the married state—and as the blessings of life are doubled by being shared with a companion, whereas suffering is lessened by being thus shared—therefore, I hold that the fear of involving a woman in our sufferings, is not, of itself, a valid excuse for not marrying—in other words, for not making her a sharer in our, and ourselves a sharer in her, more frequent and greater happiness—for not saving her and ourselves from the unnatural and more miserable condition of merely "single blessedness"—for not doubling her and our happiness by sharing it with each other, and for not lessening her and our own misery by mutual sympathy and mutual encouragement and aid. And singular views of God's goodness, must that Universalist have, who will deny my premises; or of logic, who will admit the premises, and deny my conclusions!—The "rich man in hell" suffered the pains of guilt, not of misfortune; the case is not in point, therefore. So far as the outward pains were concerned, I would say, if the wife of my bosom, and the pledges of our love go to an endless hell, I had RATHER be with them in their suffering, than be saved from them! Myself, then, being the judge, the sharing of their sufferings is a happier lot, than a selfish exemption from them. Every devoted wife and mother will say the same—and especially will she declare so, when merely occasional and temporal sufferings (which she can lessen and aid to remove) are concerned. As to the latter part of the paragraph, facts are better than theories; and though theory declares that it will "not require as much exertion to retrieve" a single man's "broken fortunes with none to provide for but himself, as it would, had he others to attend to;" yet facts (as admitted by Washington Irving, himself a bachelor) prove, that the single man does not make the exertion a married man will make, and therefore he fails oftener than the married man, because "he has none to provide for but himself."

(g) This is wide of the mark. If their own consciences excuse them, they may ask others to excuse them. As to the disappointed in this romantic love—let each bachelor thus disappointed, seek out a maid similarly loveloru, to sympathise with him. "Pity is akin to love." My reputation as a prophet on the issue, that they will not long remain bachelor and maid! Seriously, the cases cited, are very—very few—and they scarcely ever survive to become old maids and old bachelors.—The heart that is tough enough not to break, will generally bear a second bending!

(h) To please Br. Sadler, I will excuse all bachelor soldiers and sailors; (who are not free agents in this matter; as their country does not permit them to perform the duties of the married life;) and all old bachelors who are afraid that their children will be the devil's children. I do not suppose his conscience will ever urge this plea!

(i) In all is case the fault lieth at the door of his congregation. Wo be unto them, for all the happiness they prevent to him, and (through his increased efficiency by the aid of a wife) to themselves and society around—and for all the misery caused by their pennisiousness, and indifference to human good, and their pastor's increased welfare and usefulness!

(j) If Br. Sadler will show that he expects to travel in his Master's footsteps in not having any home, in all his trials, and to Calvary, this plea may answer—if not, 'twas wrong to quote this Scripture on this subject; for every disciple of Jesus had better turn Shaking Quaker at once.

(k) Well done, Br. S.! I am glad to find the "I" and "my" plainly set forth. It is better than a mere defence of others. But I am sorry that you see such "perilous times" ahead as Paul and the early Christians had to pass through. As to all that follows, I can only say—"See that your own consciences do not condemn you, before you ask others to excuse you." For if your own consciences condemn you not, you should not feel very sensitively the fault finding of others; who in that case, will have no right to condemn you. A. B. G.

JESUS "HATH DONE ALL THINGS WELL."—NO. IV.

BY REV. S. GOFF.

Without adverting to other particular instances of actual impression made by the teachings of Jesus, let us now turn our attention to the instructions themselves, as preserved to us in the Gospel record. They will prove even to a demonstration, that "he hath done all things well." In his teachings all mankind are considered as the offspring of one common Parent, members of one common family, and heirs alike of the same glorious and happy destiny. In his instructions there is no exclusiveness. They are designed for all, of every age, of every rank and condition.—The virtuous may there go and learn that the reward of obedience is holy peace, and perfect love, and heavenly joy in the soul. The vicious may there read their guilt and condemnation—may there learn that the gnawing worm, and the consuming fire of a guilty conscience, are inseparable attendants on vice, and are ever sounding in the ears of the votary of sin "the requium of departed joys," and the knell of faded peace and waning happiness. He may there read also—in that beautiful parable of the "Prodigal Son"—the pardon and peace that await the humble and penitent, and, perchance, be induced to return and walk in the blissful paths of virtue, obedience, and peace.

And most beautifully did Jesus reveal unto us the unity, the spirituality, and the benignant character of the great Creator. He who was the "one Lord" of the Hebrews, then became the God of the whole earth. And Jesus unfolded in the most happy manner the supremacy of his nature, the universality of his goodness, and the impartial benignity of his providential dominion. And how did he blend the majesty of him "who upholds all things by the word of his power," with the kindest condescension, by declaring that the sparrow's flight or fall is ordered by his directing hand, and that even "the very hairs of our head are all numbered."

And then, he was the first and best Teacher of the universal paternity, the boundless love and unfailing mercy of God. Oh, how much do we not owe to him for declaring and making known that we have all one Father in heaven, who watches over us with a parent's tenderness and love; who is constantly showering down unnumbered blessings upon us; who wisely orders every dispensation of his providence for our good; and who will finally bring all his children safe home to the "spirit land" on high, to bask in the bright sunbeams of his own endless glory, to meet and commingle their devotions with congenial spirits around the radiant throne of endless love, and to range the golden streets of the New Jerusalem, forever progressing in knowledge, glory, and heavenly blessedness! Oh! that the whole world could see the beauty, the glory, and the loveliness there is in the character of our Father in heaven, as made known through Jesus Christ, his well beloved Son, for he was truly the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person! Oh! that God, who, in the morning of creation, commanded the light to shine out of darkness, would shine into the heart of every child of humanity, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ! And, oh! that all the world would listen to the instructions of the blessed Jesus, for surely "He hath done all things well," and the tendency of his instructions is to bless the whole world with the joys of eternal life!

It is well to be a good talker, but it is better to be a good listener. You can hardly please a man better than to listen to what he has to say.

LETTER TO BR. D. SKINNER AND HIS ANSWER.

Trimble county, Ky., March 12th, 1839.

Mr. D. Skinner:

Dear Sir—I have been for some time reading your Letters to Mr. Aikin; and it appears to me that you certainly establish the following facts: 1. That God is love, and loves all things that he created. 2. That he desires that all his children should be happy hereafter. 3. That God formed every part of man; consequently he must be the Author of every effect that the parts produce, which he formed: and 4. That man is not a free agent.

Now, Sir, although these facts seem to be established, it appears to me that difficulties would attend their admission that would be insurmountable. The design of this letter is to request you, not for disputation, but for information, to solve the difficulties that they seem to involve. If the above facts be admitted as true, I wish to inquire, 1. If God formed every part of man for a good purpose, and desired the happiness of all, and will not be disappointed in his desires, is not every act that ever was or ever will be done by man, a good act, and is not every act of man a virtuous act? If you answer yes to the above; 2. I want to know how Adam committed any sin by disobeying the command, and on what principle of justice God condemned him for that violation, when it was right it should be so? If you answer no, to the first question, 3. I want to know who created that part of Adam that produced the desire to sin? If the devil could create one part of Adam, could he not have created the whole? Therefore, would he not be as great and powerful as God? 4. If you think it was right for Adam to have fallen, and no sin was produced by the fall, and the act of disobedience was right, I want to know why Christ came into the world and suffered death for sin, seeing there was no sin in the world? 5. If man is not a free agent, (and I don't think he is,) I want to know on what principles of justice he can be made by God a culpable being, in any sense of the word? 6. What difference was there between Adam before, and after, the fall; and what difference was there between the human family before, and after, the death of Christ? 7. You say that works are not meritorious. I want to know what is? but recollect that you can't blame my hand for striking my neighbor, but the mind. Therefore all acts that man is accountable for, are the acts of the mind.

Sir, I want you to distinctly understand that I am your friend, and not your enemy: and I want these things explained for the good of myself and all mankind. Direct your letters to Milton Postoffice, Trimble county, Ky. I remain, Sir, your friend, G. F.

ANSWER.

Dear Sir—Your letter reached here during my absence at the South. Having lately returned, I cheerfully comply with your request to answer it the first opportunity. Though your letter is a private one, I make both it and my answer public in order that the benefit, if any, may not be confined exclusively to you and myself. Others may possibly labor under the same doubts and difficulties as yourself, and be gratified with seeing the publication of your questions, and my reply thereto.

I allow the two first items you say I have established in my letters to Rev. S. C. Aikin. I also allow the first part of the 3d item—"that God formed every part of man:" and although I can not allow that God is directly and immediately "the author of every effect that all the parts produce," yet he is undoubtedly the indirect or remote cause of all things; or in other words, nothing could exist without God, and all power that exists is derived from God. Still, there are secondary causes in operation, and agents both intelligent and unintelligent, responsible and irresponsible, to whose action as immediate causes, many effects are to be directly ascribed.

You say I have established, as a fourth item, "that man is not a free agent." This, Sir, depends on what definition is given to the term free agent. The word free usually signifies, being at liberty, uncontrolled, unrestrained. The word agent may signify any active cause or power, or it may (and usually does) signify a substitute or deputy, a factor employed to transact business for a principal. When used in this last, or usual sense, it is hardly compatible to apply the term free to agent: because an agent, substitute, deputy, or factor, is always supposed to be bound by the will and instructions of his principal or employer, and therefore can not be free. If perfectly free, he is not under any restraint, and therefore can not be amenable to his employer or principal. But if by agent be meant simply actor, then the question occurs whether man is a free agent (free actor) or not. If by his being such be meant that he is free to do anything and every thing, unrestrained, uncontrolled, and without accountability, then I deny that man is a free agent. If by his being a free agent, be simply meant, that man is endowed with the freedom of volition and of action in a certain limited sphere, and is accountable for the choice he makes, and the manner in which he performs those actions, I have no objections to free agency. Still, he is not unlimitedly free. If he were so, he could not be accountable. Moreover, there are many things which he can not will to do if he could, and could not do them if he willed.—Therefore his will, his freedom and his power are all circumscribed.

Having made these preliminary remarks, I now proceed to notice your questions. In answer to your first, I remark, that, though the premises be correct, the conclusion that your question implies does not necessarily follow. Every act of man, taken in connexion with, and as a part of the grand scheme and ultimate purpose of God, with all their final results, may be good: but every act of man, in itself considered, or unconnected with the great results which God has in view in permitting such acts, is not good. Many of them are decidedly evil. Much less is every act of man virtuous. Even if the doctrine of predestination or fatalism in its strongest form, were admitted, it would not make every act of man virtuous. In order for an act to be virtuous, the actor must act from a good and virtuous motive. But we know the motive with some is evil and wicked; and, conscience condemning the act, the perpetrator is guilty before God, whatever may be the ultimate results of the action.

Having answered the first question in the negative instead of the affirmative, your second question is rather non-suited. Nevertheless, I suppose the real question of difficulty in your mind is this: If Adam acted as God designed he should, or even as God knew he would, and God overrules his act of transgression for ultimate good to him and the human family, how could Adam be to blame, or justly condemned therefor? I answer, because he acted contrary to the dictates of his own conscience—he was conscious of doing wickedly, conscious of guilt at the time. The motive of action determines the character of the act, without any regard to the consequences. If a physician administer a portion of arsenic with a view of killing his patient, and instead of operating according to his intentions, it should cure his patient of some dreadful disease, this does not free the physician from the guilt of intended murder. He is guilty of murder in design; and in no possible way can his act be construed into a virtuous act. The good resulting from it is ascribed to God. As man's act, it is evil—it is murder; as God's act, it is good—it is salvation.

The subject is beautifully illustrated by the case of Joseph's being sold a slave into Egypt by his unnatural brethren. God designed Joseph's future elevation and glory. I will admit, also, that he designed, as a means of effecting that elevation and glory, that his brethren should sell him as a slave. His brethren designed his downfall and utter ruin; and as a means of effecting that wicked purpose, they sold him as a slave. They were guilty of the deepest criminality in this, and suffered a righteous punishment therefor; as they afterward confessed, (Gen. xlii: 21,) "We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear; therefore is this distress come upon us." But how could they be guilty if God designed they should so act, and overruled it for good? Because they knew not God's design, and they designed no good themselves, but evil. As their act, therefore, it was evil, but as God's act, it was good; as Joseph himself told them, "Ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good, to bring to pass, as it is this day, to save much people alive." Gen. l: 20.

Your third question requires no answer, inasmuch as I do not hold that the devil created any part or portion of man, soul or body. Your fourth and fifth questions have been anticipated in my answers to your first and second.

In answer to your fifth query, I remark, that the difference between Adam, before and after his fall, was simply this:—he was innocent before he sinned, and guilty after it. That he both sinned and was guilty, is clear from the fact that the Bible defines sin to be "the transgression of the law;" and that he transgressed the positive command or law of God, and felt so conscious of guilt as to seek to hide from the presence of God, his Father and his Friend.

You have another query under the same number: viz. What difference was there between the human family before and after the death of Christ. Answer, none: i. e., there was no difference in their condition effected simply by the literal death of Christ, except that those who put him to death rendered themselves murderers by the act. The mere shedding of his blood, or putting him to death on the cross, affects not the condition of mankind. He himself declared, "the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." It is the word of Christ dwelling richly within us, the doctrine, the teachings, the spirit of Christ, that benefits man, and effects his salvation. His sufferings and death were a commendation of that love to man that is stronger than death, and that many waters can not quench. It was the seal of the covenant of immortal grace, and of the everlasting truths he taught. His death, burial, and resurrection from the dead by the mighty power of God, were also necessary to bring to light and demonstrate the doctrine of the resurrection and of life and immortality beyond the grave, "that we might have a strong consolation who have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before us: which hope we have, as an anchor of the soul, sure and stedfast, and which entereth into that within the vail," thus begetting us "unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us."

You preface your 7th question by affirming, that I "say works are not meritorious." Here you labor under a mistake. I have never said that works are not meritorious. I say the works of man can never merit endless happiness or the immortal joys of heaven.—They are meritorious in a limited degree, and will most certainly receive their due reward; even if but a cup of cold water be given in the name of a disciple, it shall not go unrewarded. But the immortal and endless joys of heaven are not to be merited by the feeble works of man, but are the free, unmerited gift of God, through Christ. I agree with you, that the mere hand that strikes is not to blame, but the mind that impels it. The mind is either guilty or innocent, according to the motive that actuates it.

Hoping that these desultory remarks may prove satisfactory to you, and not wholly uninteresting or useless to others, I am, dear Sir, yours in all sincerity.

WORKS AND CONSEQUENCES....NO. 1.

It will be well to examine a principle which will be found an important aid to good works, at the very outset of the investigation. That the exercise of faith is necessary to happiness and spiritual prosperity in this life, is undeniable. Without it man would be a cheerless, solitary and isolated being. Nothing but what presented itself immediately and imposingly before his natural senses, would receive the concurrence of the mind. And even then it would fade, and the impressions it had made would vanish from the memory, the moment its actual, present, living existence disappeared from the mind's eye. There would be no lifting upward of the desires; no reaching forward of hope, to things unattained but real in the nature of things. Instead of this, there would be the unsatisfied desire of the soul, without knowing what it desires—the wild impetuosity of the tornado, but without its destination or boundary.

I repeat, therefore, that faith is necessary to happiness, to spiritual prosperity, and, I may add, to stability of purpose, in this life. But do we reflect upon the nature of true faith as often as we should do? When we say we have faith, do we understand the extent of the acknowledgement? Perhaps we do—at least so far as the essentials are concerned. It is certain we do, if our minds are properly imbued with the spirit from on high, and our actions conformed to the will of Jehovah.

What then is true faith? It is the assent which a well cultivated mind gives to any truth, proposition or principle. Were it possible to try the experiment, it would still be apparent that there could be no faith, were the mind wholly inactive. In support of this, we have one fact which we deem sufficient to settle all dispute. In proportion to the activity of the mind, will be the extent of its faith; and in proportion to the cultivation of the mind will be the purity of its faith. This determines the nature of faith, that it is the approving labors of the mind—of the rational powers. Of course good works must receive the co-operation of the same mind.

We see, then, the propriety of the language of the apostle James, where he connects works and faith together. "Even so," says he, "faith if it hath not works, is dead, being alone." "Show me thy faith without thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works."—If faith be an active principle or disposition of the mind, it must be succeeded by works, which are a portion of its effects. And if works are good, they must, I think, be guided, or assisted by an equally good faith. Even that silent, unostentatious firmness, agreeably to which, the afflicted bear up under their misfortunes without a murmur, is a noble work of human patience, and speaks volumes in favor of an abiding faith in the justice of the power that orders their lot. Though a silent, it is a no less powerful work, which is inseparably connected with the true faith. Abraham, when he ascended one of the mountains, supposed to be Calvary, in the land of Moriah, with his son Isaac, was required to perform a work which tried his faith to the utmost.—And what a work was there! In that example, where he must have experienced all the agony consequent upon the loss of an only and beloved son, he shrank not from the will of God, but left an enduring evidence to his posterity forever, both of the power of faith over the works, and the power of good works in strengthening the faith, of the creature. Paul, in the midst of the persecution and opposition which he had to encounter, has left, in his faithfulness to his duty, a memorial of the effect of faith which works by love and purifies the heart.

A man may possess but little faith, and yet do good works; but, methinks his works, in the aggregate will be limited to his faith. I can not conceive it possible that man can act deliberately and voluntarily, without having some object or end in view which he designs to accomplish. If so, then he must have faith inseparably connected with his designs, in order to ensure the propriety of the means employed.

I speak not now of infatuation. Where there is no reason, there can be no principle, and where there is no reflection, there can be no living faith to assist man in his actions. But I speak of him who acts after mature reflection. He has satisfied himself, (whether his judgment be right or wrong) that his plans are feasible and his desires proper, and he proceeds in the accomplishment of his designs. The conclusion is apparent. The man who would act justly, must act understandingly, and from a settled motive. That motive can be manifested to the world only by the conduct which attends it. Hence he only has the true faith, who is faithful in righteousness; and he only is good who does good, the professions of men to the contrary notwithstanding. So endeth the first lesson. A. R. B.

TO THE UNIVERSALIST PUBLIC.

It was a year ago last June, that I entirely ceased preaching, or taking any part in public speaking. This step was taken reluctantly, and only from a sense of duty—a full conviction that I could never hope for a perfect restoration to health, while I continued the practice of public speaking. In November last, I sailed for the West Indies, and did not return home from thence until about the first of June, hoping that, by spending the Winter in a tropical climate, and wholly abstaining from public speaking, my health would be so far restored, or the disease of the throat (chronic bronchitis) so far removed, that I could again resume and continue my professional labors. I suffered less from the disease while at the South, than I usually do in this cold and variable climate; and on my return I preached a few times, not only to comply with the earnest solicitations and gratify the wishes of friends, but to ascertain by experiment whether I could safely and permanently resume the practice.

The effect of these few times of public speaking was decidedly bad and seriously injurious to the throat; and I am reluctantly compelled to refuse compliance with all requests that are made to me to preach, or speak at all in public. This notice is made public, that my friends generally may know the true state of the case, and particularly for the information of those friends, whether remote or near, who frequently send for me to go and preach with them, or attend funerals, etc. It is with grief I am compelled to give this notice, and to refuse all similar requests. Did my health allow, I should still continue to obey such calls, and that too with the greatest pleasure. My voice would still be raised in behalf of the great salvation. The theme is as dear to me as ever, and I still cherish some hope, though it be but faint, that I shall some day be so far restored as to sound once more the Gospel trump on the walls of our Zion. But this is known only to the all-wise Disposer of all events. "The Judge of all the earth will do right;" and it becomes me to say, "his will be done."

LOVE AND FEAR.

Fear moves in the heart and heeds the whirlwind there—love breathes upon the soul, and all is calm as the Summer sky. Fear rears a bloody shrine and sacrifices to Moloch and in the valley of Hinnom—love wreathes flowers around the altar, kindles a pure flame, and offers grateful incense. Fear sweeps with a rude and hurried hand the chords of the soul, crushing out wild discord in its strength—love touches it with angel fingers, and draws out all the sweet music of the instrument. E. H. C.

TO — — —, IS IT I?

There is yet a large amount due me, in the aggregate, from a great number of individuals, for this paper, while I was the publisher, prior to the year 1836. To the individuals, the sums due are small. But to me the aggregate is quite too large to lose. And surely I have waited long enough. Will not my old debtors remember the apostle's injunction, "owe no man any thing but to love," and immediately discharge their obligations to me? Will not agents see to the collection of bills in their hands due to me, and have the accounts closed at once, and without further delay?

There are also several accounts due me for books in different parts of the country, which ought at once to be settled. And I would particularly invite attention to the Memoir of Rev. John Freeman. Though the greater part of the edition of this valuable work has been distributed into the hands of preachers and other agents, I have not yet received money enough to refund what was advanced for paper, printing, binding, etc.; while the widow has yet received nothing from the sale of the work. I think if we had returns for all that have been sold by agents, it would pay the expenses of the publication, and perhaps leave something for the widow.—Have agents disposed of all the books they can? Will they not make another effort to sell what they have on hand, and at least make returns and payment for all they have sold? Are you a preacher? ask your congregation to give, each of them, fifty cents for the benefit of the deserving widow and orphans of our late, lamented Br. Freeman, and receive in return therefor a book (the Memoir) worth double the money. Brethren, let us immediately hear from you on the above subjects, and oblige Your obedient servant, D. SKINNER.

SING THE SWEET PÆAN.

BY MISS LAURA EGGLESTON.

O, sing the sweet pæan of love and salvation!
For truth is prevailing the nations among—
Arise, every heart in sublime adoration,
Rejoice, for an era auspicious is come.

Already the people, in love, are beginning
To worship Jehovah in spirit and truth;
The voice of the Gospel, divinely is winning
The souls of the aged, and hearts of the youth.

Behold, what a change in the moral creation,
By truth's plastic hand has been wrought in our land!
Around us are beaming her bright scintillations—
Her crown is unfading—her empire shall stand.

O, sing the sweet pæan—for rich benedictions,
More ample than dew drops descend on the world!
The mercy of heaven shall know no restriction,
Its banners of love over all are unfurled.

The mind long confin'd in the prison of error,
Has found manumission, and basks in the light,
The beams of salvation, where visions of terror
Are never display'd to the ideal sight.

The heralds of Zion, arrayed with salvation,
Sweet tidings of gladness proclaim in our ear;
And Jesus, the Saviour and Prince of the nations,
In accents of mercy forbids us to fear.

O, sing the sweet pæan of love and salvation,
And soar on the pinions of mercy and truth,
And rest on the broad and unbounded foundation,
Roared by the Redeemer on pillars of truth.

We'll sing the sweet pæan, and praise our Creator,
In life's fading region, until we shall rise,
Array'd in the garb of a supernal nature,
And sing with the angels in yon glorious skies.

THE TWILIGHT HOUR.

The hues of parting day
Are fading in the West
And now the twilight gray
Invites the swain to rest;
A welcome pause, a moment given
To lift the thoughts from earth to heaven.

Now memory wakes the grief—
The joys long, long gone by;
Nor heeds the rustling leaf—
The breeze's gentle sigh:
Dreams of the past, that come with power,
To haunt us at the twilight hour.

Rise, grov'ler! stay no more;
But stretch thy feeble wings,
And strive by faith to soar
Above terrestrial things,—
Where morn, and noon, and twilight gray,
Are lost in one eternal day.

SONNET.

BY H. K. WHITE.

Oh, 'twill be over soon—this sickly dream
Of life will vanish from my feverish brain;
And death my wearied spirit will redeem
From this wild region of unvaried pain.
Yon brook will glide as softly as before—
Yon landscape smile—yon golden harvest grow;
Yon sprightly lark on mounting wing will soar,
When my sad name is heard no more below.
Sigh, when all my youthful friends caress—
They laugh in health and future evils brave;
Them shall a wife and smiling children bless,
While I am mouldering in my silent grave.
God of the just! thou gavest the bitter cup;
I bow to thy behest, and drink it up.

FANATICISM.

The religion that Christ came to establish, does not exact that gloomy, monkish austerity from its votaries that is often exhibited; that message of glad tidings should inspire us with other feelings than those of the most sombre, melancholy hue. Is there not a joy in knowing that there is endless, unspeakable happiness provided for every one who will receive it, that "whoever will may come?" Then why lead the inquirer into fields of theoretical speculation, terrify him with threats, perplex him with doubts, or plunge him into despondency, with the most dismal forebodings? Religion, where the mind is influenced by common sense, does not demand that we practice penance and mortification, and despise the good things which a kind Providence has bestowed upon us; but on the contrary, it is impious to put too low an estimate upon the bounties which he has thrown around us. We may use the things of this world in such a way as may contribute to our own, and to others' permanent comfort; being ever mindful of the Giver, and of our accountability to him.

It is a trait in the mental character of man, to run into extravagances, to be led astray by the wild vagaries of wayward fancy, uninfluenced by the sober dictates of common sense. This frailty of our nature has been manifested in all countries, and in all ages, from the most remote antiquity; and there has not been in any place, at any time, the most ridiculous, or the most absurd notions in politics or religion, but have found their advocates and abettors among the most enlightened of the age. We have but to peruse the history of our own country, to be made acquainted with the proneness of our species to embrace the most fanatical, and foolish, and inconsistent notions that ever entered the mind of man. And for this we need not go back many years—the events of our own times, in our own day and generation, are fraught with superstition and phrensy; and what is very singular, every deluded sect claims to be Divinely inspired, and to derive its doctrines from the same blessed volume. Fanaticism is contagious, and those who have uniformly led a life of consistency, and been noted for their good sense, no sooner enter the charmed circle, than the wildest enthusiasm takes possession of their minds, and governs all their actions. Generally, however, they who are fanatics in one thing, are fanatics in whatever else their minds become engaged; the same individual will be factious in politics, an exclusive in diet, and a zealot in religion. Every principle by them must be pushed to extremes; they are the ultra reformers of the age, the radicals of the nineteenth century; they would have a man confine himself to a diet of bread and water, devote his whole time to the benevolent operations of the day, and literally "pray without ceasing." Such are to be commended for their philanthropy—for their honest desire to benefit mankind, but they are to be pitied for their lack of discretion. Their arguments and examples operate upon all who do not become their disciples, like negative electricity—driving each other farther asunder.—Philosophy of Living.

COMMUNION WITH GOD.

What more conducive to our happiness, and what greater source of pleasure and instruction, than to hold communion with the Father of our spirits! To turn our backs for a time, upon the engrossing cares of a noisy world, and bring our thoughts and our devotions to the calm and grand repose of nature's instructions, and through them to nature's Author. Who does not love to steal away from the excitements and passions of the world, and quench the fever of assiduous devotions to its interests, in the contemplation of the loveliness, peace, in the harmony displayed in the works of the Creator! And thus to hold intercourse with the Spirit of our spirits—to commune with nobler things than earth affords. It is through the medium of his works that the Creator delights to hold converse with his creatures.—The voice of inspiration is heard all around us—in the most solitary and desolate places of earth, we hear the inviting sounds of our Father's instruction—we read the solemn and important lessons of wisdom, and truth, and love. Especially does the returning energies of nature, in this vernal season, remind us that the glorious and extensive volume of the Divine goodness, is again opened for our admiration and profit. Who does not delight to hold communion with the spirit of the seasons, and let the heart and affections go out in gratitude and love to the Author of all beings? Welcome again the spirit and inspiration of Summer! Welcome this season of grateful communion with our Father above, and our kindred on earth. May devotion inspire our hearts, and pleasure crown our exertions, in the cause of truth. —Watchman.

CAUSE OF QUARREL.—"I wish I owned all the pasture land in the word," said Bob. "Well, I wish I owned all the cattle in the world," said Ned. "How would you feed them?" asked Bob. "I'd turn them into your pasture," said Ned. "No you wouldn't!" "Yes I would!" "No you wouldn't!" "Yes I would!" "You shan't!" "I shall!" And then came the fisticuffs—and oh! how they did fight!

MARRIAGES.

In Mottsville, July 7th, by Rev. N. Brown, Mr. CHARLES HILLYARD, to Miss MARY ANN EARL, both of that place.

In Gainesville, July 4th, by Rev. W. E. Manley, Mr. HIRAM C. SMITH, of Warsaw, to Miss MARY HAWLEY, of the former place.

In Perry, August 8th, by Rev. S. Barnes, Mr. JABEZ B. BURR, to Miss CHARLOTTE B. PATCHEN, all of Perry.

In Geneva, July 4th, by Rev. O. Ackley, Mr. AMASA NELSON, to Miss MARY ANN COUNTRYMAN, both of Manchester.

DEATHS.

In Richfield, by drowning, on Sunday, the 4th inst., Mr. NICHOLAS UTT, a German by birth, of good character and habits, aged about 22 years, who had crossed the "world of waters" to be drowned in a mill-pond, ere he had breathed the luxuriant breeze of 90 Summer days in the land of freedom. The morning sun that shone upon his countenance, beaming with health and vigor, before he had sunk behind the western hills shone as brightly upon a newly made grave. And now he sleeps the sleep of death, a "stranger in a strange land," without one relative to drop the tear of sympathy over the lowly mound. The funeral was attended at 6 o'clock, P. M., of the same day, at the house of Mr. Braman, where a select portion of Scripture was read, a word of exhortation given, and a short prayer offered, by the writer. J. S. KIBBE.

In Cobleskill, Schoharie co., August 4th, at the residence of her son, Jonah Westover, Esq., Mrs. ASENATH WESTOVER, aged 85 years. She died as she had lived for nearly the last half century, a firm, consistent, and practical believer in the restitution of all things, spoken by the mouth of all God's holy prophets since the world began. J. W

In McDonough, August 8th, Mrs. OLIVE JACOBS, aged 33 years. She has left a husband and two children to mourn their loss. We pray that the consolations of the Gospel may be a comfort to them in their afflictions, and be the means of leading them nearer to the fountain of peace and salvation. I visited Mrs. Jacobs a few days before her death, and found that her greatest consolation was in the promises of Heaven. She wished me to address the people at her funeral, and inform them that she died a firm believer in the restitution; which I did, assisted in the services by Mr. Densmore, of the Methodist persuasion, in an affectionate prayer to Heaven for a blessing to rest upon us all. But at the close of the services, in a prayer by Elder Bennet, of the Baptist order, I was led to reflect on the vanity of the professions of men; for when we have reason to expect the olive branch of peace, we are offered the glove of contention at a time when it is known that a reply can not be given consistent with the rules of propriety. C. S. BROWN.

In Triangle, Broome county, July 25th, Mr. GIDEON BAKER, aged 74 years, formerly from Lebanon, N. H. He had been a resident of this county 34 years, and for more than 20 years past a firm and consistent believer in the restitution. His loss to his family, to the Universalist society in this place, and community at large, is great. He was a universal friend to the human race. The funeral was attended by the writer. C. S. BROWN.

Will the Watchman and Trumpet copy for the benefit of the connections in that region?

In German Flats, of scarlet fever, April 15th, RHODA ANN LARENA, daughter of Lemuel Swift, aged 9 years. The funeral was attended on the following day, and a discourse delivered by the writer. Also, on the 23d of April, by the same disease, the youngest daughter of Lemuel Swift, aged about 6 years. A few days previous to the death of those children, the father-in-law and a son of about 12 years, was by death called from the social circle. Thus in the space of a few weeks, has this afflicted family been deprived of four of its members! May the consolations of the Gospel, which maketh glad the hearts of the children of men, be their comfort and support, until they shall join the spirits of those loved ones in the mansions of bliss. J. D. HICKS.

In Newville, May 15th, of scarlet fever, JAMES HERBERT, only son of James and Eliza Mattison, aged 1 year. A discourse was delivered to the afflicted parents and sympathising friends, on the following day, by the writer; this being the third and last child that has by death been called away. We feel to sympathise with them in their loss, but we hope that their loss is the gain of those little loved ones who now sweetly sleep in the arms of him that took little children into his arms and blessed them. EPHES. VI: 1-9.

The apostle of the Gentiles found, among the nations to whom he carried the glad tidings of a Heaven-sent Teacher, a lamentable neglect of the means of happiness which God had provided for his intelligent offspring, and especially of those which, when improved, serve to endear and happify our domestic relations. "Hateful and hating one another" was a true description of the generality of the men of that age, even in their parental, filial and conjugal relations. As a corrective of this melancholy neglect of the kind arrangement of Heaven for human happiness, Paul endeavored to infuse among those to whom he addressed his discourses and epistles, a better knowledge of God and his laws for the government of this world, and of the means of happiness which they were neglecting. Into every bosom he essayed to infuse a sentiment of gratitude to God and good-will to man, and to those in the closest connexions of life, he pointed the way of best securing the appointed felicities of their condition.

Were another Paul to appear among us, would he not be surprised and indignant to find the state of our social relations so little improved, among a people professedly Christian, and whose forefathers for ages have been Christians too? Would he not after eighteen centuries of professedly Christian instruction, need to point to us the way to our duty as well as our interest? We fear there are few in this Christian land who do not need reminiscences upon these subjects. Let us, then, consider the advice of Paul to children and parents, servants and masters, in the ancient days, applying it to ourselves as we need it now.

Children and youth would fain rid themselves of parental authority and restraint now, as in the days of Paul. They should be made to feel, however, that to their parents, God has entrusted them for the purpose of forming their habits and judgments, and generally, of fitting them for the useful and happy discharge of their employments here, and for a remorseless departure to future abodes. They should be made to feel the obligation which this trust imposes; they should be made to feel their own weakness, and judgment, and liability to err; they should be made to perceive their parents' anxiety to execute well the duties assigned to them, and their judiciousness in exercising authority; they should be made to feel the benefits resulting from parental warnings and restraints; they should be directed to instances in history and around them, where obedient children have surpassed in usefulness, happiness and honor, the less distinguished for obedience, or the disobedient; and if from these and similar impressions upon the youthful mind, there does not flow a prompt, and cheerful, and respectful compliance with parental instructions, then may the parent's heart well nigh despair. But until parental ingenuity and perseverance have been employed in methods like the above, let not parents despair. If parents will not make such impressions upon the minds of their children, how can they expect obedience and respect from their children! Last week we saw that while Paul was enjoining directly a duty upon wives and husbands, he was indirectly prescribing the co-relative obligations of the other party; and we now see that while recommending to youth a respectful obedience, he is, by implication, perhaps designedly, indicating to parents what they must do if they would secure that graceful ornament of youth—respect for superior wisdom, and meek docility.

We know not a more succinct yet comprehensive summary of the various duties of a parent, than that of Paul. By the phrase "nurture and admonition of the Lord," or as Wakefield renders it, "discipline and instruction of the Lord," we understand, in accordance with the Hebrew mode of phraseology, the best possible course of discipline and instruction. And by the admonition, "provoke not your children to wrath," we understand the apostle to mean that parents ought to maintain a kind regard for the welfare of their children in such strength as to regulate and characterize all their conduct. This would alike prevent undue indulgence and undue severity, and would most effectually enlist in the cause which the parent is endeavoring to promote, the feelings and exertions of the child. Silly, self-indulgent child-indulgence, and rigorous, unreasonable restraint both operate to produce disrespect and dislike to the parent, and consequently to all that parent's injunctions. If, then, a parent aims at giving to his child such habits, such tastes, such mental capacities, and such information as shall enable him to be a happy, and useful member of society, does he not aim at all that can be expected of him? And if no consideration of his own ease, no provocation to hasty anger, ever make him swerve from his affectionate devotion to his child's best interests, does he not blamelessly maintain the proper spirit of a parent? This we understand Paul to have recommended, and therefore, we consider his directions as very comprehensive. But under these directions, what an assemblage of duties and responsibilities are involved! O! how extensive, how difficult the parent's duties! We can not be expected to dwell upon them here: the mere enumeration of them would lead us beyond our limits. But we wish that all parents under whose eyes this may fall, would devote some leisure moments to think over, in their own minds, the important trust which is committed to them, and to review their past conduct in reference to the duties it carries with it, and to make resolutions of amendment. In the words of Prof. Palfrey I would conclude this most brief address to parents, recommending them to some such monitor to parental duties as his sermons contain. "Among all commissions for mutual service, I can not see that God has committed to man any trust, in which results more momentous are involved. When I think of the consequences, which, by strict, and all-embracing and irrevocable laws, inevitably follow on good and bad qualities and conduct—the long, and still lengthening train of consequences, which are to attend on them through the successive years of this, and ages of the coming life,—when I think that the mind thus makes, or rather is, a world to itself, and that the unformed mind is for the parent's forming,—it seems to me that he who is invested with that trust, can not be warned to be faithful with too solemn an admonition, can not be conjured to be faithful with too earnest an entreaty." Would that all parents felt so, and would be roused to such exertions as the immense importance of their trust demands. Parents! let us every evening ask ourselves if we have done our duty, all in our power, for our children's welfare; and every morning let us renew our resolution to do yet more.

Were servants, that is, all those who make a contract to perform certain offices for others, to regulate their conduct according to the advice of Paul, the pecuniary or other compensation which they receive from their employers, would be an inconsiderable reward compared with that serene self-satisfaction which they would possess in their own bosoms. We refer, of course, to the spirit which Paul recommends, the acting conscientiously, faithfully, not with the view merely of securing the approval of man, but so as to secure the approbation of conscience and of God. He who is faithful to his engagements from a sense of duty, of obligation before God, even were there no other witnesses of his conduct, is such a one as God approves, and for whom he has provided a rich, a satisfying reward. Besides this bosom-reward, such a one will generally receive more from his employers than one not equally conscientious and devoted to duty. If servants, all employed in another's service—all who have made a contract to do any office for another, would consult their own interests as well as their duty, they would be conscientiously faithful to the trust reposed, or engagement made. "The obligation of this condition," says Dr. Palfrey, "require nothing less, than that whatever duty, according to express or implied stipulation, belongs to it, be performed heartily, as to the Lord and not unto men; not with the hypocritical, sycophantic eye-service of men pleasers, but with a conscientious and self-denying, an alert and cheerful and cordial diligence—a diligence and attention as scrupulous in the master's absence, as beneath his eye.—God holds him accountable for his performance of this trust. The Gospel has laid its solemn charge upon him, that 'with good-will he do service, and show all good fidelity,' adorning thus 'the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things.'" As we are all servants, in some form or other, let us think of these things.

Masters and employers would also find their happiness much increased, were they to adopt the principle of action recommended by Paul. Dressed in a little brief authority, men are too apt to assume such haughty airs as "make even angels weep." Besides a just and equitable allotment of wages, lodging and sustenance, there are farther claims upon employers. These Paul does not specify, but, like a wise philosopher and instructor, indicates and recommends the seminal principle which will produce them. From the two considerations which he mentions, to wit, the recollection of their own responsibility, if not to man, at least to God, and that in the sight of Heaven there is no respect of persons—from these, it were easy to show, all amiable and useful virtues on the part of masters would readily flow. It were easy, also, to show that these considerations when influential on our conduct, would effectually prevent all ebullitions of anger, haughtiness and all other unseemly dispositions, in which we may have detected ourselves, or which we may observe too common around us. Our limits forbid our prosecution of such a demonstration; but if those concerned will only do it for themselves, they will find it no unprofitable employment of a leisure hour.

Seeing the excellence of the Christian precepts to husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants, have any of us resolved to amend our practice thereby? "Forming resolutions of this character, my friends, we are already happy,—sure to be more and more so, the longer and more strenuously we strive to carry them into effect. It is no law of books, no wordy pretence of the pulpit, that in proportion as we serve God and man, we best serve ourselves, as well for time as for eternity. It is what experience, however evaded, insists on teaching us." So says Prof. Palfrey, and so also

SOCIAL KINDNESS.

"Let love be without dissimulation. Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good."—ROMANS xii: 9.

Man was formed for society. He should therefore cultivate social feelings—feelings of friendship and good-will towards all men, especially to those of the household of faith. All who profess to believe in God's boundless grace and mercy, should remember, and endeavor to feel the obligations they are under, to let their love be without dissimulation—i. e. without hypocrisy. It should be ardent and sincere. Those little communities that dwell in the same village or neighborhood, should be careful to cultivate a spirit of friendship towards each other. Much good may be done in this way. Much pleasure may be derived, and much happiness diffused abroad through community. We should feel an interest in each other's welfare—an interest that will lead us to weep with those that weep, as well as to rejoice with those that rejoice. The Universalist community have not come up to the spirit of the doctrine they profess, in this respect. There is yet among us, too much of the old spirit of Partialism; of hatred and revenge, envy, jealousy and wrath; and if we wish to convince the world around us of the superiority of our faith, we must put away all these evils, we must be kind and obliging, forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, even as we hope to be forgiven. If we would, all of us, endeavor to act up to this principle of our holy religion, we should be much happier than we are, and do much to win others to the love and service of the truth as it is in Jesus revealed.

We can do it, dear reader, in a variety of ways—in many little acts of kindness to each other—in a careful watch over ourselves, being careful that we do not exaggerate the failings of our neighbors, but rather, hide the faults we see. In all our intercourse with one another, let there be a sacred regard to truth, and each other's feelings—a frankness that proceeds from the heart, and much good will result therefrom. In our approach at the altar of religion, we should, by all means, lay aside every unhallowed thought and feeling; we should realize the place we are in, and the object for which we are assembled together, so that it may be none other to us than the "house of God, and the gate of heaven." Remember, that God reads the heart, and that our devotion should be spiritual and divine. The particular place that we may occupy in the church, or even in the singing choir, is of but little importance, and the sensible part of the audience will certainly award to each member of this department, their just meed of praise. And above all, when we reflect that the "all-seeing eye" is upon us, we should rise above such childish, and earthly distinctions, and seek the honor that cometh from God only. We should all of us endeavor to enter into the spirit of the Gospel of Christ, that in this way we may profit by this most pleasing part of our religious exercises. Let us remember, that in the providence of God we can remain together and enjoy each other's society, but a short time, at longest, and this consideration, alone, will teach us to "let our love be without dissimulation." Could we all feel and act as we ought in these particulars, we might have a little heaven on earth, and enjoy a foretaste of heavenly bliss. Let us, then, one and all, resolve to try it. Abhor that which is evil, abstain from and avoid all tattling, and evil speaking. Much mischief is done in this way, and the holy religion we profess, forbids the indulgence of this pernicious habit. "Cleave to that which is good"—i. e. those things that are "lovely and of good report." If we keep up a friendly intercourse with our neighbors, and by acts of kindness and benevolence, aid them in the hour of trial and affliction, we shall render them and ourselves happy. The world is made up of little things, and it is more honorable to be always employed in what the world terms little kindnesses; than to do a great act of benevolence on some public occasion, merely to have our names published to the world, as having done some great thing; for a kind word, or a kind look, which are considered as mere trifles, do more real good, under certain circumstances, than the majority of mankind imagine. Let not then our "good be evil spoken of;" but, "To do good and communicate forget not, for with such sacrifices God is well pleased." Cultivate social feelings with thy neighbor—render to no man, evil for evil, but overcome evil with good; so shall thy days be happy, thy company desirable, and thy life glide smoothly and tranquilly away. Then will thy love be, indeed, without dissimulation, and it may be truly said, thou dost abhor that which is evil, and cleave to that which is good. MURRAY.

UNIVERSALIST WESTERN EMIGRATION SOCIETY.

Br. GROSH—Your remarks relative to the above named society, seem to me to require a word of explanation from some one interested in the proposed society. And this, perhaps, I may as well do as any one. I did not myself originate the plan of forming the settlement proposed, but am decidedly in favor of it, as I understand it: and I am confident I view it as do most of those who have given in their names for membership.

The society will be formed, as I understand it, upon nearly the following plan, which, you will discover, does not involve the difficulties you have suggested.

The members of the society will be mostly men who have families. They, it will be expected, will be Universalists in faith and practice: but it will not be required that their wives or children agree with them in sentiment, however desirable such agreement might be. The society will also doubtless embrace some young men, who have no families, who will also be Universalists. At its organization, a constitution will be adopted, which shall embrace such resolutions and offices, and impose such obligations, as in the judgment of its members, will be best calculated to secure a good location, a satisfactory division of the land, and the subsequent prosperity of the colony, for a definite term of years—the constitution to be laid aside at the expiration of that period, or re-adopted for another period, as the wisdom of settlers shall dictate. I do not suppose that the society will be of perpetual continuance, for this I think could not be; but that it will continue sufficiently long to do away many of those inconveniences that usually attend new settlements, where no combination of this kind is entered into, and to secure many additional conveniences and privileges that could not otherwise be enjoyed. To do away these inconveniences, and secure these privileges, is the main object of the society, and may be secured without its perpetual continuance. Hence, till this object is effected, it is not believed that any change of religious views, or other militating circumstances, will be likely to occasion any difficulty. For should a man change his religious views, he will be allowed either to remain in the colony, or to remove out of it. And should any one on account of a change of sentiment, or for any other reason, wish to sell his land, he will be allowed to do it undoubtedly, either to a Universalist or Limitarian, as he chooses. He should, however, in my opinion, be required to give the resident settlers the opportunity of making the purchase, before he sells to any Limitarian. Again: should any lady residing in the colony, become the wife of a Limitarian gentleman, he will probably take her out of the colony to his own home, and of course will be the occasion of no difficulty to the society. Or should he prefer to come into the colony, he will, I presume, be allowed to do so. Similar remarks might be made respecting the change of sentiment, or intermarrying, of those who shall be reared in the colony. But I repeat, that these things can occasion no inconvenience, till the main object of the settlement shall have been secured. It is not expected that the constitution at first adopted by the society, is to embrace the civil code, by which the affairs of the colony are to be regulated, nor the articles of faith or religious obligations of a church or religious corporation. These will be separate concerns.

The question has been asked by some, whether any persons will be allowed to invest funds and purchase land in the township, without becoming actual settlers. The answer is no; since the object is not to allow speculators to make money without any sacrifices or efforts, but to do away the inconveniences of a new settlement, and promote its prosperity and happiness, both temporally and morally.

You will perceive, Br. Grosh, that I have merely stated my view of the plan, without presuming to say that this will be the one adopted. But whatever may be the plan, no one disposed to settle at the West, need hesitate to give in his name for membership; for when the meeting for organization shall take place, that plan will be adopted which the majority shall approve; and all not disposed to "go forward," will be allowed to withdraw.

Yours, truly, W. E. MANLEY.

REMARKABLE DREAM.

The following dream is probably apocryphal, but it is too good, and exposes too clearly the utter worthlessness of obedience to God when based only on fear of endless tortures, to be lost. It was furnished by two different correspondents (one at the South and the other at the West) within the same week. We give it in the briefest form. It is said to have been related by a good old Methodist lady, in a class or conference meeting of her denomination. If it was so told, it must have created "no small stir" at its conclusion. A. B. G.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

"One evening, after having completed the regular routine of my domestic and religious duties, I laid me down for repose. Nothing burdened my mind—indeed, it was unusually clear and composed—nor had the subject of death occupied my thoughts during the day, but I soon fell asleep and dreamed the following dream:—

"I was suddenly taken ill, and after languishing a few days on the couch of affliction, I wound up the drama of life, and made my exit into the future world. I hied away through the regions of space, for a long lapse of time, nothing occurring to disturb or particularly interest me. At length, however, a prospective view of heaven's blissful empire, burst upon my enraptured vision, and as I approached, grew only the more lovely and sublime. I arrived at the place of entering, and, welcomed with plaudits, was conducted to, and joined the company of the same denomination with myself. The scene was grand and glorious beyond description. A plain of fine gold, as it were, illimitable in extent, stretched out before me, and abounded with every thing that could beautify and beatify a heaven. In the midst of this vast plain arose the throne of "the only living and true God," magnificent and glorious, far above the conception even of the most imaginative mind, while "confined within the walls of this clay tenement." The great Governor of the universe sat upon his throne, surrounded by the brightness of his own glory: at his right hand sat Christ, the blessed Redeemer of the world, and the celestial choir was singing anthems of praise to their great names. Close by the foot of the throne, on the right hand, was the Methodist denomination—on the left, the Baptist—before it, the Presbyterian, and behind it, the Episcopalian—each order was in a little group by itself, and held no intercourse with the others, and was kept within the immediate vicinity of the throne. I looked round about me, observed the situations of the different orders, and rejoiced that my denomination should be so highly favored as to be placed at the right hand of the Father.

"But while viewing the scene before me, and contemplating upon the joy and felicity of that blissful abode, I descried afar off an innumerable multitude who seemed to be roaming the celestial fields at their pleasure, and regaling upon the choicest fruits of the heavenly clime. My curiosity was instantly excited, and I desired to learn who they were. I accordingly addressed myself to Christ, and asked him who that multitude were "away yonder," ranging heaven without restraint: to which Jesus replied, "They are Universalists, the only denomination that God, the Father, dare trust out of sight!"

Br. Grosh, I here send you the copy of an Address which was written at the request of Br. B. Bailey, Jr., signed by him, and agreeably to his wishes, read at his funeral. By giving it place in the columns of the Magazine, if you deem it worthy, you will oblige a large circle of mourners, and interest the readers of your valuable paper in this section. The obituary notice of our excellent and lamented brother in the Gospel faith, was published in the 24th number of the present volume, of the Magazine and Advocate.

F. J. Briggs.

"The time of my departure is at hand."

Disease is preying upon my frame, wasting my strength, and destroying the vital functions. I am sensible that my earthly course is nearly terminated, and I must shortly sleep in death.

The minds of people are not a little exercised with regard to the future world. After the curtain of separation shall have been drawn, and I shall have passed from the theatre of time, these inquiries will probably be made—what was my faith—my hope—and what the state of my mind? It will not then be in my power to respond to such inquiries. I have therefore concluded to leave behind me this testimony of my faith, and declaration of my feelings, in view of my approaching dissolution.

1. I believe "that God exists;" "that the Lord our God is one Lord," "that he is the Father of the spirits of all flesh, and all souls are his;" that "he is good to all," that "his mercy is everlasting," that "he is love" and "changes not."

2. I believe that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God," and "the one Mediator between God and men, who gave himself a ransom for all," as "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God;" that he is "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world;" that "God sent him, not to condemn, but to save the world," and "the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hands;" "for it is his meat and his drink to do the will of the Father and to finish his work."

3. Hence I expect, with unwavering faith, the glorious and eternal salvation of the whole human family, when the Lord, according to his promise, "will swallow up death in victory, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain." I consider that nature, especially the Scriptures teaches this truth plainly, definitely, and pointedly.

My religious opinions have undergone no changes for several years, except, as this world is receding from my view, hope brightens and my faith grows stronger. It is now almost seven years since my life has been "one continued disease," and a great part of this time I have devoted to searching the Scriptures, and meditating upon these things. Ever since I became established in my present faith, it has been to me an unfailing source of consolation. None but those who possess it can estimate its real value. It deprives death of its terrors, the grave of its gloom, and futurity of its dread.

A word to my friends and acquaintances who have not the same faith. It is repeatedly said that Universalism will do to live by, but it will not do to die by; I find it is good to die by. It is with the highest gratification that I read the confessions of those ancient worthies whose last words are recorded in the Scriptures of the consolation, and note the support it gave them in death.

God promised Abraham, that in Christ all the families of the earth should be blessed, and repeated the same to Isaac, and afterwards to Jacob. This enabled Jacob, as the hour of his dissolution drew near, and he called his children around him to bestow upon them the parting blessing, to mention the Saviour, his faith in him, and the salvation he would accomplish for the children of men. "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet, till Shiloh come; and to him shall the gathering of the people be." By this faith he lived; in the triumph of this faith he died, "and when he was a dying, worshipped, leaning upon the top of his staff." By this faith he saw that the approaching separation from his family was not final; for to the promised Shiloh the gathering of the people would be, as all the families of the earth would be blessed in him. He found this faith would do to die by—why should any one distrust it? It supported him—why should it not me? I am a husband and a parent. I find myself endeared to my family with indissoluble ties. How consoling, then, the assurance, that all the families of the earth shall be blessed in Christ; that to him shall the gathering of the people be; when I shall meet the partner of my bosom, the sharer of my woes, and the supporter of my dying pillow, with my children, and all the children of men, in the realms of bliss, and meet to part no more!

The last time David tuned his lyre, he sung the praise of his Redeemer and the glories of universal salvation. "He shall judge thy people with righteousness—The mountains shall bring peace to the people—He shall come down like rain upon mown grass; as showers that water the earth—He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the rivers to the ends of the earth—His name shall endure forever, and men shall be blessed in him, and all nations shall call him blessed. Blessed be the Lord God, the God of Israel, who only doeth wondrous things. And blessed be his glorious name forever; let the whole earth be filled with his glory. Amen, and Amen." To this I respond, Amen. His last words express his confidence in the same truth. "Now these be the last words of David—The spirit of the Lord spake by me, and his word was in my tongue.—The God of Israel said—There shall be a Ruler over men, just and ruling in the fear of the Lord. (The marginal reading, and a predication of Jesus undoubtedly.) He shall be as the light of the morning when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds. He hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure; for this is all my salvation, and all my desire." Can we need any farther testimony? If so, let us hear the last words of Simeon as he held the infant Saviour in his arms.—"Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace according to thy word; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation which thou hast prepared before the face of all people, a light to lighten the Gentiles and the glory of thy people Israel."—"Let me die the death of the righteous, let my last end be like his."

I regret that there is manifested among a certain class, a great reluctance to admit that any die in this faith, which I consider to be the one "once delivered to the saints," accompanied with a readiness to comdemn all those who do. Out of regard to the feelings of my family and relatives, I call upon you in the name of truth, by the dictates of charity and those feelings that ought to predominate in the breast of civilized man, when my wearied frame is consigned to the earth, and my spirit takes its flight to God, do not report that I said on my death-bed what never entered my heart; do not slily whisper nor loudly boast that I renounced before I died;—neither assume the office of judge to condemn me. Such proceedings will not change truth, nor benefit any. They can not have any effect upon me, to make my situation better or worse; and it is not for my sake that I urge this. Such proceedings can only serve to deepen the distress of my family, tear open the wounds of their bleeding hearts, who feel as if their present bereavment is as much as they can endure; and it is for them that I make this request.

To those of the same faith, I would say—This doctrine is the truth of God, this faith is the Gospel faith, and this hope is the Christian hope.—I exhort you to be active in its promulgation and its prosperity; for "it is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing." Fight the good fight of faith—adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things, that he who is of a contrary mind may have no ill thing to say of you, and that the truth may not be despised.

I tender my heart-felt thanks to you, my acquaintances, for the assistance you have given, the kindness and sympathy you have shown me and my family during my long and distressing illness. It is out of my power to reward you. Accept of my best wishes. I commend you to God, who has assured us that the goodness and benevolence of the children of men shall not pass unrewarded.

We part, but we part to meet again, where tears shall be wiped from all faces. I bid you all Adieu. Benjamin Bailey, Jr.

THE CALUMNY REFUTED.

Br. Grosh—You will accept my thanks for the kind and generous manner in which you have met the base calumnies of one Eli Clark. I have taxed my memory to the utmost, and am unable to recollect that I ever heard of him before. The society at Oswego had been founded some months when I commenced my labors with them. Brs. John C. Ives and J. D. Shuart, were both active men in the formation of the society, and to them I would refer relative to the Universalism of Clark. One thing is certain: he is not now a Universalist.

Can not something be done to stop the lying tongues of these walking pestilences, who live by administering to the worst passions of human nature?—they are mendicants and vagrants in the most extensive meaning of these words. May God punish and forgive them. O. Whiston.

"Far in the deep where darkness dwells,
The land of horror and despair;
Justice hath built a dismal hell,
And laid her stores of vengeance there."

It would seem that the author of the above, possessed a faculty directly the reverse of that possessed by the honey bee, which enables him to extract honey from almost every noxious drug that comes in his way. For sure I am, that his powers of extraction must have been very strong, to extract the doctrine of endless hell torments from the justice of God. And when by his superior powers he had succeeded in obtaining this doctrine to his own satisfaction, instead of its being meat and drink to his soul, in a time of trouble and distress, it must have been like gall and hemlock to the wounded conscience, whenever he calmly reflected upon the character which he ascribed to his Father and his God, whose justice requires all to be just, and can never be satisfied till all shall be holy and good. LIFE.

What is life? 'Tis like the transient bubble of the ocean, which floats awhile, and then subsides and sinks to rest. 'Tis as the morning dew, which vanishes before the rising sun, and like it, leaves no traces of its former existence. 'Tis like the Summer cloud, momentary and evanescent. Its orbit is coursed by many, its aphelion reached by few. Asa.

PRAYER....NO. III.

BY REV. C. SPEAR

In our last we alluded, in closing, to the frame of mind that we ought to possess, when we engage in the service of prayer. A modern and somewhat celebrated writer, has presented the following. There must be—

1st. A solemn conviction of the character and attributes of God, and of the relations which he sustains to us.

2d. A conviction of the relations which we sustain to Him, and of our obligations to Him.

3d. An affecting view of our sinfulness, helplessness, and misery.

4th. Sincere gratitude for all the favors which we have received.

5th. A fixed and undissembled resolution to obey the commands of God in future.

6th. Unreserved submission to all His will.

7th. Unshaken confidence in the veracity of God.

8th. Importunate desires that our petitions, especially for spiritual blessings, should be granted.

9th. A soul at peace with all mankind.

I have taken the liberty to present the above, because of the clearness of the statements. The whole subject is thus presented in a very concise manner to the reader. In the third position, the writer says, "we ought to have an affecting view of our sinfulness," etc. This is very important. We are apt to value ourselves upon our own righteousness. We ought ever to consider that we "have sinned and come short of the glory of God." We are also helpless, and dependent on the Father of mercies. Of ourselves we are nothing. "In Him we live, and move, and have our being." In the next place, we ought ever to be grateful to God for his favors, and it is our duty to express this gratitude both in a private and public manner. Hence the importance and necessity of prayer. I was particularly pleased with the last statement of this writer, in which he says it demands a suitable preparation of mind, that when we pray, we should have "a soul at peace with all mankind." Without this, no man can pray in a sincere manner to his God. When the mind becomes agitated by passion, every thing is exhibited through a false medium. The individual wholly disqualifies himself for every duty, and for the enjoyment of every rational pleasure. Surely, then, in such a frame of mind, sincere prayer can not be offered to that Being who "searcheth all hearts, and understandeth all the imaginations of the thoughts." Hence, when we pray, we are to cultivate a charitable and forgiving spirit. And it should be borne in mind, that prayer is peculiarly calculated to give us right views and feelings.

I have thus presented to the reader, some imperfect remarks on this interesting subject. Let him pursue it, and he will find a variety of profitable reflections. Let me close with the declaration of the apostle: "I exhort, therefore, that first of all, supplication, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; for kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour; who will have all men to be saved, and come unto the knowledge of the truth."

EMULATION AND CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

(Br. Grosh—I have lately met with some much-needed hints to those concerned in the education of youth, as all parents and professed instructors are, in a lecture said to have been delivered at the Flushing Institute, by one of the Instructors to the pupils. In the hope that many of your readers will be equally gratified as myself with these educational suggestions, and that their adoption by the parents and instructors of the rising generation, may contribute to the amelioration of those who are to come after us, I have been persuaded to condense the lecture, and present your readers with the principal suggestions.
A. N. S. S.)

There are two things, my young friends, which I would have you carefully to distinguish—for the distinction between them is important, and one which we have always kept in view in our methods of exciting you to industry in this Institute. We have discarded emulation, and urged you only to Christian endeavor. Doubtless there is much of the former among you, but the latter alone has ever been cherished. That you may see more plainly the difference of the two things, often confounded by wiser heads than yours, and remember it the better, I will illustrate it by an example.

The lecturer here supposes a case, where the the prize at a school of gymnastics was competed for by two; A—— reached the top of the pole and so gained the prize; B—— failed by three feet, but, though deserving much credit for his ingenuity and exertions, could not, according to the conditions, receive a prize. At the announcement by the judges, it is said or supposed, that the countenance of A—— which had before worn the serenity of self-satisfaction, brightened up with a new smile, which in spite of his endeavors to conceal, betrayed a sudden increase of joy. He was happy in the consciousness of his own success, but he was happier when he understood he was alone in that success. He went, indeed, up to B——, and condoled him on his disappointment, probably without any consciousness of insincerity, but with that kind of condescending sympathy, which the victor expresses for the vanquished.

Now, says the lecturer, we must all admit that A——'s feelings in this case were perfectly natural. Whether they were right or not, we do not now consider; but every one, who knows himself, will admit that they were natural. Which of us would not feel as he did in like circumstances.—How ever much pleased with our own success, we would, naturally, be a little more pleased with our competitor's non-success. Victory does not love company. You might be ashamed of such complacency in the failure of another, and, if charged with it, probably you might not own it. You would disguise it, and try hard to hide it from yourself. Still the feeling would be there, and if you overcame it you would be conscious of an effort, and not of yielding to the impulse of your nature.

But notwithstanding it was the impulse of A——'s nature, it was wrong. For to what good motive would it be attributed? From what amiable disposition would it spring? All his satisfaction in contemplating his own achievement might have been pure. It might have been the pleasing consciousness of Christian endeavor. Recollecting that he had exerted himself to the utmost, because it was right to improve his muscular strength; that it was his rule to do in the best manner, whatever he did at all, and for other virtuous considerations, his pleasure in winning the prize, however great, might have been innocent and unmingled with the least improper feeling. But not so the addition that was made to his gratification the moment he heard of his neighbor's disappointment. This was wrong; this was unworthy of him as a Christian. Else why did he hide it? Why did he affect to sympathise with B——? Why would he have resented an insinuation that he had no objection to B——'s failure, as a dishonorable charge? Because he would know the feeling to be wrong, and unbecoming any real nobleness of character. This will appear very plain by supposing that on hearing the result of B——'s attempt, he had experienced, not an accession to his joy, but a perceptible diminution of it; that the thermometer of his feelings, instead of rising, had fallen: who in this case would not have thought him a great deal more amiable? Who would not have called him a generous youth?—Who would have refused him the credit of genuine magnanimity? As it was, even the world will not applaud his feelings, and in the view of Christianity, they are decidedly sinful.

And now what do you call the spirit in A—— which gave rise to the additional joy which I have been speaking of? Emulation. After such sinful joy, emulation continually aspires—on such guilty pleasures it feeds. Without such gratification it must die. Hence you have been here taught that the spirit of emulation is sinful, and of course should be allowed no place in the plans of Christian education.—But is emulation, you may ask, never good? The word is sometimes used in a good sense, when it means a strong desire after excellence. But it is not commonly thus understood. When we speak of emulation, the idea of a contest is always understood. We do not mean simply, desires after excellence, but desires to surpass the excellence of others. Emulation always has an eye on others, and necessarily wishes their inferiority. While they are superior, it is restless and uneasy. The moment they are inferior it is satisfied, until new competitors or rivals appear in sight, and then to overtake them is the object of another race. This is the reason why we hear of generous emulation. Generosity regards our conduct and feelings towards others; but if emulation be simple endeavors after excellence, generous is an epithet there is no special propriety in applying to it. This epithet shows that the principle has reference to others. To aim at good for its own sake, is Christian endeavor—this is simple. The object and the motive are one. To aim at good, but always another good than that of our neighbor's is emulation. Here the object is one thing and the motive another. The object may be virtuous; but the motive, a determination to "beat" another as you would say, not far from vice.

From what has been said, you may perceive how questionable a principle of action emulation is at best, how dangerous it may be, and how nearly allied in its operation to the most malicious feelings. In your education, therefore, we will have nothing to do with it. To whatever degree of application it may rouse a few of you, still the gain might be dearly bought; for the costliest furniture of the head must never be purchased with the pearls of the heart. I say a few of you—for after all, it is only on a few in a school that emulation has the desired effect. It is soon discovered who are likely to win; and then the contest is left to these, while the majority fall back into indolence and indifference. Christian endeavor, however, operates equally upon all. Its prizes are distributed by conscience, and may be gained by the man of one talent, as well as by the man of ten. Emulation is fitful. It works only when there are witnesses and competitors. Christian endeavor, on the other hand, is constant and uniform in its operations. Farther, emulation does nothing in the formation of a virtuous character: Christian endeavor does every thing.

Finally, emulation is a weed growing wild in the human heart. Christian endeavor is a flower that asks for culture in the garden of grace.—Hence, even were emulation good, there would be no need of cherishing it among you, since it springs wild and luxuriant enough of itself; while Christian endeavor is of so slow a growth, and so delicate a nature, but so rich in fruits, that as a spiritual gardener, I can not but choose to expend upon it my toil.

THE GOODNESS OF GOD.

What mind, looking abroad upon the stupendous and magnificent works of creation, and contemplating the sublime beauty, the grandeur, the harmony and goodness of God, as made manifest in the wisdom and design of an all-wise Creator, but is ready to exclaim with the Psalmist, "The earth is full of the goodness of the Lord." Turn our eyes in what direction we may, whether above, around, or beneath, we discover nothing in the workmanship of the divine Being, whether animate or inanimate, but is created to some good and wise purpose. The teeming earth, the heaving ocean, the falling flower, the genial sun, the balm of Spring, the fragrance of Summer, the fruitful gales of Autumn, laden with its golden and luxuriant harvest, and even stern Winter, when arrayed in its snowy-white vestment, affording a time for relaxation and social and moral improvement, is not without its blessings and its benefits. The sun, moon, and stars, in order and regularity, pursue undisturbed their wonted courses, dispensing light, and heat, and giving joy and gladness to the wanting sons and daughters of men—each in one accord bearing the impress of the Divinity, and with their united voices proclaiming the unchanging, impartial, and everlasting manifestations of the wisdom, kindness, and goodness of one common Parent, who is good unto all, and whose tender mercies are spread out to the wants of every son and daughter of the Adamic family.

"We can not go
Where universal love not smiles around,
Sustaining all yon orbs, and all their suns,
From seeming evil, still educing good,
And better thence again, and better still,
In infinite progression."

Viewing this to be the true and correct character of the Creator of all things, is it, can it be, that man, the best and noblest work of his creative hand, created in his own image and likeness, ushered into being without any foresight, knowledge, or consent, that man is of less importance than any other portion of his creation, and is to be made a subject of future interminable torments, or sink into a cold, dread nonentity of unconsciousness? Ungrateful child! It is naught but ingratitude for man, while blessed with the light of reason and revelation, and the aid of all surrounding nature—who can watch the rolling sun, the changing seasons—and, while the forest is tuned with the sweet melody of the warbling songster, listen to the tones of the ocean, and voice of the winds—to thus call in question the goodness of God, and fancy that a hell of unutterable, unending, and unmitigated misery is to be his portion; or that life and immortality is all a phantom, and heaven a dream. Indeed, it is surpassing strange, that while "the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth forth his handy work," and each returning season bears upon its generous bosom the rich and bountiful supplies which nature provides for the wants of the needy—I say it is strange, that there should be found a single soul to murmur and repine at the dispensations of Providence. But so it is. On the one hand we are told of the vindictive cruelties of an angry God, who will plunge the offspring of his own creative power down, down to the dark regions of black and endless despair, there to writhe and groan amid hideous yells, and agonizing shrieks, and to be the sport of demons and damned spirits throughout the unceasing ages of eternity.

On the other hand, there are those who adopt the opposite extreme, and audaciously deny the existence of a God, and the divine authenticity of revealed truth. In their zeal to propagate the errors of their intolerant principles, they would hurl from the trembling hand of humanity, the last and only cup of consolation, and in the trying hour of man's earthly dissolution, snatch from the quivering lip of the sick and dying, the hope of a blessed and glorious immortality. They would obliterate the very day-star of hope, whose beams light the pathway to virtue and peace, and in their hearts declare man's existence to be, at best, but a curse, and life itself a cruel bitter. Yes, there are scoffing skeptics, who would mock with contempt at the miracles of Jesus, and spurn with scorn his religion, his precepts, and examples, and who would triumph at the downfall of the venerated temples of Christianity, and, like ill-fated France, see the fair face of Columbia's happy soil reddened with the butchered and bleeding victims of infidelity! Merciful God! are these the tabernacles of thy goodness? Happy for mankind, did the evidence of God's goodness, that is so visibly stamped on every page of creation, continually appear to their minds as it really and truly is, in all the animated beauty and lovelliness of its great and glorious Author. Happy, did we feel and realize our dependence on the great Creator and Preserver of all; that it is by him we live, move, and have our being. Happy, thrice happy, did we know God aright, "whom to know is life eternal"—and oh! that we could everywhere feel ourselves in the hands of a kind Father, who by his wondrous power upholds and sustains the universe—controls, directs, and guides, on the principle of universal love, the destiny of the human race, and regards in pity the humblest wants of his children. "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein."

WISDOM OF GOD.

Wisdom enables its possessor to make a practical use of knowledge. It consists in the adaptation of means to produce the desired end. The wisdom of God is discoverable in his works. A very slight examination of his works in the material world, is sufficient to call forth the admiration of the beholder. It is seen in the order, beauty, regularity, and harmony of the heavenly bodies. The wisdom of God is also manifest to the mind accustomed to investigation, an acquainted with science and philosophy, in the storms, tempests, and hurricanes, which sometimes desolate our earth. These, with the various phenomena which we behold in the heavens and earth, and which sometimes alarm the timid, undoubtedly have their benevolent uses.

But it is observed, and it is doubtless true, that the wisdom of God is still more conspicuously displayed in the creation, preservation, and especially in the redemption of man. But can this be so, if there is a failure, in a degree, in the great work of redemption and salvation? In the material world, God accomplishes what he designs, and has he less power over the moral and spiritual? These remarks are submitted to the candid and reflecting, and may none, in order to save a favorite theory, say in effect, that God has constituted creatures which he can not control. J. B., Jr.

UTICA, FRIDAY, AUGUST 31, 1838.

THE FALLS OF NIAGARA.

In a former paper it was remarked, that the Falls of Niagara, from all appearances, had worn away seven miles of limestone, and therefore had receded that distance from Lewiston towards lake Erie, and that they were still breaking down the rock from time to time. Concerning this fact, an eminent geologist has given us the following speculations.—"If the ratio of recession had never exceeded fifty yards in forty years, it must have required nearly 10,000 years for the excavation of the whole ravine; but scarcely any estimate can be formed of the quantity of time consumed in such an operation, because the retrograde movement was probably much more rapid when the whole current was confined within a space not exceeding a fourth or fifth of that which the Falls now occupy." Lyell's Geology, Vol. I., P. 178.

It will be perceived, according to Lyell's calculation, that it has probably taken 10,000 years for the Falls to retrograde seven miles, provided we admit, that precisely fifty yards of rock have been worn away every forty years. Lyell himself, however, presents a reason in the extract, why this calculation must be faulty. But among many skeptics this reason is forgotten; and the position is urged, that the falls must have occupied 10,000 years in attaining their present position—therefore, say they, the Mosaic cosmogony must be false. Indeed one gentleman at Black Rock, Erie county, remarked to me, that this calculation alone would destroy his faith in the account of creation by Moses. We shall endeavor to show in a few considerations, that a mind must not only be feebly disciplined and wavering as the unstable wind, to yield its faith to such an objection, but that the objection itself is absolutely incorrect.

1. The calculation is uncertain, because the strata of shale beneath the limestone formation over which the river flows, may, at different periods, have been eaten out more rapidly and deeply than at others, and thus have left a great mass of limestone unsupported, to be broken down by the enormous weight of water.—Thus the falls may have receded a space in a short period, which, at other periods, may have occupied years.

2. A small acquaintance with our limestone formations, will serve to convince any person, that cracks often occur in them, leaving great portions of them far from being solid masses. Hence, the calculation is uncertain, because the limestone, at certain places, may have been cracked, and thus vast portions may have cleaved off in a few hours, which, in other spots, may have taken years.

3. The water of the Falls is now spread over a surface of 800 yards. But a short distance below the present situation of the cataract, the American and British Falls were united, and poured over a channel only 160 yards wide. "The old channel being 160 yards wide, is exactly one-fifth of the width of the present Falls. Now supposing the retrograde movement of the cataract had been in proportion to its width, then according to Mr. Lyell's estimate it could have been only 2000 years in travelling from Queenstown to its present place; for 160 being a fifth of 800, and allowing the present movement to be at the rate of seven miles in 10,000 years, then, being only a fifth as wide, anciently as now, there is reason to believe that it moved at least five times as fast. But reasoning from the data before us, the time must have been even less than 2000 years, for it is plain that a given quantity of water, say a yard in breadth, would perform the work of excavation more than five times as rapidly as it would if spread over five yards in breadth. It is however but fair to state that the Falls at Queenstown were not so high as they are at present, and therefore, estimating the quantity of water the same as at present, the movement must have been slower than now. For, we know that the denutating, or excavating power of water, bears not only a proportion to its depth and rapidity, but also to the height from which it falls, so that cataracts of little elevation produce no perceptible effects for centuries, while, if the same quantity of water were precipitated from a height of several hundred feet, the whole precipice would gradually retrograde up the stream. Allowing, therefore, that the Falls moved only at half the rate above estimated, this would fix the time at 4000 years since they were at Queenstown.

Now, without giving any opinion as to the real epoch, when this cataract was at Queenstown, for there are no grounds on which such an opinion ought to be formed; still we must be permitted to say that according to the data Mr. Lyell has given us, it is quite plain that the cataract of Niagara could not have been more than 3000 or 4000 years in moving from Queenstown to its present place, instead of 10,000 years, which impression, if any, he conveys." Comstock's Geology, pp. 33, 34.

4. These considerations show, that not only is the objection fallacious and founded on uncertain data, but must serve to convince us that there is no fact connected with the Falls of Niagara which casts the charge of falsehood upon the Mosaic cosmogony. And that faith must indeed be feeble, which can yield the well attested principles of the Bible for the speculations of an unproved theory, false in fact and unsustained even by the scenery of the cataract, to which it refers for testimony. So far is the "Thunder of Waters" from weakening Christian faith, that no person of the least devotion can look upon the iresis which the Lord hath painted on the tempest and roar of the mighty scene, without feeling that He hath also bended a bow of promise amid the storms of life, which looks to a brighter prospect, and speaks of a glorified world in immortal felicity.

THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM.

Many of our opposing brethren think we err greatly, and without shadow of reason, in applying so many passages of Scripture to the destruction of Jerusalem—that we thereby lessen the importance of its teachings and the necessity for its revelation—that we destroy its influence on, and applicability to our present times and circumstances, and render a great majority of its passages a mere matter of ancient, national history, instead of present and future personal concern. Some of our Universalist brethren, also, who have not reflected deeply on the subject, are perplexed by these plausible objections, and are at a loss to account for the fact, that the destruction of the Jewish city and nation should be made so important an epoch in the Sacred writings. To answer these objections is the aim of the present article.

The phrase "destruction of Jerusalem," is generally intended to embrace, not only the destruction of that city, but the whole siege it sustained, the miseries of famine, civil war and pestilence it endured, the loss of the lives of more than a million of inhabitants of Judea, the destruction of the Jews as a nation, and their dispersion as fugitives and slaves throughout the nations of the world, the total cessation of the Mosaic dispensation as a divine institution, and the establishment of Christianity in its stead. More or less of all these wonderful events are generally included by us in the brief phrase, "destruction of Jerusalem." Politically speaking, the destruction of Jerusalem is perhaps of but little more importance than the destruction of Babylon, or the fall of the Grecian, Assyrian or Roman empires, or the downfall and partition of hapless Poland in our own day—though none of these were attended with as terrible afflictions, nor were they followed by results as wonderful, as extensive and lasting, as was the destruction of the Jewish nation. So that even in a political point of view, the destruction of Jerusalem is worthy of distinguished reference. But considered in a religious, or spiritual point of view, the imagination shrinks into insignificance in attempting to conceive the importance of the event.

To the introduction of Christianity, every act of creation, every event of Providence previous thereto, all tended. The promise in the garden, the covenant with Noah, the call of Abraham, the elevation of Joseph, the deliverance from Egypt, the giving of the law, the destruction of the Canaanites, the establishment of the Hebrew commonwealth, the captivities and subsequent restorations of this wonderful people, their subjugation by the Greeks, and the translation of their Scriptures into that widely spoken language, (that they might become well known to the Gentile world previous to the introduction of a more universal revelation,) their after subjugation to the "Mistress of the world," (under whose tolerant viceroyships all religions were allowed, and Jews every where were permitted to make proselytes, or at least to make known their religious views)—all—all these great events were but preparations to usher in the Christian dispensation, to prepare the world for its reception, and to furnish, before hand, a foundation on which its advocates might erect a knowledge of its truth But without the destruction of the Jewish polity, all these preparations had been useless. This latter event it was, that formed the gateway by which their results became operative on the world of mankind. By the destruction of Jerusalem, the Jews were made the Pioneers of the religion of the Nazarene, whom they despised and had crucified; for they carried every where the wonderful prophecies of that event, and confirmed the tale of its fulfilment. By the destruction of their temple and polity, the Old Testament, instead of being confined in its moral and spiritual teachings to one nation, became the property of vast humanity; while its ceremonial worship was succeeded by that of which it had so long been but a faint emblem, though a useful forerunner and preparation. And although the early Christians were at first confounded with the fallen and hated Jews, by some of the conquerors of Judea, yet the contrast in the principles of universal benevolence, meekness and long suffering, evinced by the Christian, contrasted much in favor of Christianity, with the narrow nationality, self-righteousness and intolerant spiritual pride of the Jew. More points of great importance might be enumerated—to dwell on them even briefly, would outswell by far the limits of an essay or a sermon—but suffice it to say, that the shaking of the things that were temporal, signified their removal, that the things that were eternal might be established in their stead. The last revelation from God, which crowned with excellence all previous revelations—the dispensation of the fulness of times, which was to be the universal dispensation of God's moral government, then commenced for all nations; and from thence forward it is to go onward, until heaven and earth are filled with its power and glory, and all souls are made holy with its influence and grace.

Such being, in fact, the uses of the destruction of Jerusalem in the divine purpose and economy—such its position in the concatenation of events his providence designed and produced for the establishment of the new and better covenant, by which alone, his plan of creation could be perfected, who will not agree with the Universalist, in supposing that Jesus and his apostles (as well as the prophets) would naturally regard it, speak of it and refer to it as one of the greatest and most important of all earthly epochs? They did so refer to it and speak of it—as one of the most important events in the divine economy, attended by the most magnificent displays of omnipotent power and glory, and from which were to flow the most importants results of God's moral government.

The destruction of the Jewish nation and the deliverance of the Christians from the bondage of the law and the persecutions of the Jews, are to the whole world what the defeat of the Egyptians and the deliverance of the Hebrews from slavery, were to the latter. There are several beautiful parallels between the two events.

1. The deliverance from Egypt and the possession of Canaan had been promised by the prophetic voice of God about 460 years before its fulfilment. So the deliverance of the Christians, and the glorious rest of the Shiloh was promised by the last prophet of the Old dispensation, who lived about 480 years before the destruction of Jerusalem.

2. In going from the bondage of Egypt to the land of rest, the Israelites wandered 40 years in the wilderness, amid great difficulties, and entered at last only after a great war, the destruction of their enemies, and the death of all who were their leaders in the beginning.—So the Christians, in coming out of the bondage of spiritual Egypt, wandered about forty years "without a continuing city," amid great tribulations, and finally entered into the rest remaining for the people of God, only after a time of trouble such as never had been, nor ever again should be, and after the decease of nearly all their leaders—John alone, if any, being left.

But these, and other parallels that might be drawn, aside, it is no wonder that all other judgments—those of Tyre and Sidon—of Sodom and Gomorrha—of the antediluvians—all are represented as rising up to view this still greater and more awful event. Nor need we be longer surprised at the bold figure used by the sacred writers in describing it—the stars falling, the sun turned to darkness and the moon to blood, the hosts of heaven falling, the powers of the heavens shaking and the earth trembling and quaking, the elements melting with fervent heat, and the heavens being rolled up like a scroll of parchment shrivelled up in the fire, etc., etc. For if these and similar figures are used to designate temporal events, as the destruction of kingdoms, etc., (and that they are so used by the Old Testament writers, Dr. Clarke, Bishop Lowth, Sir Isaac Newton and others testify and prove,) then surely we may expect to find them used in the New, as well as in the Old Testament, when speaking of so terrible, wonderful and important an event as the destruction of the chosen nation, and the entire abolition of the legal dispensation.

Regarding, then, the destruction of Jerusalem in this light, is the reason why Universalists refer all these passages to it; and knowing that the Bible thus represents it, is it not reasonable for us to look upon it as the new creation, without which the former is incomplete?

We may be wrong, I admit; but if we are, it is an error that harmonizes wonderfully with facts in history, and explains most admirably all that else would be confused, unintelligible, and disarranged in the teachings of Jesus and his apostles. Let any one read one of the best Partialist commentators on the 24th and 25th chapters of Matthew, for instance, and remark what a confused and jumbled mess he makes out of the plain and even-tenored discourse of Jesus there recorded. One while Jesus is speaking of something then about to happen, then of something centuries distant—now of time, then of eternity—now of Jerusalem, then of hell—and thus skipping backwards and forwards, to and fro, part of the time unknowing what Jesus referred to, if he is not speaking of several different things at once—until at last the reader tires of the confusing riddle and its more confused explanation, and lays by the book in disgust! But admit our views of the destruction of Jerusalem—that it is synonymous with "the end of the world" (aion, age)—and how beautiful, clear, and consistent with profane history is the whole discourse!

If any one of our opposers wishes to try one of the strong ramparts with which Universalists are entrenched, let him try his hand at disproving our views on these two chapters in Matthew in particular. Let him take some of the numerous sermons or explanations on this subject—Whittemore's sermon on the Parable of the Sheep and Goats, for instance—and answer it paragraph by paragraph, argument by argument—and let him answer it fairly, fully, candidly. When he has done this, he will have done more towards refuting Universalism than has yet been done by any writer whose productions have ever yet met my eye.

But I must hold up—my article is too long already. Reader, I have given a hasty and brief sketch of our reasons for so often naming the destruction of Jerusalem, and explaining so many passages of Scripture to refer to that event. Read, examine, reflect, and decide for yourself whether we do right or wrong in so doing.

TRACTS.

Through the medium of the Postoffice, I have received two tracts from some one, inscribed—"Read, and let conscience speak plainly, are you right or are you wrong? One who desires your eternal wellbeing." The one entitled "Future punishment," was read carefully, many years ago—the other has now been read. My reason, conscience, revelation and nature, all agree in telling me that I am right. Both tracts misrepresent Universalism grossly, and as grossly pervert and misapply Scripture. If the sender of them will muster courage sufficient to give me his or her name and address, I trust to show my gratitude for the desires expressed in my behalf, by making proof of what I assert.

In conclusion, if any wish to convince me that Universalism is false, they must do it with something else than these old, worn out, often refuted and stereotyped falsehoods against it, contained in the publications of the American Tract society. Let them attend to the answers we have given to those arguments, and show wherein they fail of refuting them, or cease to urge them on our attention. If a new argument against Universalism can be offered—one that has not been often and amply refuted—why is it not done? I have read all I could find on the subject, and I solemnly declare that I have not met such an argument for twelve years past! Nor have I met any, in that time, but what any intelligent Universalist would nail to the counter in five minutes.

I do not say this by way of boasting, but as a matter of fact. Nor do I question the sincerity and honesty of those who urge these stale objections to what they suppose is Universalism, but I do their knowledge of both sides of the question. It is because I believe the sender of these tracts sincere, that I have thus noticed them, and request a name, that I may enlighten the sender, and prove that the tracts themselves are but a tissue of misrepresentations, a refuge of lies long ago rent asunder and refuted by the truths supporting the doctrine of God's impartial, universal and efficient grace.

THE RECORD.

Associations.—The Southern Association of Connecticut met in New-Haven, May 23d. N. L. Wheeler, Moderator; F. Hitchcock, Clerk. Appointed N. L. Wheeler, Stratford; S. A. Hurlbut, and D. Andrus, Committee of discipline—C. K. Brown, New-Haven; I. Ambler, and L. Birch, Committee on fellowship and ordination—S. C. Bulkeley to preach the next occasional sermon. Five sermons were preached by Brs. L. S. Everett, Lyon, Bulkeley and Hitchcock. Adjourned to meet in Westport on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday in May, 1839.

The Western Reserve Association met in Bloomfield, Trumbull county, Ohio, June 6th. Br. E. Hoag, Moderator; H. Torrey Clerk; E. Hoag, Standing Clerk; S. A. Davis, Beals, and Fowler, Committee on fellowship and ordination; A. Upham, Newbury, M. Smith, Parkman, D. T. Bruce, Chardon, Committee of discipline; D. T. Bruce, M. Smith, H. Bishop, M. Hayden and B. Abbott, delegates to the State Convention; and Br. Hoag to designate time and place of meeting for the first Quarterly Conference, and the place of meeting of the next annual session of the Association. Granted fellowship to the Universalist church and society in Chardon, and to Br. H. Torrey, of Ravenna, and ordination to Br. E. Leidy. Br. James McKelvey was suspended from fellowship until he should prove certain reports affecting his moral character, to be unfounded. Eight sermons were preached by Brs. Fowler, Torrey, Biddlecom, Beals, Bell, Hoag, Davis, and McCune—the latter an ordination sermon.

The Chatahochee Association was organized in Mulberry Grove, Harris county, Georgia, July 7th. Major J. Mitchell, Moderator; J. Gregory, Clerk, P. Brownson, Standing Clerk; J. Ferguson, McMorris and Hubbard, Committee of discipline, and Andrews to preach the next occasional sermon. Sermons were preached by Brs. Harris, Andrews and Gregory—the latter the sermon at the ordination of Br. Brownson. Adjourned to meet in Lafayette, Chambers county, Alabama, in November next.

The Northern Association met some where in Vermont, some time this year—from some remarks in the Circular, and the address of a letter to the Council, supposed to be in Calais; and from the adjournment to next year, supposed to be on the third Wednesday in June last; but the Minutes are without time and place—Br. H. Sampson, Moderator; L. G. Warren and S. C. Loveland, Clerks; L. H. Tabor, to collect statistics of the Association, and report at the next State Convention. H. Sampson, E. Ballou and E. Brown, Committee of discipline. Granted ordination to L. H. Tabor, of Calais; and fellowship to E. Goss and L. G. Warren. Accepted the resignation of Br. B. H. Fuller's letter of fellowship, and approbated the selection of Br. J. Wallace, late of Potsdam, N. Y., as Editor of the Watchman and Repository. Sixteen preachers and twelve lay delegates were present—ten societies represented. Six sermons were preached by Brs. Barron, T. C. Eaton, E. Garfield, Wellington, E. Ballou, and Sampson. Brs. Loveland and Tabor took parts in the ordination, and Brs. Wallace, Wellington, Brown, and Dow in the other services. Adjourned to the date mentioned above.

Removals.—Br. W. Wilcox, from Albany to Alps, Renssalaer county. Br. Z. Cook, from Lansingburg to Genova. Br. S. Barnes, from Salina to Perry, and Br. N. Brown will shortly remove from Henrietta to supply the vacancy at Salina. Br. A. Kinney, who formerly resided in De Ruyter in this State, now resides in Juliet, Ills. Br. S. P. Landers, from Prompton to Bethany, Wayne county, Pa. Br. J. Gilman, from Concord, N. H., to Tynsboro', Mass. Br. J. Atkinson, from Meredith Bridge to Weare, N. H. Br. E. Hoag, from Ravenna, to Chardon, Ohio. Br. P. P. Fowler, from Plato, N. Y., to Parkman, Ohio. Br. H. Lyon, formerly of Fort Plain, N. Y., has settled with the friends in Norwich city, Conn. Br. H. W. Morse, from Milford, to West Scituate, Mass. Br. E. G. Brooks, from West Amesbury to East Cambridge, Mass. Br. A. Bugbee, from Phillipston to Charlton, Mass.

New Laborers.—Br. J. Witherill, of Orleans, Mass., a young man of good talents and character, commenced preaching sometime since. Br. James M. Cook of North Chili, in this State, is a new laborer of good talents and character and commendable zeal, whose entrance into the Gospel field has not yet been publicly announced.

Ordinations.—Besides those that were ordained at the meetings of our public bodies, Br. G. K. Shaw was ordained in Dixfield, Me., July 12th. Sermon by Br. Drew.

Installations.—Br. M. H. Smith was installed in Salem Mass., June 6th. Sermon by Br. H. Ballou.—Br. H. Ballou, 2d, was installed in Medford, Mass., June 20th. Sermon by Br. L. R. Paige.

New Societies.—A new society was organized in Talbotton, Georgia, July 22d. Another was formed in Vienna, Oneida county, this Spring, and has engaged Br. Wm. Martin to labor with them one fourth of the time. A letter from Br. Whiston states that another was formed in New-Berlin on the 6th inst., and a subscription is in circulation to build a meeting-house. Societies have also been formed lately in Terre Haute, and Lawrenceville, Indiana.

New Church.—A church was formed in July in connexion with the society in New-Bedford, Mass.

New Meeting-houses.—The frame of a Universalist meeting-house was raised in Prompton, Pa., in May last. It is three miles from Bethany and four from Honesdale, and is 38 by 45 feet in size. The corner stone of the first Universalist meeting-house in Hartford, Washington county, was laid with the appropriate ceremonies, in July last. Sermon by Br. Rayner. The frame of another was raised in New Portland, Me., July 18th.—Size 38 by 48 feet. The new house in Andover, Mass., was dedicated on July 3d. Sermon by Br. T. Whittemore.

Items.—Oral discussions of Universalism continue to be numerous. One in Goshen, Ohio, of two days duration, was held in May last, between Mr. Lucas (Methodist), and Br. Gurley. Another in the same month was held for several days, in Henderson, N. Y., between Mr. Lyon (Methodist), and Br. Morse. Br. Morse's old luck! Another of two days continuance was held in Watertown, Ohio, between Mr. Roberts (Presbyterian), and Br. Jolley. Br. E. Manford (a young preacher), was attacked at the close of one of his meetings in Whitewater, Indiana, in July, by Alexander Campbell, and another Partialist. A reply from Br. Manford seemed to satisfy this great Theological controversial Lion of the West, that (as in the case of Br. Montgomery of Auburn) no great honor could result from a controversy with "stripling" Universalists; so he remained mum, and saved his creed as well as his credit as a controversialist. Other discussions have occurred, especially in the West; but this sample may suffice.

Br. Gregory has sold out his share of the Evangelical Universalist, published in Macon, Ga., to Br. J. P. Harris, who is now partner with Br. L. F. W. Andrews.—Br. Gregory remains Editor.

"ELLEN CLIFFORD;

Or the Genius of Reform. By the Author of the Palfreys."

This admirable little work by Miss S. C. Edgarton, of Shirley village, Mass., and well known to our readers as one who has so often added interest and utility to our columns, is a neat 18mo., of 144 pages, published by Brs. Tompkins and Mussey, of Boston. I do not wonder that it has won golden opinions from the press in our atlantic cities—for it richly merits them. We add our commendation to theirs, and hope its brevity will not be taken as the measure of our praise.

A word of caution to sister Sarah. If she uses her witchery in turning grey to black, as she has done on pages 51 and 91, all the Aunt Tabby's in the United States will be seen wending their way to Shirley village, to solicit some similar cast of her craft! I have been tempted to go there myself, to get my formerly grey, now hazle, tinged a shade deeper—think it might add considerably to the attractions of my steel-rimmed spectacles!

A. B. G.

The Knickerbocker for August has been before us for some time—that for July has never yet come to hand—and nothing but a continued round of more pressing duties has kept us from noticing it before now. Even now, I can not notice it as it deserves. I have not perused the whole of it, but those of the office who have perused what I have not, say that I have much pleasure yet in store. It is good—very good. Indeed I have not yet found a number that was not. Some few articles there may be as low as mediocrity—none below it—nearly all above it. The literary man, able to afford five dollars a year in advance, and leisure to read it carefully, can not spend his money more worthily for the benefit of literature—more pleasantly for himself.

That the Editor has a good taste—one capable of relishing what is good, the following notice will prove.

A. B. G.

A Voice to Youth. Addressed to Young Men and Young Ladies. By Rev. J. M. Austin. In one volume.—pp. 390. Utica: Grosh and Hutchinson.

If good inculcations, various in kinds, yet all essential, conveyed in plain, simple, and chaste language, with important directions in relation to the education and general conduct of youth, of both sexes, be deemed worthy of extension, we look to see the little volume before us widely disseminated. It claims, and justly, to inspire a spirit of cheerful devotion, a correct taste, and a pure and affectionate morality among the rising generation.

JUVENILE BOOKS.

We have just received a most excellent assortment of books suitable for children, Sunday school libraries, etc.; among which are Miss Edgarton's new work, "Ellen Chfford, or the Genius of Reform," Parley's works, Girl's, Boy's, and Child's own books—books of sports and amusements, Nursery books, Toy books, plain and colored plates, Young Man's Library, Evening book, and Winter evening book, besides a number of others too tedious to mention. Of the first named work we we have said somewhat in another part of this paper, suffice it to say, that it has been highly commended not only in our own periodicals, but in the Philadelphia United States Gazette, and other high sources—Mr. Chandler of the U. S. Gazette being at present "king in the republic of letters." A. B. G.

Br. Tompkins, Send the Repository with back numbers, to Miss Eleanor Goff, Plymouth, Windsor county, Vt., and charge S. Goff, Genesee county, N. Y.—Credit Benjamin Mason, Pekin, Carroll county, Ohio, $4.00 for current and next volume of the Repository, and charge G. and H.

Br. Bazin, Credit Br. D. Skinner, Utica, $2 00 for present volume of the Expositor, and send him No. 1, which has never been received. Charge G. and H.

Br. Yelding still resides and preaches in Fort Plain, and wishes to be addressed there accordingly.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst., by Br. C. B. Brown, in Onondaga South Hollow—Br. Martin, in Phenix, where a society will be organized—Br. J. D. Hicks, at Richfield Springs, and Br T. J. Smith, in Newville, at 10 A. M., and in the evening, and at Ford's Bush at half past two P. M.—Br. J G. McAdam, at Marshall, and in Oriskany Falls school house in the evening.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. Hicks, in Russia, and in Postville school-house in the evening—Br. C. B. Brown, in Mexico, and in the school-house near Br. Dauby's at 5 P. M.

Br. C. B. Brown, will preach on the evenings of Monday, September 17th, in the school-house near Br. Silas Wood's—Tuesday, 18th, in the new school-house Hastings—Wednesday, 19th, Parishville—Thursday, 20th, Union Square—Friday, 21st, near Br. Sanford Douglass', Richfield.

The Hudson River Association, (which was adjourned to meet on the second Wednesday and Thursday in September,) will meet at West Fort Ann, on the first Wednesday and Thursday in October.

L. C. Browne, Standing Clerk.

N. B. This postponement has been made in reference to the meeting of the General Convention, and with the consent and advice of Brs. Smith, Rayner, and Hathaway, and the friends at Fort Ann. L. C. B.

The first Conference of the Otsego Association will be held in Newville, on the first Wednesday and Thursday in October. Services to commence 11 o'clock, A M. Ministering brethren and friends from a distance will call on Brs. R. Sims, A. Snyder, A. Wilcox, or J. Matteson. O. Whiston, Standing Clerk.

A Conference will be held in Knoxville, Madison county, on the 26th and 27th of September, inst.

The United States Convention of Universalists will meet in Boston, on the third Wednesday and Thursday in September next. Delegates who can not attend will do well to look out for suitable substitutes who will.

The Black River Association will hold a Conference at Constantia, Oswego county, on the second Wednesday and Thursday in September next. Ministering brethren and friends are invited to attend.

POETRY

From the Columbus Journal.

O YES! I TAKE THE PAPERS.

BY GEORGE B. WALLIS.

Oh yes, I take the papers—
Their trifling cost is never missed,
Although I've stood for forty years
Upon the printer's list.

Talk not of warriors—Faust released
Earth from the terrors of her kings,—
He twirled his stick and darkness ceased,
And morning streamed along the East,
On Freedom's burnished wings.

Oh yes, I take the papers,
And sons and daughters—tall and small—
For they have been through thick and thin,
The pastime of us all.

'Twas nobly said that should a star,
Be stricken from the dome of Night,
A printing press—if stationed there—
Would fill the vacuum to a hair,
And shed a broader light.

That man who takes no papers,
Or taking, pays not when they're read,
Would sell his corn to buy a "horn,"
And live on borrowed bread.

The printer opes the wide domains
Of Science—scatters Education
All o'er the land, like April rains:
And yet his labors and his pains
Are all his compensation.

PRAYER.

"Evening and morning, and at noon will I pray."—Ps. iv: 17.

My heart loves to pray when the sun's early beams
Are bursting o'er sky, o'er earth, and o'er seas—
Like the hour—sweet, glorious and blessed it seems,
When the last Sun of righteousness rose upon me!

My heart loves to pray, when at noonday the sun
Is bright'ning the meadow, the garden, the tree,
Thus beaming o'er sorrow, o'er sin, o'er the grave,
Oh! bright Sun of righteousness shine upon me!

My heart loves to pray at the bright evening's close—
'Tis holy, 'tis calm, 'tis delightful to me—
May I thus, Sun of righteousness, sink to repose,
To rise in thy morning, rejoicing in thee!

IS IT DANGEROUS?

Is it dangerous to the morals of society, to have the storm, the tempest, the vivid flashes of forked lightning, and the bellowing thunder to pass by, and leave the world in calm and sweet repose?

Is it dangerous to the morals of men, to have a morning without clouds, a day without an impending storm to hurl the red artillery of wrath and vengeance from on high?

If so, well might the ancient Jews and modern Pharisees exclaim against the Gospel of a world's salvation. God requires us to love him with all our heart, soul, might mind and strength. "This is the first and great command; the second is like unto it, thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." The law could not make the heart of man love God. Two thousand years had passed away under the law of Moses before "the kindness and love of God our Saviour towards man appeared," as revealed in the Gospel, by the death of his Son. The hearts of men were melted and moulded into the likeness of the God of love; they were made the mild, the kind and tender friends of all men, whether friends or foes.

"We love him because he first loved us"—not because of the thunders of Sinai; nor because we must die and go into the deep ocean of eternity; nor because our good minister preached to us an awful God, an awful devil, an awful eternity, and an awful hell; but "because he (God) first loved us." We are not of that kind of moral men who move, Pharaoh-like, because of the awful judgments on the land; but because God is our friend and not our enemy. If God was our enemy, as we hear from the preachers of wrath, then how could we love him because he first loved us?

The apostle John 1 epistle, 4th chap., is careful to caution us not to "believe every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God." We have tried and compared the spirits that pour out the letter that killeth, with those that give life; and have found that there are many able ministers of the law who drive men to pray loud and long, and who are often heard to say that they would plunge into the ditch of human corruption, if the storm, or the awful picture of darkness drawn before their eyes, was to become a calm, and a glorious display of light, love and kindness, through Jesus Christ our Lord. To such man God has said, "their fear towards me is taught by the precept of men." Isa. xxix: 13. "They that erred in spirit shall come to understanding, and they that murmured shall learn doctrine."—Verse 24.

The comparison drawn between a tempest and fair weather, will show the difference between the law and the Gospel. The same comparison will also show that there are two kinds of servants. The one serves God because he is alarmed, and stands in fear of the lash; the other because God loves him. Now it strikes me that the preachers of the awful and alarming doctrine which is represented by the calamities of Egypt, the tempest, etc., would do well to get a large ship, and send out their heralds in every direction, to invite as many thousands on board as possible, and then launch out into the great deep, or out into lake Ontario, or lake Erie, and make a hole in the bottom of their vessel, and let in the water! Let this be done, and then let the heralds of the cross cry aloud; let them present death, and all the awfuls they can think of to the minds of the sinking multitude, and they will make converts to their doctrine faster than in any way which I have seen or heard of. They will soon have a praying multitude whether they love God or not.

When all this is done, let it be asked if they love God because he first loved them—because of the calm—ask them if it is safe to preach peace and good will toward men; ask them if it is safe to preach a doctrine like the day-spring from on high that hath visited us, and shines forth like the sun with healing in his wings, and you will soon find the doctrine of mercy rejected. Such converts must have a minister to keep up the same fearfulness and doubt that awakened them, or they will desert the ranks of their task masters. It would seem that doubt and the fear of being lost does more to make such people pray, than the faith and firm belief of the Christian. If it were not for doubt, and the unbelief of such converts in the word of God, they would not pray nor live a moral life. This being the state of thousands, it is necessary for their ministers to preach on the dark side of the picture, and make their hearers doubt, and then they will do the more.

I hope to see the production of some abler pen upon this subject. Let this be attended to, and the eyes of many may be opened to see and know the love of God, as the only cause which they love, and be led to serve him.—Union

MARRIAGES.

In Victor, on the 5th inst., by Rev. T. J. Whitcomb, Mr. ARNOLD HARWOOD, to Miss ELVIRA CROSIER, both of Pittsford.

In Victor, on the 16th inst., by the same, Mr. ANAH P. DICKINSON, to Miss RACHEL MARIA RAWSON, youngest daughter of Samuel Rawson, Esq., all of Victor.

In Wilna, August 4th, by Rev. J. Britton, Jr., Mr. AUGUSTE THEODULE VUILLAUME, of Sterlingville, to Miss MELANNIE PHILIPINE SALTZMANN of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Hanover, Chautauque county, June 8th, Mrs. POLLY BLODGET, consort of Martin R. Blodget, and daughter of the late Stephen Williams, aged 29 years. Sister B. endured her sickness, which lasted for three years, with Christian fortitude, and a calm resignation to the will of God. It was reported that she renounced her faith; the report was a false one. The funeral obsequies took place on the following day, at which time a sermon was preached by the writer. H. R.

In Victor, in May last, Mrs. OGERSON, aged 84 years. This aged matron left a husband, (with whom she has been connected in marriage, 65 years,) and numerous other relatives and friends, to mourn her departure.

In East Bloomfield, July 31st, ANDREW F., only son of Peter and Delia Van Orman, aged 3 years.

The consolations of the Gospel, on both these occasions, were tendered to the bereaved mourners by T. J. W.

In Carthage, June 10th, Mrs. SARAH AUBORN, consort of Mr. Calvin Auborn, aged 38 years, leaving a beloved husband and several small children, the youngest an infant, to mourn the loss of a tender and affectionate wife and mother. May all the relatives behold in this event, the hand of a Father, and be enabled to bow with Christian resignation to his wise determination.

Mrs. Auborn made no public profession of Christianity, but in her virtuous life, she gave evidence that she possessed its spirit and it is believed she enjoyed the hope of the Gospel. The funeral was attended on the 12th, by the writer. A large congregation of different denominations evinced by their presence, that the departed possessed the esteem and regard of her acquaintance. J. B. Jr.

In Cortland, on the 4th inst., Mr. CADY, aged 80 years. The funeral was attended on the following Sabbath, and a discourse delivered by A. C. B.

In Warsaw, June 8th, of consumption, Mrs. RACHEL, wife of Edward Putnam Esq., aged 46 years. She had for many years been afflicted with sickness; but had borne her sickness with Christian patience; and at last died in the triumph of Gospel faith.

July 31st, EDWARD PUTNAM, Jr., son of the former, aged 18 years. For thirteen years he had been a cripple, and much of that time had been subject to severe pain. During his last hours he expressed the utmost confidence in God, and a longing desire to depart for a better world.

The funeral services, on both these occasions, were attended in the Baptist meeting-house, in Warsaw; and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to the afflicted friends by the writer. W. E. MANLEY.

In Lysander, July 28th, Mr. DANIEL CHASE, aged 83 years. He retained the use of his mental faculties to the last, and yielded up his breath, rejoicing in the hope of a world's salvation. Sermon by Br. S. Barnes.

In Gaines, Orleans county, N. Y. on the 8th inst., Miss PERCENA L. BABBIT, in the 19th year of her age.

Beloved in life, her loss is severely felt by her relatives, and a wide circle of youthful companions, to whom she was bound by the ties of friendship and affection.—She was sustained and comforted in her last painful illness, while she retained her senses, by the cheering hope of a blessed immortality. She several times signified to her mother, her willingness to depart and be with Christ—to leave this world of sorrow, sickness and death, that she might go to a land of rest, which lies beyond the reign of sorrow, where sickness comes not, and where death has no victims.

Miss Babbit was a worthy member of the choir, connected with the Universalist society in Gaines—was punctual in her attendance on the services of the sanctuary, and a consistent believer in the doctrine of God's impartial grace.

Her funeral was attended on the 9th inst., in the Universalist church, and a sermon delivered on the occasion by the writer. The congregation that met to sympathise with the afflicted, was large and deeply affected by the solemnities of the occasion. May God bless and comfort all that mourn! T. D. COOK.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 30.—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.

Bethany, Va., August 1, 1838.

SIR—Your grand proposition is, that "eternal life (meaning holiness and happiness) shall be the ultimate destiny of all mankind." This you were to prove from the Bible. Your proposition is not single, but compound. You admit that "without holiness no man shall see the Lord." Hence you have to prove that all men will ultimately be holy. But multitudes, you also are obliged to admit, live and die in their sins, unrighteous and unholy: consequently, you have also to prove from THE BOOK, that all who live and die unholy and profane, shall be made holy after death. Both of these points being established, it remains for you to prove that all men shall be finally happy.

2. Now, instead of dividing the proposition and proving the predicates separately, you are attempting, contrary to all the rules of reason, to prove a compound proposition by texts that neither name, nor even allude to, any one of the predicates you have laid down. Should you even prove one of the predicates, it does not necessarily follow that the other is also proved. You remind me of one who said he could prove his system from every text in the Bible: so you can prove Universalism by a hundred texts that never allude to the subject. To quote the Scriptures with your license, is summarily to hand me the Bible and say that in the aggregate it proves every thing you affirm.

3. Universalists seem not to be aware of this sophistry; for I never saw them quote a verse to prove their predicates separately—as, for instance, that all men shall finally be holy. They reason as if the assertion of the one point proves the other. The proof of universal happiness is universal holiness, and the proof of universal holiness is universal happiness, seems to be your favorite circle. You move in this circle; for in all your quotations you have not presumed to adduce a single text in proof of the final holiness of all mankind.

4. Your "thus saith the Lord," is "Thus saith Mr. Skinner" on some scrap of disjointed Scripture. For example, in Letter 27, you say "God is the rightful owner and proprietor of all men." You quote the Lord as saying, "All souls are mine." Then, says Mr. Skinner, "he can not suffer his property to be irrevocably lost." Lost for a time he may suffer it, but not irrevocably! This is one of your Scripture proofs, from which you infer the ultimate salvation of all; and this inference you call a thus saith the Lord. Well, are not all sheep and cattle the Lord's? Does this prove their final salvation!

5. Another of your direct proofs (Nos. 14, 15, 16,) is the promise that the heathen people were to be given to Christ "for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession." Another—"When lifted up on the cross Christ would draw all men to him." Another—"That he would give eternal life to as many as were given him," etc., etc. Do any of these texts affirm the ultimate holiness and happiness of every man? Christ has been long since lifted up: has he now drawn all men to him? The heathen are now his inheritance: are they every soul converted, or will they universally become holy? Where is the proof in these Scriptures? As well might you affirm that when Paul said to the Collossians he "warned every man and taught every man, that he might present every man perfect in Christ Jesus," he meant every son of Adam. Did he mean every son of Adam, or did he mean every one of a certain class, or place, or number! Your answer to this will refute all your Scripture quotations.

6. You rely upon the universality of certain words in all these passages. Well, we shall give you another specimen: "Behold the world is gone after him." John xii. "Your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world." Rom. i. "All the world wondered after the beast." Rev. xiii: 3. Do the phrases "the world," "the whole world," and "all the world," mean every son of Adam, or some of all classes, or the whole of one class. Answer as you please—your answer is mine to your quotations.

7. As you have not yet replied to my last three letters, I shall go on to prove still farther the negative of your proposition. This I will attempt by adducing a few illustrations and proofs of the following proposition: The language and style of the Bible are at war with Universalism.

8. Example 1st. You say that after death, or at most after the final judgment, all men will be made holy and righteous. Now the last intimation of the sayings of the Judge, found in the Apocalypse, flatly and directly contradict this: for after the final judgment he will say, "He that is unjust [then] let him be unjust still [or forever;] and he that is filthy let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous let him be righteous still; and he that is holy let him be holy still." Rev. xxii: 11. Where now your universal holiness! There are some unjust, filthy, unrighteous, and unholy persons after the final adjudication, according to John. They are, then, not all holy.

9. Example 2d. In describing the New Jerusalem state John farther says, (xxi: 24,) "The nations of them that are saved shall walk in the light of it." Does not this imply that all will not be saved, or that only one class of mankind shall inhabit the heavenly Jerusalem?

10. Example 3d. "They shall enter into the heavenly city whose names are written in the Lamb's book of life." Can any thing more plainly intimate that there are names not written in the Lamb's book of life, who shall not enter into the New Jerusalem?

11. Example 4th. "Blessed are they who do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter through the gates into the city." Rev. xxii: 14. Can any words more fully evince that there are some who will not have right to the tree of life, and who can not enter through the gates into the city?

12. Example 5th. "Without are dogs, sorcerers, whoremongers, murderers, idolators, and whoso loveth and inventeth a lie." Rev. xxii: 15. This may be called the last oracle of God concerning the ultimate destiny of mankind; and does not this intimate that there will be kept out of the city of God, the heavenly Jerusalem, a large portion of mankind?

13. Example 6th. "The elect of God." "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?" This phrase intimates that there are some who are not God's elect—some who are not blessed, pure in heart, or saved from their sins—against whom charges of condemnation may be brought.——From these specimens the readers of the Bible will be able to add hundreds of passages that designate the opposite characters, fortunes, and ultimate destinies of mankind, so plainly and so fully that it will require great ingenuity to pervert or misapply them.

14. Compare the point in such contrasts as these with the looseness of your inferences from Scripture quotations: for example, one of your proof-texts, with which you cap a whole climax, is, "Whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution (or accomplishment, as some of the learned render it,) of all things which God has spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." (Close of Letter 27.) From this you argue the certain salvation of all mankind. Now what says the text? "Christ must continue in heaven till the times of the accomplishment,"* or restitution, if you please, "of all things which God has spoken by his prophets from the beginning of time." This proves that Christ will not again appear on earth till all the predictions of the prophets concerning the church and the world shall be accomplished. From which you infer the restoration of the wicked out of hell, and their final holiness and happiness, although the prophets in their thousand predictions have not once spoken of this subject.

15. Now, Sir, let me say to you emphatically that you can not produce one text in proof of your compound proposition of final holiness and happiness that I can not show to be as much perverted as this one; nay, you can not produce one text that I can not show to be a manifest wresting and perversion of Scripture. Select one or two of your strongest texts, and put me to the proof. You need not tell me that you can produce one hundred: remember I only ask for one. If you can produce only one, that, fairly construed in its contextual meaning and the scope of the passage, affirms the final holiness, or the after-death reformation of wicked men, or the eternal happiness of mankind, I will give up the whole controversy.

16. You and "the destructionists" having concurred that endless misery is unjust or unjustifiable, have had recourse to many expedients to explain away a thousand scriptures that confront your theories. You once said that you were glad that I was not a destructionist: and why I could not conceive, unless you thought as some of my friends once seemed to think, that destructionism is more plausible or palatable than everlasting punishment. But, Sir, I go for what is evidently the meaning of Scripture, or whatever is true; not for what is most plausible or palatable. And however plausible the reasonings of Mr. Bourn of Birmingham, or those of the more deservedly celebrated John Taylor of Norwich, from whom destructionism has been imported into the United States, and once handsomely set forth in an anonymous pamphlet of my friend Henry Grew of Philadelphia, are now maintained by two or three of my acquaintance from whom I expected more good sense; I say, however commended to us as worthy of all acceptation, because more consonant to some men's theories of what is fitting for God and men, destructionism is to my mind just as repugnant to Scripture language, right reason, and good logic, as your modified Restorationism or ultra Universalism.

17. The modified destructionism of Old England and of New England, as above noticed, is briefly told in two sentences:—"Eternal punishment does not mean," say they, "an eternal preservation in misery and torment; but a total extinction of being. The sentence of destruction, or annihilation, or total extinction of consciousness, shall be preceded with more or less torment proportioned to the greater or less guilt of the criminal." This, with these benevolent spirits, is everlasting punishment, everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, the fire that is never quenched, the worm that never dies, the true contrast with eternal life. Dr. Watts' annihilation of infants is but a modification or special application of this very comprehensible and intelligible theory. Their end is destruction, or annihilation, or total extinction of consciousness, etc., etc. I have but one objection to this theory—and that is, that it makes the word of God of no effect so far as it presumes to sustain itself by its testimony.

*"To me," says Dr. George Campbell, "it is manifest that these words, The restitution of all things which God hath spoken by his prophets, convey no meaning at all. Substitute accomplishment for restitution, and there remains not a vestige of difficulty or of impropriety in the sentence." See him on Matt. xvii: 11.

18. With me punishment is pain, and everlasting punishment is everlasting pain, not an everlasting unconsciousness of pain, torment, or misery; for that, with me, is everlasting annihilation. Their system is suicidal, because they first say that everlasting punishment is everlasting annihilation or unconsciousness; and then unsay it by alleging that sinners are raised to life, are first tormented according to their works, and then destroyed or annihilated: so that with them, at one time, punishment or torment precedes destruction, and at another eternal punishment is eternal unconsciousness or destruction. If this be not a suicidal theory, there is none such.

19. To destroy the meaning of words is to destroy the Bible: for what is the Bible but words of fixed meaning? Unfix the meaning of these words, and where shall revelation be found! Now if punishment mean pain or torment, it can not also mean unconsciousness; for an unconscious being can not suffer pain. If there be everlasting punishment, there must be everlasting consciousness; in other words, there can not be pain without feeling. No feeling, no pain, is a sure maxim. An everlasting destitution of feeling and everlasting punishment in the subject, is a contradiction in terms. Bible destruction is not, then, the extinction of life, of consciousness, or of feeling: for if it were, eternal pain or misery would be impossible. This is my first argument against the destructionists.

20. My second is, that Jesus assigns to wicked men the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels. Now angels can not die; for Jesus affirms they can not. They can not be annihilated or rendered unconscious of being. Hence as the devil can not die, or cease to be under future torments, neither can the wicked: for the devil, wicked angels, and wicked men are to be co-partners in the same eternal fire—in the same everlasting punishment. And that the devil and his angels are to be tormented beyond their present sufferings is clear to themselves: for when Jesus came the first time they asked if he were about to torment them before the final judgment.

21. My third argument is, that if eternal punishment be eternal unconsciousness, an eternal ceasing to be, or annihilation, (for we use the word annihilation not in the quibbling sense of some who suppose a reduction to nihility impossible;) I say, if eternal punishment be eternal death in the sense of eternal unconsciousness, then those who are doomed to this state are punished no more than the harmless dove that sings among the branches, or the innocent lamb that skips in the meadow; for they too suffer an everlasting punishment—they go into the eternal fire with the devil and his angels, if that everlasting punishment and eternal fire be an eternal sleep, an everlasting unconsciousness, an endless extinction of feeling. These three objections to me are insuperable. Others are at hand.

22. These are not, however, the common arguments by which this system has been usually assailed. Dr. Chauncey, like many other Universalists, held the doctrine of the destructionists provisionally; that is, if he failed in proving the salvation of all men, he would then contend for the destruction or eternal unconsciousness of all wicked men. The great Dr. Edwards objected to this destructionism as follows:—

23. 1st. That the different degrees of punishment which the wicked will suffer according to their works, proves that it does not consist in annihilation, because that admits of no degrees.

24. 2d. If this annihilation be preceded by torment of different degrees, then it makes eternal punishment to be a compound of previous torment and eternal annihilation. And this makes annihilation the least punishment imaginable, as that without any previous torment will be the doom of infants and the least culpable sinners.

25. 3d. To be annihilated after a long series of torments would be no punishment at all; it would indeed be anticipated as a sort of rest or heaven to the miserable inmates of a temporary hell.

26. 4th. To threaten men with "recompensing tribulation" and "taking vengeance in flaming fire" and "everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord," is to threaten them with putting an end to their miseries, if everlasting destruction mean an everlasting ceasing to be, or an eternal annihilation.

27. Met by such arguments as these, the talents and learning of Taylor, the ingenuity of Bourn, and the dexterity of Scott and Mason failed in the last century of making many converts to this theory—the pleasing salvo of dubious Universalists, the anodyne of those who have too much sense for gross Universalism, and too little faith in the words of Him who will say, "Depart, you CURSED," not you BLESSED, "into the ETERNAL FIRE prepared for the DEVIL and his angels." "These shall go away into everlasting punishment, while the righteous enter into life eternal."

28. Life, let me add, is not simple being; nor eternal life eternal being, but eternal well-being: neither is eternal death the loss of being, or of consciousness, but the loss of eternal well-being. For there will be something to be blessed and something to be tormented forever and ever, independent of, and distinct from, eternal happiness and eternal torment.

29. I am not, then, a Destructionist, a Restorationist, nor an ultra Universalion—not from any prejudice against any of them, but because I can not find in the Bible a single sentence contextually interpreted, not a single word properly understood, favorable to any of these schemes. I claim no originality on this subject. I am not in love with any new theory, neither have I any traditional prepossession nor bias against them: I have long since made myself familiar with these theories and their evidence to see if there was any thing in them more worthy of acceptance than the old Protestant, Puritan, or Waldensian theories. I have found that the views of the primitive church, of the Protestant and Waldensian church, on this subject, are consonant to Scripture, good sense, and sound reason, if I am any judge of such matters. Some of them may have spoken very incongruously, and done injustice to themselves and brethren; still the Arminian and Calvinian theories are incomparably more scriptural and rational than those of the Destructionist, Romanist, or the Universalist.

30. The apostles could have very easily prevented all difficulty upon this subject by simply assuring us in definite language that all the wicked dead should become righteous men in another world in consequence of being tormented for a thousand years in hell; that they would eventually all become holy and happy; or if that were not the fact, they could have taught us that all the wicked dead shall be raised and tormented for a few thousand years, and then annihilated as an eternal punishment or rest from misery. But, Sir, such ideas are not in the Bible, simply because they were not in the minds of the men who spoke as they were moved by the Holy Spirit.

31. Now, Sir, let me say to you with all perspicuity, that I neither adopt nor oppose any theory on this subject because it corresponds with, or differs from, my views of the primitive and present constitution of man. Nor would I non-fellowship a destructionist because of his theory, inasmuch as he teaches that it shall not hereafter and forever be with the righteous as with the wicked; nor would I make it a term of Christian union or communion that a person should agree with me in my exposition of future punishment. But, Sir, the absolute denial of future punishment in another state of existence is with me a denial of the faith of of Christ whose errand into this world, whose death, burial, and resurrection for our sins and for our justification were altogether unjustifiable and unnecessary, if so be that man was not forever doomed to wo because of sin, or saved from endless misery by Christ's interposition. It is as unequivocal a denial of Christ's words as quoted by me in the 28th letter, as human speech affords. The boundary between opinion and faith are to my mind clearly marked. To deny a fact and to differ in opinion, are, with me, two things as different as reasoning and believing—as seeing an object and thinking about it. I have, moreover, uniformly found that those who deny the future punishment of wicked men, deny other facts in the Christian system that essentially change its nature, character, and design. But of this I may have to speak more plainly and fully hereafter.

32. After giving us in letter 29th, a string of Scripture texts speaking of Christ's kingdom in this world compared with the narrow limits of the ancient kingdom of God among the Jews—of the superabundance of grace in passing over millions of sins in an individual, while sin reigns to death for a single offence—of Christ's being called "the Saviour of the world"—of Christ's praying in accordance with the will of God—of "every knee bowing and of every tongue confessing to the glory of God"—you proceed to ask, last paragraph, "How can all the foregoing scriptures be true and yet the salvation of all men not be true?" etc. I answer, because not one of those scriptures speak of the ultimate and eternal salvation of all mankind; nor have you, by any sort of reasoning or proof, attempted to show that they do—nor can you!

33. If it were even said a thousand times that God is the Saviour of all men, while there are three distinct salvations repeatedly alluded to in the Scriptures—such as the salvation of the soul from the guilt, power, and pollution of sin—the salvation of the body and life of man from temporal evils—and the salvation of the whole man, body, soul, and spirit, after the resurrection of the dead, so often spoken of in the sacred writings; and so long as there are multitudes said to be lost, perished, destroyed, and punished, your assumptions can not be sustained by such passages of scripture as you have quoted. While Jesus says "the gate of life is strait, and the way leading thither narrow; and the gate of destruction wide, and the way leading thither broad, and many going in thereat, and few finding the other"—that "many shall at last seek to enter in and shall not be able," etc.—I say, with a host of such sayings, a few specimens of which I gave you in my last letter, it is impossible that those passages you have adduced can refer to the same subjects at all.

34. Remember I have called upon you to single out one, two or three of your strongest proofs, and I will either show that they are wrested or perverted, or give up the controversy. But, Sir, I presume to say that you will not hazard even this much. I want your strongest text, that I may the more fully canvass it and show its irrelevance.

35. You talk of some of the Christian Fathers, if not all (!) having been Universalists. The Romanists say, with just as much truth and reason, that some of them, if not all, were good Papists. I want you to give us the primitive apostles: throw none of your primitive dust in our eyes, Mr. Skinner. It is all a hoax. All the truly primitive Fathers ask, "How shall we escape eternal punishment if we neglect so great salvation?" "Of how much sorer punishment than temporal death shall the apostate be thought worthy?" Yes, Sir, "our God is a consuming fire." There is nothing but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation that shall destroy the adversaries of Christ's person and gospel. And says Paul, "If any man preach any other gospel than I have preached, let him be anathema—let him be accursed! yes, if an angel do it, let him be accursed!" Take care, then, lest that curse come upon you which is written in the Prophets; for Jesus says, "Fear Him who when he has killed the body, can destroy both soul and body in hell: yea, I say unto you, fear Him."

Very faithfully and benevolently,

A. CAMPBELL.

THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

BY REV. S. MILES.

Our Saviour says, the kingdom of God "is like leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened." Luke xiii: 21. Having represented the loose and unsettled state of men, by the unleavened meal, he then goes on to say—"And they shall come from the east, and from the west, and from the north, and from the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God;" (which he had just represented by leaven that leavens the whole lump). "And, behold, there are last which shall be first, and there are first which shall be last." Luke xiii: 29, 30. This is the same as in another place, in which Jesus says, "Verily I say unto you, that the publicans and harlots go into the kingdom of God before you." Matt. xxi: 31.

Having taken a view of the leaven that leavens the whole lump; let us now turn to another kind of leaven, in opposition to, and at war with, "the bread of God which came down from heaven and giveth life to the world." Our Saviour once compared the doctrine of men to leaven, and cautioned his disciples to beware of the leaven, that is, the doctrine of the Pharisees and of the Saducees.—Matt. xvi: 11, 12. The doctrine of Christ was unlike that of his religious enemies, and like Aaron's rod, was about to devour and destroy them. This awakened the powers of darkness in violent opposition against him, until they came out with a general cry "away with him"—"crucify him, crucify him."

We now have two kinds of leaven, (doctrines,) with their opposite tendencies, before us. The one, is like a morning without clouds, all mild and unmoved by the passions of the earthy man.—The other is like a dark and gloomy tempest that sweeps the land with the besom of destruction, leaving desolation and ruin in its train. Such has been, and continues to be, the effect of the doctrines of men, which stand opposed to the leaven (doctrine) of Christ, which leavens the whole lump. The doctrine of Christ brings men from the east, and from the west, from the north, and from the south, where they sit down together in one God, whose name is love; in one spirit, one mind, one Lord, one faith, and one baptism. While, on the other hand, the doctrines of men have ever been leavening men from the centre point; from the leaven that leavens the whole lump, scattering them to the east, and to the west, to the north, and to the south, and to every point of the compass which carries on its face four times ninety degrees. The unhappy effects of the leaven (doctrines) of men, can not but convince every reflecting mind, that the kingdom of Christ neither has, nor can have divided and subdivided mankind into so many divisions, one against the other.

Another most striking instance of the effect of the word of God, is found in Ezekiel 37th chap. The prophet says, "So I prophesied as I was commanded, and as I prophesied, there was a noise, and behold a shaking, and the bones came together, bone to his bone." What a glorious and joyful day this must have been. When shall our eyes behold all nations, families, and kindreds of the earth turning unto the Lord, as declared in Ps. xxii: 27, 28. "For the kingdom (which is like leaven that leavens the whole lump,) is the Lord's, and he is the governor among the nations." When shall men be brought from the four cardinal points, so that the little party here, and another there, shall sit down together in the kingdom of God? Now, suppose St. Paul was here with us, in this age of the world; and he was about to give an account of the different churches in this land of light and liberty, would it be right for him to say as in 1 Cor. xii: 13, "For by one spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one spirit"? Is this the true description of the churches now? If not, then may the time soon come, when all who are opposed to the leaven (doctrine) which unites men into one body, one spirit, and one mind, shall ground the weapons of their rebellion, and turn their faces towards "Jerusalem, which is above, the mother of us all." "Turn ye, turn ye, O house of Israel, for why will ye die?" Why will ye forsake the fountain of life, and hew out to yourselves cisterns, broken cisterns that can hold no water? Why live in the wilderness, when Immanuel's land lies just before you? Is it because you fear to leave the first covenant, that was given in the tempest; least by so doing, you should become less serious and prayerful? If so, let me tell you that I fear that you have never known what it is to love God, because he first loved us, or you would not object to our doctrine—you would not fear that it will have a tendency upon those who are serious and prayerful, in a thunder storm. May you not with equal propriety object to fair weather on the same ground, lest the fair weather should quiet and compose the minds of those who pray the more earnestly and fervently in the hour of peril?

We should remember that God requires us to love him with all the heart. The love required, can not be produced by the law, the tempest, or the lash. It was therefore necessary that a better covenant, a better doctrine, (leaven,) should be given to men, to unite their hearts, and make them one.

HOME.

What vivifying reminiscences cluster around the home of our childhood! A thousand fond recollections crowd around its very name; a thousand lovely images float over the transparent waters of memory, when we think of it! At home we spent the sunny hours of our early years. Then we roamed over hill and dale, with our innocent companions, and gathered the flowers from the fairy bosom of nature. Then we whiled away the joyous season of our youthful spring-time, and longed to be MEN. We longed to enter the arcana of life's vicissitudes, perplexities and cares—to mount the hill of fame—to hear the shout of applause. After years of absence, our bosoms dilate with joy, our hearts expand with rapture, to visit our boyhood's home. There every thing around, calls to mind scenes long past, over which rolled the lethean waters of forgetfulness. How changed! We left the paternal cottage, embarked on the world's wide stage, to seek fame and fortune in remoter climes. We may have formed new homes and fireside delights, but, still, it is not the home of our infancy—our early days. Impressions then are made upon our plastic minds which never can be effaced. They grow up with our elastic spirits, and vegetate on the luxuries of the past. In whatever situation you may be placed, it matters not how far, or how long we may have been from home, its image is indelibly engraved upon the tablets of memory. It is painted in fadeless colors. It beams with increased effulgence, when "far awa'." What sight flits across the wild visage of the expiring soldier? What spectre appears to the exile and stranger? What thoughts occupy the sailor's lonely musings, when pacing the deck, on his midnight vigil? Methinks I hear them exclaim "my home, my home!—that beautiful spot around which our memories fondly linger." At home we are enshrined in all that makes our existence desirable. Fatherly, motherly, brotherly, and sisterly love, then meet and embrace us, and twine their pure, disinterested affections around us. But alas! the loss of a dear father, or much-loved mother, reminds us that change and decay mark the face of all sublunary things. In the course of events we shall be deprived, sooner or latter, of an earthly childhood-home. Where then shall we flee for consolation? to whom shall we look for comfort? We have the promise of a home which shall endure for aye, without change. The blight of time shall never corrode it, the fiend shall never enter it; nor sorrow, nor death cast their mildew of sickness and pain. It shall never fade away. Then we shall not have occasion to mourn the loss of relatives and friends, and pine away in misery and grief. Then we shall be perfect, glorious, blessed. May we all be so happy as to participate in this eternal home. Then may we meet, no more to take the parting hand, to say farewell, or bid ADIEU.

FORGIVENESS.

I am no blind adorer of ancestral lore; nor do I look to their lives as models of excellence by which we should rigidly shape our own. But I would not reject their brilliant gems, because found amid a mass of puritanic rubbish, but rather call them out and free them from their impurities, that they may shine with their original lustre. Their virtues may adorn even these days of affected wisdom.

The times to which I allude, were times of rudeness; yet, withal, times of simplicity and frankness well worthy our emulation. Frankness was the earliest lesson taught in the New-England schools; and if it sometimes reared the abrupt and uncourteous, it was free from that other fault, hypocrisy, which latter days seem so ready to adopt. The honest yeomanry were then wont to consult their good parsons on matters temporal as well as spiritual. Not the sacred desk only, but the kitchen and parlor, the workshop and harvest-field, shared in the counsels of their wisdom. Deacon C. had been severly affronted by his neighbor, and wrathy, he meditated long and manfully over it, and resolved on summary vengeance. But this he could not inflict without the consent of his minister. The grievance was laid before the sage divine in moving colors—"and now," concluded the injured deacon, "will it not be manlike in me to chastise him?"—"Yes, yes," replied the parson, philosophically wiping his brow, "yes, it will be man-like in you to chastise him, but more God-like to forgive him." PASSAGES FROM THE DIARY OF A WORKING MAN.

I. I have found that it makes the readings of public transactions, and, especially of history, much more interesting when I regard the people or nation whose transactions are recorded before me, as one large family. Then all their movements I look upon as so many attempts to supply some pressing want, and to advance what they deem their interests. It is interesting to compare the opinions of this large family as to what constitutes their chief good, or what is most worthy of pursuit with the sentiments of other nations, and with our own. It is then more interesting to decide upon the wisdom of their choice in regard to the means adopted to further their ends, and we still farther increase our interest in this family and its records, if we venture occasionally to prognosticate the probable results of any important movement, or the influence upon the whole family of one pre-eminent individual. By such methods I give to public news and historical records somewhat of the interest which attaches to biography, or individual memoirs.

Sophistry may perplex truth, ingenuity may warp the decrees of justice, and ridicule may raise an undeserved laugh; but where free inquiry prevails, errors will be corrected, justice will be revered, and ridicule will be retorted on those who have abused its influence.—Ensor.

LETTER

TO REV. H. ELY, EDEN, N. Y.

BROTHER—I am induced to address you at this time, by the perusal of an article from you in "Zion's Watchman," of June 2d, in which article you profess to give an account of a certain meeting held last Spring, at Abbott's Corners, in Hamburg, of which meeting, soon after its date, N. Brown, a Universalist preacher, gave what you pronounce "an erroneous statement," in, as you sneeringly have it, "a paper called the Gospel Advocate." There are some points in your letter which I feel myself called upon to notice. And

1. You state as facts a great many things which, were they facts, are still unknown to you to be such. How do you know, for example, that the Universalist preachers who attended that meeting, came "expecting nothing less and wishing nothing more than to provoke to controversy?" and that their friends considered the holding of your quarterly meeting to be "the very nick of time to secure their much desired end?" yea, that those preachers "considered that the time had now come which was to bring them into notice"—and much more of the same kind? Mr. Ely, I have no objections to your being ever so positive, in those matters where individual judgment is the only criterion of truth—as, for example, you may extol the preaching of your brethren to the skies, if you think proper—but I do seriously protest against any man's indulging in "evil surmisings," as to what my unexpressed opinions or motives are, and then publishing those surmises as matters of known fact.

2. You give, in some instances, only a part of the truth, when you profess to give the whole. Br. Hoyt and myself had had, prior to the meeting in question, some correspondence on the subject of the great question at issue between Universalists and those who hold the doctrine of endless punishment; and you say that "the precise form of the question," as given by me, was, "Do the Scriptures teach that all mankind will be finally holy and happy?" I reply, this was not its precise form, as Br. Hoyt well knows. The question was a conjoint one; and you give only the first half. The remainder reads, "or that some will be endlessly sinful and miserable?" Why suppress this? Would you not affirm it?

At the close of the meeting the second evening, I gave two principal reasons why I should attend the meeting no longer. One of them I think you intend to give, when you make me to have said that "two days are all the Universalists think proper to spend in religious meetings at one time, and then we retire to make preparation for the support of the body." Rather an unskilful reporter—but let that pass. The other reason, by no means the least important one, a reason which your presiding Elder gave me to understand met his entire approval, as expressing his view of the subject, you, for some cause, have wholly omitted to give, or even to mention. I said, in substance, that it must be quite evident from our preaching, that we (the Methodist and the Universalist preachers) differed much upon some of the most important points of Christian doctrine; and hence, that it might, in one view of the case, be considered a desirable state of things, to see the clergymen of different denominations occupying the same desk, at the same meeting, and alternately addressing the same congregation, yet as it was manifest to all, that we were not doing so for the purpose of mutually discussing, like honest men, the points of difference between us, before proceeding to urge our respective views upon the people not only as matters of faith, but as rules of practice, but on the contrary, were preaching as truth, the one side one thing, and the other its opposite, without replying to each other, (for your side would have no discussion,) I did deem that the meeting thus conducted, was calculated to exert a pernicious influence upon the best interests of the Christian religion in general, and therefore felt myself constrained to leave, although, upon purely sectarian grounds, I should certainly be in favor of staying. Why is this not even pointed at by you? Was it because you meant to say in your next paragraph, that "the champions of Universalism fled, one by one, from under the burning rays of the truth"?

3. You misstate some very plain facts. Thus you give the public to understand that Br. Pickering "wished Br. Hoyt to preach from this text:—'What shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?' Mark viii 36." Now the facts are, as Mr. Brown has in substance stated, that Mr. Hoyt, a short time before the meeting in question, preached a sermon from that text, and either challenged or defied the intellect of the world, to disprove the conclusions drawn by him from it. And subsequently he agreed to preach from the same text again, and to allow any Universalist minister the opportunity of replying. So that Mr. Pickering did not offer terms, but only acceded to the proposals made him. This may be deemed a small matter, and be christened a mistake in you; but if a mistake, it certainly is not a very natural one.

Again, you represent Br. Hoyt as having sent me this reply: "I preach to save souls: hence I shall not controvert that 'question' with you; and if you preach, you must look to your own errors, or suffer the people to canvass them, for I shall not do it." Now, Sir, I aver that it is not true that this was, as you say, his "only reply;" and neither is it true that his reply was any thing like it. I have his letter lying now before me—all the one I have ever received from him; and I must do him the justice to say, your account to the contrary notwithstanding, that it is couched in respectful language, and savors of good manners, kind feeling, and Christian charity.

4. You bestow upon your brethren, both clergymen and laymen, some direct, and some indirect compliments, of such a quality, that I should hardly think they would be disposed to thank you for them. Mr. Hoyt's reply to me, as you make him answer me, is a case of the kind intended. And you tell us also, that he has sent word to Mr. Pickering, "that he held [holds] himself in all readiness to commence with him a like protracted effort for the salvation of his church." You do not say his congregation, nor his stated hearers, nor even his society; but "his church." Whether he has sent such a message I can not say; but I hope to find he has not; for I should be sorry to know that he is capable of so gross an insult.

Again, you represent that an effort was made to draw the presiding Elder "into disputation;" and that he replied, "You must quarrel with the Son of God about that: He has settled the question." The import of this language seems too plain to be mistaken. What can be meant less than this, that if we dispute the Methodist doctrine, we "quarrel with the Son of God." Is, then, Elder J. Hemingway a complete personification of bigotry and Popish arrogance!

Once more. Speaking of the services the second evening, on which evening I had the happiness to address the congregation, followed by Br. Hoyt, you say, "It was quite a moving time while Mr. L. was discoursing; but the people seemed quite easy and contented while the messenger of God stood before them." Now you certainly can not mean here, that it was the friends of Universalism who sat so uneasy and discontented while that doctrine was being presented; and who along with the rest, sat so still and comfortable to hear the Methodist doctrine. As, therefore, the congregation, according to your account, were quite still while Mr. Hoyt was discoursing, but were quite otherwise while being addressed by me, it follows that the friends of Methodism possessed and exercised on this occasion, so little of the article usually called good manners, (to say nothing of Christian decorum,) that they kept moving about all they conveniently could, through the whole of the Universalist discourse; while the friends of Universalism, who had been quite still "about an hour and three quarters," as you stretch the time, remained after this so still and quiet through the whole of a Methodist discourse, that they "seemed quite easy and contented." Verily, you do your brethren and friends singular honor! and especially so, as my subject that evening was principally "the conversion of the soul." Ps. xix: 7.

But I must do the congregation the justice to say, your assertion to the contrary notwithstanding, that with the exception of one or more individuals, they were very still and attentive, and seemed impressed with a deep sense of the importance of the subject. Yet I do not suppose your statement to be wilfully wrong—a child in a carriage can easily imagine that objects by the roadside are "moving" away from him.

5. Your letter throughout is highly seasoned with that kind of language which I should suppose almost any publisher of a religious periodical would be ashamed to insert in his paper, and almost any Christian writer be ashamed to have inserted over his signature. A few examples, in addition to those already given, must suffice. "The time came, and brought with it the antagonists of truth as it is in Jesus." "The next that appeared in defence of their soul-destroying error, was Mr. Lewis." Respecting the message which you tell us Mr. Hoyt has sent to Mr. Pickering, about laboring for the salvation of his church, you say, "We presume Mr. P. will not again involve himself in such difficulty. The old maxim will apply in his case: 'a burnt child dreads the fire.'" You do not allow that there was any preaching at that meeting except what was done by your Methodist brethren. You say of me, that I "talked;" of Mr. Brown, that he "read certain extracts from different authors," and of Mr. Pickering, that he "read a composition." But note how your story hangs together, and what an air of probability it has. The expression "extracts from different authors," you mark as a quotation, conveying the idea that Br. Brown spoke of his extracts as such; and of course that the reading of them was just what he professed to do; and yet you add that he did it "perhaps thinking to palm them upon the people for original." Br. Pickering's "composition" you intimate was not his own, but a piece selected by him for the occasion; and yet, marvellous to relate, it not only had not "its foundation in that text," but it appears to have had about it so very little of either taste or talent, argument or arrangement, pith or pertinency, wit or wisdom, that you remark in relation to it, "What he was endeavoring to accomplish, no one (at least from the document) could tell." Sir, it is my opinion that you will have to try again.

6. Some of your misrepresentations may have arisen from want of information. Thus you insinuate a charge of falsehood against Mr. Brown, because he stated that he could not stay any longer at the meeting because he had to attend a Universalist Conference; and yet, surprising to relate, he stopped by the way, and lectured in the evening; or as you tell it, "read the very same extracts" he did at Hamburg. Now, Sir, let me inform you that it is no surprising thing for a Universalist preacher while travelling to a distant meeting, to lecture in the evening at certain places on his road, and especially so, if he has previously promised to do so the first time he passes that way. As for Br. Brown's "extracts," I suppose them to have been principally texts of Scripture; and he may have used the same at Eden as at Hamburg—it is a matter of very little consequence, I think—but I am informed he did not.

Again—You say, "since the conclusion of this meeting, we have heard nothing of Universalism in that quarter. They have not preached there since." This may be all true in word; but you mention it in such a connexion as to give the erroneous impression that the facts stated owe their existence to that meeting. Know, then, that the undersigned labored last Fall, Winter, and Spring, as a circuit preacher, for a term of 6 months; (himself his own presiding Elder,) and in the fulfilment of his course, he lectured at Abbott's Corners once in two weeks, on Tuesday evenings. And it so happened (and this was a principal reason of my staying that day) that my last appointment at that place was the Tuesday evening which has been mentioned. The reason, then, that I have not preached there since that time, as I have not, is, that my circuit was then closed, to be probably resumed the coming Fall. This, particularly, because it has been said, by mistake, in this paper, that I am or have been preaching there half the time, that is, on Sundays.

I have thus, brother, reviewed your article, and noticed some of the outlines of your protraiture as there presented. Will you please take a peep at yourself? I am confident it can do you no harm.

I subscribe myself, yours in all kindness,

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1838.

PHIL. III: 15-21.

The apostle, in the commencement of this chapter, we find using some pretty severe language in rebuking those Judaizing teachers who boasted of their high rank in God's esteem, on account of their descent from Abraham, and who insisted upon all converts to Christianity, maintaining the institutions, and submitting to circumcision.—Such the apostle calls dogs, and the excision, that is, those whom God will cut off; whereas that name of which they were boastful, the circumcision, Paul says, truly belonged to those who worshipped God in spirit, not with ritual services, who boasted in their discipleship to Christ, not of their descent from Abraham, nor of any thing pertaining to the flesh. But if the privileges of which the Jewish teachers boasted were of any value, he was entitled to all of it, being a Hebrew of the Hebrews, of an honorable tribe, and in conformity to the law, unblameable. These privileges he, like other Jews, had once considered great advantages: now, they appeared to him of no value; they could not forward him in the race set before him, and therefore they were to be disregarded. Under his Master, Jesus, he had learned to set no value on his descent from Abraham, and as little nearly upon the most complete compliance with the institutions of Moses—the righteousness that is of law; his standard of excellence had been amazingly altered and exalted—he was hereafter to rest satisfied with nothing less than a close and perfect assimilation to the character of Jesus, and a participation with him of a revivified and spiritualized body. This was the new and high aim of the apostle. His aim was conformity to Jesus; his hope was a glorious resurrection. These were not, like the boasts of the Jews, easy attainments; they gave employment to a man's whole life, his entire energies. In the course he had marked out for himself, he had made no attainments of which he could boast, like the Judaizing teachers who were attempting to mislead the Philipians; all past attainments he little regarded, seeing so much yet unattained in advance. Upon the *un*attained his views and desires were fixed. He had neither time nor taste for boasting of previous attainments; upon the untrodden ground, and the laborious ascents before him, his regards, desires, and exertions were concentrated.

Here is a model for those who love and who aim at the perfection of the Christian character. Here is a model for us, my brethren. Those who desire our welfare can set before us no more useful copy for imitation. Let our aim be as high as Paul's, let our exertions be as strenuous and well-sustained, and we shall reach the highest excellence of man, resemblance in spirit and in virtue to Jesus, an inward consciousness shall reward and corroborate us, and finally, we shall attain to the resurrection of the dead, and be for ever with our Lord. Brethren, let us be joint-imitators of Paul, let us be of the same mind, let us have an aim equally high, a vigor of pursuit equally resolute.

With Paul we have to lament the existence of professed Christians at this day, who are well characterized in verses 18 and 19. They look not unto Jesus, they aim not to be perfect, they are contented with a name to live while they are dead. Their Christian ambition is pitched too low, or their exertions are too imbecile and irresolute.—Let us not swell the number of such; and let all such, all in danger of becoming such, listen to an earnest and appropriate exhortation from Prof. Ware. "Remember always," says he, "that you are capable of being more devout, more charitable, more humble, more devoted and earnest in doing good, better acquainted with religious truth; and that, as it is impossible there should be any period to the progress of the human soul, so it is impossible that the endeavor of the soul should be too exalted. It is because men do not think of this, or do not practically apply it, that so many, even of those who intend to govern themselves by religious motives, remain so lamentably deficient in excellence. They adopt a low or a partial standard, and strive after it sluggishly, and thus come to a period in religion before they arrive at the close of life. Happy they who are so filled with longings after spiritual good, that they go on improving to the end of their days."

We fear that it is no uncommon defect among would-be-Christians, to fix upon a standard of attainment by far too low and limited. We know of no remedy for this state of sentiment, which produces such stunted specimens of Christian disciples, better than a more frequent recurrence to the perfect pattern, a more frequent meditation upon his excellences and their sources, a more frequent endeavor to do in all cases as we suppose Jesus would if in our circumstances. Look, look unto Jesus. P. P.

UTICA, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1838.

LETTER

TO BR. GEORGE ROGERS.

Utica, N. Y., August 24th, 1838.

Dear Brother—About a week ago, I received from you an excellent letter, touching sundry matters, but especially organization, discipline, etc. among Universalists. The whole letter, (with the exception of the following extract, which is a total exception to the rest of the letter, and is complete in itself,) shall soon be laid before our readers; who will, I doubt not, be as much delighted with it as I was. But the following extract seems to me so unfounded in its insinuations, so uncharitable and so utterly uncalled for, that I can not but wonder at it. What have I ever done to deserve such ungenerous thrusts at your hand, my brother? Wherein have I offended against your peace, or against the cause you labor so zealously to promote?

But to the extract.—You are speaking of the extremes, superstition and skepticism, and showing that Universalists are more prone to the latter than to the former, and that therefore the latter should be most zealously guarded against, by the introduction of a stricter church government and discipline, and of suitable religious ceremonies. Then, you know, brother, you proceed thus—

"Come, Br. Grosh, let us reason these points. I think better of you as a philosopher, than I care to say; but I do think you ULTRA in certain things pertaining to government and church practice—(nevertheless I respect the RADICALISM which makes you so.) You know that man is a creature of extremes, and that of two evils (pardon the saw) it is the wiser part to choose the less. 'To choose NEITHER, wiser still,' you may say—well. Now, to which extreme, the superstitious or the skeptical, are Universalists most prone? Your candor will compel you to own, the latter. Ought not IT, then, to be more specially guarded against? You will admit this, I think. I do, at least, with all my soul; and hence, in the controversy about praise-meetings between Brs. Whittemore and Thomas, on the one hand, and Br. Sawyer on the other, I could not but feel that, although in the abstract, the latter seemed to wield the weightier arguments, yet those of the former were in stricter conformity with the homely philosophy of fact. The same, I think, will hold good in regard to the matters between us. Take you a church, and drill it into your notions—no ordinances of a ceremonious nature—no laws prohibitory of infidel connexion with the church—no meetings for the objects of praise and prayer, etc. I also take a church, or, (to be more modest in the comparison,) Br. Messinger takes a church, and he trains it to the observance of the things specified. What will be the result of these opposite measures upon these churches respectively? This. I think that the one, in the world's sense of the term, will be the better philosophers—the other will be the better Christians. Now the latter have become so rare an article, and the former are so cheap and plentiful, that I confess I would go farther to find one good, warm-hearted, bona fide Christian, than to find the most numerous fry of philosophers to be met with beneath the moon."

Such is the extract in full—complete in itself. The italicising, only, is mine. It charges me with being opposed to all ordinances of a ceremonious nature—in favor of the admission of infidels to our fellowship and communion—and opposed to social religious meetings, or meetings for prayer and praise. I deny every charge here made, length and breadth—totally, positively, and unqualifiedly; and appeal to my practice, my conversations, and my writings as an Editor of this paper, in confirmation of my denial. And for what reason, or or on what grounds you have preferred these most detestable "notions" to me, I can not even imagine. It is true that I have denied that either the eucharist, or baptism, or feetwashing is binding upon the disciples of Jesus at this day—but I have yet to learn that this renders me opposed to the observance of either of them as merely commemorative or emblematic rites—and if it did, that would render me opposed to all ceremonies. On the contrary, you know, Br. Rogers, that I have had my children dedicated to God, by public ceremony—that I have assisted in ordinations of my brethren, and submitted to the rite myself—that I have aided in the celebrations of Christmas eve. etc. etc.

In regard to your second charge, I am still at a greater loss to account for your charge. I have, for years, advocated the propriety and necessity of organizing every one of our societies with church discipline; and, certainly, the forms of constitutions which I have published for this purpose, and the arguments I have used, show that I was for having none but believers in divine revelation—none but persons of good moral characters, admitted as members.

In regard to the last charge, I can only say, Br. Rogers, that you will not find any thing from my pen—you will not find a witness who will testify that he ever heard any thing from my lips, against such meetings.

This much in self defence. If I have seemed to boast—and may God keep me from vain glorying in my feeble efforts to serve him!—it has only been in appearance, and because I deemed such an appearance necessary in defence of my character. For the same reason, I solemnly call upon you, brother, to point to the proofs of your charges, or to exonerate me from them.

Will you say that you praise me, in the beginning of this very offensive paragraph of yours? Yes—much as you would tickle a trout, that you may the more securely make him feel the barb! Flattery I do not want from any one—but your praises, brother, are not flattery—they are insult—though I do not believe you meant to insult me. You imply that you think highly of me as a philosopher; and then, in speaking of a church supposedly trained by my philosophic labors, you give the world to understand that you mean, by philosopher, a heartless, faithless, enemy to good order, social feeling, and Christian affection! When you wish to damn me in the estimation of your friends, praise me for being a philosopher, and the work will be done, so far as you can do it.

Your article, Brother, was intended for publication. The remainder of it so nearly meets my feelings and opinions, that I shall publish it. The extract is published above, for it needed and has received my answer.—As you are so much on the wing, I could not answer it by private letter. If you reply to sustain your charges, take your own way—but if to abandon them, let your words be few—a disclaimer and a retraction is all I want. I feel no enmity—even no anger, now; though your letter, a week ago, made the blood rush to my face in indignation and astonishment, mingled with grief, that any reader of this paper could so much misunderstand or misrepresent the feelings, faith, and opinions of

Dear Brother, yours affectionately in the Gospel of Jesus, A. B. Grosh.

REVELATIONS XX: 12.

"And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened; and another book was opened which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works."

We have two requests for the explanation of this passage. When I furnished my views of the Book of Revelations, in the 30th number of the current volume, I expected to follow it up with an explanation of this and the succeeding passage. Some circumstances prevented me, and I now am obliged to request my readers to reperuse my views respecting the whole book, if they have forgotten them.

I regret that I will not be abie so much to say what the passage does mean, as what it does not mean. From the very nature of the book itself—its highly figurative style and the obscurity that rests on its meaning—we must confine ourselves to guarding it from being perverted to teach doctrines that are opposed to other teachings of the New Testament—at least, doctrines that are not taught in the other portions of the Bible. In accordance with this duty, I will confine this article to a few remarks on

THE DAY OF JUDGMENT.

The passage quoted above is generally believed, by our Partialist brethren, as proof positive of a day of judgment, beyond the confines of earth and time. I shall endeavor to satisfy you that not only does the text not prove this dogma, but that it is not taught in the Scriptures. Our Partialist brethren say, that after the resurrection all mankind will be ushered into God's presence, and there be individually examined according to their faith and obedience in this life. After this judgment, the righteous will be received into endless glory, and the wicked driven into endless torments. Now, we object to this doctrine, because,

1. All the judgment days (and they are many) spoken of in the Bible, represent the judgment to be according to works, and never according to faith, or election, or reprobation. It is believed that no exception can be found to this statement. And so sensible does Dr. Clarke appear, that our text is in opposition to a judgment according to faith, that, in his comment, he adds to the record—"'according to their works'—and their FAITH, for their works are evidence of their faith." Is this so? Was the half-heathen Good Samaritan of more orthodox faith than the correctly believing priest and Levite?

2. We object to the doctrine that all mankind must go to the judgment seat of God and Christ, because in every case named in the New Testament it is declared that Jesus will come to the earth to enter into judgment. You can not find a single instance in which it is declared that any go from this earth, or from this life, to be judged—but every case where movement is spoken of, it is expressly declared that Jesus, or God, comes to this world to hold the judgment.

3. We object to the common doctrine, because it represents the judgment as being on one particular day, in eternity, when, not only are there no days in eternity, but there are a vast number of different days specially spoken of as days of Judgment in time—and none are specially designated as being particularly "the great and general judgment day." I am aware that our common English version speaks of "the judgment," and "the day of judgment," in several places; but if our opposing brethren will look into the Greek Testament, or their own Commentators, they will find that it should be "a judgment," and "a day of judgment."

It is also said in the Acts of the Apostles, that "God hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world by Jesus Christ;" but it should be remembered that Jesus said, "now is the judgment of this world;" and that Peter declared that, in his day, this judgment was to commence at the house of God. Consequently, this day appointed, is like the day of the Mosaic dispensation—an indefinite period of time, not in eternity but in this world; and the judgment is not a sentencing to endless wo, but a ruling of the world with truth and grace, until all things shall be reconciled to God—for Jesus came not into the world to condemn it, but to save it.

4. We object to the common doctrine of a day of judgment—the last judgment, as it is called—because no where does the Bible use such language as the last judgment, or the first, second, third, or any other numerical order of judgment days.

It is true, the Bible frequently speaks of the last day and days—of the present world and the world to come—of the end of the world, etc., but if our opposing brethren will compare Scripture with Scripture, or consult their own most learned Commentators—they will find that these phrases always designate the days of the Messiah—the close of the Jewish and the beginning of the Christian dispensations of grace and truth. Hence Paul says that "in the ends of the worlds Christ came to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself"—and that "in these last days God hath spoken to us by his Son."

Thus the day of the last judgment, if any can be called the last, began 1800 years ago, is yet continued, and will be continued until ended on the earth—until all are saved (not condemned) by the Saviour of the whole world.

5. We object to the common doctrine of a day of final judgment after the resurrection, because in no place is such a judgment spoken of in connection with the resurrection to immortality. I am aware that some quote Dan. xii: 2, "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt"—but this, you see, is no general resurrection, as only "MANY of them that sleep in the dust of the earth" were to awake; and, besides, by the first verse you will find that it was to take place when "Michael the great prince"—i. e. Jesus—would stand up for the children of the Jews—when there should be a time of trouble such as had never before been—i. e. at the destruction of Jerusalem, as may be seen by comparing the language here used with Christ's own declarations in Matt. xxiv: 21, compared with Matt. xxiv: 29 and 35.

I am also aware that many quote John v: 27 to 29, "all that are in the graves shall come forth, they that have done good to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation"—but this, also, is but a partial resurrection, embracing those only that are in "the graves"—and of them, those, only, who have done good and done evil. Neither is it a resurrection to immortality, but, as may be seen by comparing it with Dan. xii: 1, 2, and with its preceding context, only a resurrection from spiritual death to spiritual life.—For the Scripture use of the word "graves," see Ezekiel xxxvii: 11-14.

I repeat, then—in no place where the resurrection in eternity—the general resurrection—the resurrection to immortality, is spoken of, is any mention whatever made of any day of judgment—of any condemnation of a part of mankind to endless wo. You can not find a single instance in the whole Bible. Nor is this all—in no place where a judgment according to works is spoken of, (and the Bible speaks of no judgment according to any thing but works)—in no such place will you find any mention of the eternal state of immortality—of some going to heaven and others being cast into hell—of some coming from heaven and others from hell, to be judged—or any mention of immortality, or a general resurrection. Search for yourselves, and you will be astonished at the vast difference between the creeds and preachings of our Partialist brethren on these two subjects—general resurrection, and days of judgments—differences so numerous and great, that the limits of three sermons would hardly suffice to name them all.

These objections to the common doctrine of a day of judgment, might be greatly multiplied and extended, but my limits admonish me to close by a direct reference to our text, and an explanation of the doctrine of the New Testament which it illustrates and confirms, and with which it fully harmonizes. I think you must readily perceive, that our text and its context—construe them as literally as the highly figurative language of the whole book will allow you to do—can not with any propriety, be adduced in proof of the common opinions, until, at least, those opinions are proven true by some other part of the sacred Scriptures.

Of itself, the text is far from proving the common notions of a final general judgment. The dead, and not those made alive in the resurrection, are judged. It is "the dead." They are judged according to their works—neither faith, nor sovereign electing grace are made of any account. The "dead, small and great," are first judged, and then, only, "the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell gave up the dead which were in them," consequently it was but a partial judgment that our text describes. Not a word is said of the saints coming from heaven to be judged—not a word of a resurrection to immortality—not a word of some being received to endless glory, and the remainder being condemned to endless wo. In short, silent as all the rest of the Bible is on the common opinion of a day of judgment—destitute as this passage is of the many particulars of that common opinion, and opposed as it is to many others—and followed as it is by the solemn and repeated declarations that all these things were to come to pass "quickly" and "shortly," more than 1700 years ago—I should do violence to my conscience—to the word of God—to reason—were I to admit this passage as proof of the popular dogma of a general judgment at the end of time.

Do you ask, what, then, does the text mean? I answer, that with Dr. Clarke and others, I do not pretend to understand the Apocalypse. I have a vague opinion as to the meaning of the text, it is true, but do not feel very positive in regard to its correctness, nor very able to sustain it if opposed. But in regard to what it does not, can not mean, I feel perfectly willing to defend it—whether able to do it, or not, perhaps futurity may determine. The text can not mean to contradict the entire teachings of the Bible on the subject of punishment—of the resurrection state—of the destiny of man—of, in fact, the very doctrine of which it treats. That it harmonizes with the doctrine of the Scriptures generally—entirely—on these subjects, I will prove in my next article. A. B. G.

ORDINANCES.

From an esteemed ministering brother, I learn, that some of our readers suppose that I am opposed to the ordinances of baptism and the eucharist. Permit me to state how far they err. I am in favor of their celebration by all who desire to do so, as merely emblematic and commemorative ceremonies. I do not believe that Jesus enjoined their observance after the destruction of the Jewish dispensation; and, of course, I am opposed to observing them as saving ordinances, or as being obligatory on Christians at this day. But I am decidedly in favor of securing their observance to all who wish to observe them, as rites emblematic of purity, and commemorative of Jesus. The long abuse of the eucharist in the world—the errors yet entertained in regard to it—the pertinacity with which it is forced on our attention as a duty obligatory upon us, commanded by the Saviour, etc., would, I confess, render me loth to partake of it, unless the object was specially stated to be in accordance with my views of the subject. But I do wish to see all enjoying the privileges their consciences or desires demand, and I ask to be permitted to enjoy my own, in peace—to eat to God's glory, or to abstain from eating if I deem it to his glory, just as I please. As to other judicious ceremonies not thus abused, and not urged as binding, and celebrations of holidays, to bring great persons or events to mind, I am in favor of them, and always have been. For other matters, see Letter to Br. Rogers, in this paper. A. B. G.

EXAMINATION AND EXHIBITION OF THE CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

On Tuesday and Wednesday of last week, I had the pleasure of witnessing the Examination of the male, and the Exhibitions of the male and female departments of this excellent Institution. As we have received a communication from Br. T. D. Cook, who was present, and shall publish it next week, I will only say in this place, that the whole came off to the great satisfaction of every one I have heard speak on the subject, and with great credit to all the parties concerned in them.

The examination was not a "got up" affair. The students were examined, without extra preparation, in any part of their previous studies, just as the teachers chose, at the moment, to select the place and subject. The questions were very minute, and were answered as to the why and wherefore, until the students had exhausted the reasons they had to give. And these answers were given with a readiness and correctness, generally, which proved that they understood and had made their own, all they had learned. In short, so far as all present were able to judge of the various branches in which the pupils were reviewed, it appeared to be the most thorough examination ever had in the walls of the Institution. The illness of Mr. Ellas, for some weeks previous, rendered the duties of Dr. Clowes and Mr. Perkins more arduous, of course; and would probably account for some defects in these branches Mr. Ellas taught. I thought this was the case in the Elocution exercises. If it was the case in any other branch, it was not perceived.

But such were the exercises, as to convince every one present, that the Clinton Liberal Institute, under its present management—under the mild, courteous, and arduous exertions of its present teachers—is rapidly rising in usefulness and merit. There is certainly, no institution of the kind in this, if in any section of our State, more worthy of public confidence and patronage. And when we add to its merits as a mere institution of learning, its manly, liberal tone—its freedom from the trammels of sectarism and bigotry—there is none as worthy of a hearty, substantial patronage—especially from that portion of the public which is in favor of educating the rising generation in such a manner that they may well fill the station of free honest men, active, and thinking, and useful citizens of this great republic.

More—much more, I would gladly say, but have not room. Next week Br. Cook will speak for it, candidly and briefly. In the meantime, can not our friends do something to aid it? Donations of books, money, philosophical apparatus—all will be acceptable aids. Or make known its character to those who have children to educate, and who wish them to be carefully, thoroughly and pleasingly educated. They will find a father in the President—brethren in his assistants—who will watch over and aid them in every good and noble effort to become virtuous, learned and useful. A. B. G.

MEMOIR OF REV. JOHN FREEMAN.

This very excellent and truly valuable work, written by Br. S. R. Smith, and the sale of which was designed to furnish a small fund for the benefit of the widow and orphan children of the lamented Freeman, has now been before the public a little over three years. The greater part of the edition printed (a few hundred only being left) was soon put into the hands of booksellers and ministering brethren throughout this and other States where the doctrine of impartial grace prevailed most, with the expectation that the sales and receipts would soon refund to the Publisher the cash advanced for paper, printing, binding, etc., and allow something to be paid over to the widow long ere this time. But this reasonable expectation has not been realized. As yet enough has not been received to pay for the publication; of course the widow has received nothing.

This ought not so to be. The work is one of more than ordinary interest and value, not only to the minister, but to the parent, the teacher, the guardian of youth, whoever he may be, and indeed to every lover of Christian truth and zeal; and it should be in the hands of all. Will our agents who have received this work for sale, and who have not yet done it, make immediate returns, one and all, of the number of books sold, and send the money received therefor; and will those who still have some of the books on hand make another and an extra effort to sell them? Let them, especially our ministering brethren, take them to the places of public meeting, speak of the merits of the work, and of the claims and wants of the widow and orphans, and urge our friends and a liberal public to buy—yea, urge every one who is able, to give as a contribution (if they will not buy) fifty cents, the price of the work, for the benefit of the widow, and then let them take the book as a valuable legacy to themselves and posterity; and we can assure them that every good judge, after reading the work, will value it at least ten times above its cost. Let this course be adopted, and we believe the whole edition (of only 1500 copies) can be immediately disposed of, the publisher paid, the cause of truth and righteousness both honored and served, the orphan be fed, the widow's heart be made to sing for joy, and every contributor to such laudable ends doubly compensated for his beneficence. Brethren, will you make the experiment—and will you do it faithfully?—Let those who are out of the work, order more, till no more are to be had. Remember "pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father, is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction."

A LEAF FROM PRAYERFUL MEDITATION.

* * * * All-pervading spirit! Mind most glorious and infinite! Thy sun forever marches on its august pathway, and Thy stars burn in heaven, speaking in their voiceless eloquence. On earth Thy bounties pour in a living tide of blessing, proclaiming Thee good to all. In the mysteries of mind and matter—in the secrets of magnetism and of life—in all the varied world of sublime works—Thou art seen. In the spiritual kingdom, Thy beloved messenger in his resurrection power, tells of the torch of hope which Thou hast made to burn even on the coffin of the dead, and of the ultimate exultation of all minds to Thee and happiness. And lo! all these do teach that "God is Love"—and to him should man bow in the majesty of truth and the holiness of virtue. * * *

ONE MORE CALL.

I have long, very long, and patiently as I could, waited on my old subscribers and delinquent debtors for this paper, who have been owing me from three to ten years past, in hopes that their own consciences and sense of justice would prompt them to settle up their accounts without another call, and pay me for the many years of hard and incessant labors I spent for their edification and the furtherance of the cause of truth. But "hope long deferred maketh the heart sick;" and on many of them I have waited in vain. I desire that all outstanding and unsettled accounts may be immediately settled up and remittances made to this place forthwith. I shall feel obliged to leave those accounts that are not settled soon in the hands of others for legal adjustment. I have higherto been and still am extremely reluctant to the adoption of any compulsory measures for the collection of my dues. But when all other means fail is it not right? And again we ask our debtors, have we not waited long enough? The latest of my accounts for papers are three years old, and many of them three times three! I hope not to be compelled to make another call, or a different one from the above request, and that while my old subscribers remember me in faithfulness—as many of them have already, yea many times done it—God bless their kind souls—they will none of them forget the present deserving and needing Publishers of the Magazine and Advocate. POETRY

[From the London Metropolitan for April.]

THE WORLD.

BY ELIZA COOK.

Talk who will of the world as a desert of thrall,
Yet, yet, there is bloom on the waste;
Though the chalice of life hath its acid and gall,
There are honey drops too for the taste.

We murmur and droop should a sorrow-cloud stay,
And note all the shades of our lot;
But the rich scintillations that brighten our way,
Are basked in, enjoyed and forgot.

How thankless is he who remembers alone
All the bitter, the drear and the dark—
Though the raven may scare with its wo-boding tone,
Do we ne'er hear the song of the lark?

We may utter farewell when 'tis torture to part,
But in meeting the dear one again,
Have we never rejoiced with that wildness of heart
Which outbalances ages of pain?

Who hath not had moments so laden with bliss,
When the soul in its fulness of love,
Would waver, if bidden to choose between this
And the paradise promised above?

Though the eye may be dimm'd with its grief-drop awhile,
And the whitened lip sigh forth its fear,
Yet pensive indeed is that face where the smile
Is not oftener seen than the tear.

There are times when the storm-gust may rattle around;
There are spots where the poison-shrub grows;
Yet are there not hours when nought else can be found,
But the south wind, the sunshine, and rose?

O haplessly rare is the portion that's ours,
And strange is the path that we take,
If there spring not beside us a few precious flowers
To soften the thorn and the brake.

The wail of regret, the rude clashing of strife
The soul's harmony often may mar;
But I think we must own in the discords of life
'Tis ourselves that oft waken the jar.

Earth is not all fair, yet it is not all gloom,
And the voice of the grateful will tell,
That He who allotted pain, death, and the tomb,
[illegible]

[illegible] do its worst, and my spirit [illegible]
O'er its own shattered happiness pine,
Let me witness the joy in another's glad breast,
And some pleasure must kindle in mine.

Then say not the world is a desert of thrall,
There is bloom, there is light on the waste
Though the chalice of life hath its acid and gall,
There are honey drops too for the taste.

THE DEVIL.

What strange and ridiculous notions some people entertain concerning the devil. And these notions are not confined either to the miserably ignorant, to the common people, but are cherished and have been for years and years, by some of the best, learned, and wisest men of the world, so called. Commenting upon 1 Peter v: 8—"Be sober, be vigilant, because your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour." Dr. Adam Clarke makes the following very extraordinary remarks concerning the skill and power of this wonderful non-descript. "This is the reason why we should be sober and vigilant: we have an ever active, implacable, subtle enemy to contend with. He walketh about: he has access to you every where: he knows your feelings and your propensities; and he forms himself of all your circumstances; only God can know more and do more than he." The Dr. by this language places the devil second to God only, in power and wisdom, etc., but barely inferior to him.

This is almost omnipotent, omniscient, and omnipresent. In fact, as he is usually spoken of, we can not see wherein he falls one particle short of an Almighty and All-wise Being. This devil was, it is said, once an angel of light, and a citizen of heaven—that by some unaccountable oversight in Jehovah, sin entered the "high and holy place," and the bright angel became polluted therewith—turned traitor and rebelled against the government. A war in consequence broke out in the celestial realm, and after a mighty struggle, Mr. devil was overpowered, and had capital punishment been the law of heaven as it is of some parts of earth, doubtless the rascal would have been executed, and thus, perhaps, have saved the world from all the sin and wickedness which it has been doomed to experience. But instead of doing this he was banished from the kingdom and transported to the regions of hopeless despair and perpetual torment. But astonishing to relate, this contemptible and cunning fellow has broke jail—escaped from his dungeon, and now walks up and down the earth seeking whom he may destroy. He is invisible, always present with every body, and in short, is one of the most remarkable characters that ever visited the earth or found place upon the page of history.

But we deny the truth of this doctrine of a personal being called the devil. We disbelieve the story of the fall of angels as usually explained and understood, and the silly idea of mankind's being influenced and governed in any degree by any invisible spirit save that of God, finds no countenance with us. The whole phantom of a personal devil, and his fiery kingdom, is to us sheer nonsense, and we reject the entire scheme which involves the notion of a partial Deity, a living and sort of locomotive devil, and a bottomless pit of fire and torment prepared for a part of the human family. We reject these things because they are both unreasonable and unscriptural.

St. James says, "resist the devil and he will flee from you."

But such a being as many represent the devil to be, I venture to say, could not be resisted by man. Knowing all our thoughts and possessing so much greater power than we, he could take every advantage of our plans, and lead us whithersoever he pleased. And to think that any thing we could do might cause him to flee from us, is as preposterous and absurd as to think that by the same means we could divert the lightning of heaven from its course, or smother the report of the bursting thunder. We could do nothing with such an adversary, and therefore are led to conclude that such a being is only the bug-bear of imagination and has no existence or abiding place any where else. The word "devil," as employed by the apostle James, simply represents the evil passions and unholy lusts of mankind.—"From whence come wars and fightings among you?" saith the apostle, "come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?" Every attentive and unprejudiced reader of the New Testament can not avoid discovering the fact, that evil propensities—the lusts of the flesh, etc., constituted what is called the devil, and therefore it is needless for us to enlarge. We only ask a candid examination of the Scriptures by all those who doubt our opinion on this point. But finally, let the belief of man be what it may in reference to the devil, one thing is certain, that he is to be destroyed. Christ, we are informed by Paul to the Hebrews, shall destroy the devil and all his works, so that there shall be a "finish of sin and an end of transgression"—everlasting righteousness shall be brought in, and all mankind be clothed therewith, that they may enjoy an eternity of holiness and happiness.—Gospel Witness.

MARRIAGES.

In Paines Hollow, on the 19th ult., by Rev. J. D. Hicks, Mr. DELOS L. FILER, of ——, to Miss SALLY AMANDA PAINE, of the former place.

In Wilna, May 30th, by Rev. J. H. Whelpley, Capt. SIMEON FULTON, to Miss LARISSA SMITH, all of Wilna.

Also, on the 12th ult., by the same, Mr. JAMES INGALS, of Wilna, to Miss HANNAH SWEET, of Rutland.

DEATHS.

In this city, on Saturday, the 25th ult., of billious fever, Mrs. LUCY ANN BROADWAY, wife of Daniel D. Broadway, in the 32d year of her age. She had been of a consumptive habit, and was sick some time previous to the attack of fever. She bore her illness with patience, and was resigned to depart. A bereaved husband and four children have met in her death the loss of an affectionate partner and tender mother. May they feel that God afflicts us for our profit—that all his dispensations are the results of infinite love and goodness, and that, consequently, all sorrow shall be resolved into joy, all mourning into rejoicing, and all death into life immortal and blissful.

In Sharon, Washtenaw county, Mich., August 10th, MARGARET, consort of Elijah Stanton, aged 22 years and 5 months; leaving an infant daughter three and a half months old, to the care of her afflicted husband. Few persons have lived more fondly beloved, or died more feelingly lamented. A large assemblage of her neighbors and friends, by their heart-felt sympathies at her funeral, fully evinced the estimation in which she was held. She lived and died, emphatically, a Christian.—Her faith gained strength as the time of her departure drew near. She was firm in the belief of the final restitution of all things, and ready to depart. She selected hymn 325 from Streeter's collection, to be sung at her funeral. Her relatives and friends in Oneida and Herkimer counties, N. Y., will know best how to prize her worth, and to estimate their loss. Mrs. Beebe and myself attended her funeral from a distance of 30 miles—Elder Hamblin (Baptist) officiated. S. BEEBE, Jr.

Also, on August 13th, MARGARET HELEN STANTON, the infant daughter of the aforesaid Margaret and Elijah Stanton, aged three and a half months. May the bereaved husband and parent find in this afflictive trial, that God's grace is sufficient for his consolation and support. A. B. G.

In Edmeston, on the 13th ult., Mrs. ELECTA BILYEA, daughter of Isaac T. Brown, and wife of T. J. Bilyea, in the 25th year of her age. Mrs. Bilyea was a believer in the faith that maketh free; and the neighborhood and society in which she resided, have sustained a loss which they deeply deplore. May God enable them to feel that their loss is her gain. O. W.

In Clay, on the 4th ult., Mrs. ELIZABETH, wife of Wm. Warner, Esq. In the death of sister W., society has sustained a loss. She was one who cherished in her bosom the religion of Christ, and ever acted upon its principles. Sermon by S. B.

In Albion, Orleans county, N. Y., on the 24th of July, WILLIAM CASWELL, in the 38th year of his age. Br. C. had long been a believer in the doctrine of God's impartial grace, which doctrine he adorned with a well ordered life and conversation. He was comforted by its hopes, during a protracted illness, and when death approached he hailed his arrival with apparent joy. He died in peace.

May the consolations of the Gospel be the portion of his surviving relatives, and reconcile them to this afflictive stroke of divine Providence.

His funeral was attended in the Methodist chapel and a discourse delivered on the occasion by T. D. COOK.

In Duanesburg, N. Y., July 30th, Mrs. ISABEL BRADFORD, in her 87th year.

Mrs. Bradford was a person of unbounded benevolence, and her heart always beat in unison with charity and love. At the threshold of being, God gave her a soul whose affections reached to all mankind. Not far from the same time her spiritual teachers gave her a creed, calculated to circumscribe the affections and limit them to but a part of our race. Hence came a long and bitter warfare between her soul, which God had made, and her creed which man made. Her soul conquered, for God is stronger than man. She died fully in the faith, that eventually, the whole family of man on earth shall be but one family of God in heaven.

By her request, the writer preached at her funeral, and chose as his text Rev. xiv: 13. L. C MARVIN.

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1838. NUMBER 37.

Liberal Institute, Clinton, August 29th, 1838.

Rev. G. W. Montgomery:

SIR—At a meeting of the Students of the Clinton Liberal Institute, a Committee consisting of the following individuals, G. W. Gage, J. M. Elwood, and J. S. Torrance, were appointed, who drafted the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That the thanks of the Students of the Clinton Liberal Institute, be presented to the Rev. G. W. Montgomery, for his very able address, and that a copy be requested for publication in the Magazine and Advocate.

Yours, etc., A. P. WILLARD, President.
WM. R. BIDDLECOM, Sec'ry.

Auburn, September 1st, 1838.

GENTLEMEN—Your note, requesting the publication of my address on the day of Exhibition at the Clinton Liberal Institute, is hereby complied with. It yields me no small degree of pleasure to yield to your wishes, and also to meet the desires which were personally expressed to me, of your very respected President and Principal, the Rev. Dr. Clowes.

Respectfully yours, G. W. MONTGOMERY.

To the Students of the Clinton Liberal Institute, through their President, Mr. A. P. Willard, and Secretary, Mr. W. R. Biddlecom.

ORATION.

THE POWER OF MIND, AND THE NECESSITY OF ITS CULTIVATION.

DELIVERED AT THE EXHIBITION OF THE CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE FOR THE YEAR 1838.

It is at the request of the respected Principal of this Institution, that your speaker now addresses you, to discourse concerning principles which have an important bearing upon the moral and intellectual nature of men. And though the subject he has chosen, is one of high import, and leads to vast range of thought—though it swells into grandeur, because it looks forward to the period when man shall attain the most elevated heights in the regions of science and philosophy; and though it requires even volumes for its general illustration, yet in the little space of time allotted him, your speaker will endeavor to cause the light of the feeble fire he now kindles, to shine upon the theme, the Power of Mind, and the necessity of its Cultivation.

Whoever has examined the history of animated life, and freely studied that part of it which comes within his immediate observation, must have beheld the vast difference which exists between man with the immense power of his actions, and the lower animals as connected with their habits and relative situation in nature. Animals, in answering "their being's end and aim," walk in the pathways which He who governs the flower as well as the world, has marked out for them. And the guide which leads them there, is, with some remarkable and interesting exceptions, instinct, written upon their constitution, which, without education, carries them unerringly to the kind of food adapted for them, and to the fulfilment of the object for which they were designed. The bee, throughout all its generations, constructs its comb with the same mechanical skill and nicety; the bird builds its nest of the same convenient form and situation; the beaver rears the same appearance and arrangement of habitation. And so onward, throughout the great chain of brute creations: they walk in the unvarying instincts of their nature, without improvement and without instruction, except what the great Master of life has written on their organization, which guides them as surely as the magnet fixes the point of the needle to the North.

How different is the fact in reference to man. He stands at the head of, because he is different from, all other animal life in being an inventor, and in some respects, a creator. He combines the various forms of matter into the new, the useful, the beautiful; he improves his dwelling, beautifies his home on earth, and gathers around him the blessings of nature. He creates new duties, fixes new wants, and increases the sources to satisfy them. If we open the tomb of nations and cities, there shall rise before us, Babylon, the place of wealth and wonders; Thebes, of vast extent; Athens, the seat of philosophers and marbled palaces; Jerusalem, the spot where the holy temple stood, and the glory of the Lord was manifested; Rome, once proud mistress of the whole earth; to tell of the magnificent structures which man has raised: while the vast fragments of them, which remain scattered on frightful deserts, forever the wonder of man, show, as they melted from the record of existing things, how the dust of their ruins has overwhelmed multitudes of the species who built them. Since then, man has fled forward on the wings of improvement. The floods have been seized and made to pour upon machinery, so as to saw his trees into lumber, weave his wool and silk into articles of dress, both for ornament and comfort, and grind the wheat which forms the basis of his food. Steam has been enslaved, and compelled to drive his boats through the water with the speed of a scared bird, to force the spiles deep into the swamp upon which the rail-road rests, and then to convey him over that road with the velocity of the swallow. The wind has been gathered up and made to swell the wings of his ships; magnetism has been chained to the point of the needle, to guide those ships over wild and trackless wastes of ocean-water; and the iron rod renders them safe even when electric fluid is rolling its thunder and causing man to quail before its terrific energies. The mountains have been opened, and the diamond brought forth to shed its lustre, or the gold to exhibit its richness. The surface of the earth has been torn asunder, and forced to give up its treasures of iron ore, or its equally invaluable coal—the one to become the vast and multifarious machinery used in human society, and the other to be an inexhaustible resource to supply the want of wood. The heavens have been explored, and their arrangements, movements and sublime appearances, have been written in a book to form the science of astronomy, and to teach us that there are other worlds, beyond comprehension more magnificent and gigantic than that which we inhabit, and that the ways of Him who bids the sun walk in the midst of its unquenchable fires, and the chariot-clouds to roll over continents pouring down their floods, are as past finding out as the universe is incapable of being grasped by an atom.

The art of noting down thoughts and facts in books by the aid of the printing-press and paper, has been discovered—and, lo! a new world is opened, a new existence is created, a new felicity is enjoyed. The classic lores of other and ancient days are opened to us—among many, the eloquence of a Cicero, the ardent genius of a Demosthenes, the sage moral precepts of a Seneca, the racy, rich, and meaning verse of a Homer, and the histories of an Herodotus, are all unfolded to our enjoyment. In centuries that sleep in the tomb of oblivion, we can trace the rising to splendor and the fall to ruin of empires, and the wars, changes, wayward fancies, and desolation which attended man; we can, by the aid of the historian, walk over the desolated tracks and blood-stained pathways of the conqueror—stand with Paul on Mars Hill, in the midst of the Athenian philosophers, or attend the kings of Egypt, while those who now live only in the mummy-case, were beholding the gradual uprising of the wonderful pyramids; and with but a simple book before us, we can hear the hallowed voice of the Saviour as he proclaimed Heaven's truth—can behold the strange vicissitudes of that truth, and the political revolutions which the nations met through which it passed; and we can inspect the darkness of the iron ages, when mind was cramped and enfeebled; and we can view the rushing of that mighty tide of reformation, which, breaking down the barriers of state policy, has borne man onward to diversified forms of truth and knowledge, and is still taking him to a yet higher station in the world around him, and to nobler scenes of philosophy than he has yet attained.

Books are around us in multitudes, displaying the movements and workings of all grades of intellect. Through them, a Paley and a Wayland unfold the moral duties of life—a Locke, Gall Spurzheim, and Combe unveil the secrets of mental phenomena—a Buckland, Lyell, and Silliman develope the wonders of the geological and mineralogical world—a Dick, Chalmers, Cuvier, La Place, and a host of others, spread before us like a map, heaven, earth, and the intricate machinery of animal organization—a Mrs. Moore, Sigourney, a Miss Edgeworth, Sedgewick, and a constellation of lights, dispense to us the powers and excellences of female mind—while works have been written which shower immortality upon the name of Sir Walter Scott. And above all these, in the Book of books, the treasure-house of the Lord, we hear the pleasing promises of Him whose word never fails, or the awful words of prophecy sweeping away centuries of future time, and predicting the downfall of empires and the fate of men—we imbibe the sublime doctrines of that Saviour who spoke no guile and practiced no evil, or we hear the terrible denunciations against sin and the noble rewards of virtue—until the majesty of truth makes us bow in humility, while we thrillingly feel that in this book the Lord speaketh.

Still farther than all this.—We discover that the works of man are not yet exhausted. A Newton, by the simple falling of an apple, traces out the powers and wonders of the law of gravitation. A Davy, though once the indigent apprentice of an apothecary, invents a lamp, by which the miner can explore the dismal regions of earth's interior, without fear from the explosive fire-damp. A Franklin, though once a poor printer's boy in the streets of Philadelphia, rises into the philosopher, grasps the lightning of the heavens by means of a kite-string and key, and becomes famed for his sage writings and bountiful wisdom. A Fulton brings a power to bear on machinery, to stem wind and flood, and to penetrate our land in every direction, through the vast veins which forever pour their waters into the ocean-heart of the earth. A Courtois, while manufacturing nitre in Paris, in 1812, observed a corrosion on his kettles, an examination of which added a new substance to the science of chemistry, called iodine—one of whose singular properties is to scatter that frightful disease called goitre, or immense swelling, to which the inhabitants of the Alps are very subject. A Fenelon, by his known philanthropy, has gained, the protection of even the ferocious Cossack; a Penn has subdued the wild savage of the forest by his kindness: and Sisters of Charity have boldly looked the angel of death in the face while exhibiting their labors of benevolence. In fact, in all possible branches of knowledge, utility, discovery, and kindness, persons have risen to stars of the first magnitude in the firmament of human society and improvement.

But why all this? Why is man thus enabled to produce such magnificent results over all other animals? He is but the worm of an hour, and fades from life like a flower of the field. Why then soars he so far above the chain of his animal nature, and occupies, as it were, a midway station between pure spirit and real matter? It is because he has mind—mind, the star which guides man in the paths of his life, the light which beams over his day, the candle which burns on the house of his fleshly tabernacle, the divine spark which raises him from the grovelling of the mole into an intellectual, reasoning creature, and enables him with the daring of the eagle, to send his aspirations of hope even beyond the stars, with the ardent desire to be fixed in the firmament of God's own dwelling-place, a sun of mind never to set. Without mind, man is but a darkened temple, a form of feebleness, a quenched torch, an idiot, left to blunder his way over the stage of life, and then to disappear like a bubble on the flowing water. But with mind, he becomes a mighty atom, a magnificent worm. Mind is to man what the sun is to earth—it casts its invigorating heat and intellectual light over human nature, waking up all its energies, and rendering mere forms of matter subservient to its wants and its wishes.

Let it be remembered, however, that the fact of man's possessing mind, does not pre-suppose the possession of knowledge. Many men have even strong minds, yet who remain quite ignorant. An uncultivated mind, though endowed with much capability of collecting knowledge, may look up to the heavens, and down upon earth, and at himself, without discovering aught there which electrifies the astronomer, the geologist, the physiologist. He may hear the storm without knowing the cause, or see the lightning without understanding its origin, or gaze upon books rich in philosophy, without being conscious of the treasures contained in them. Mind is but the foundation of man's intellectual nature—it is the foundation, but not the temple to be reared upon it. Simple mind alone, is like a diamond in the rough, or like a plant wild in the woods—one needs the lapidary to smooth and polish it; the other expands and beautifies when cultured, pruned, and watered in the garden. Man, in order to attain the height of his intellectual nature, needs both a lapidary and a gardener for his mind: knowledge is the one, education is the other. Hence, judicious, correct education is the mighty lever which will overturn all prisons of mind, make it free in the walks of nature, and show man his relations to God, to earth, to his fellow-beings, and to himself.

There is no greater misfortune for earthly man than ignorance. Intellectual acquirement casts forth no waters for the ignorant—philosophy is a sealed book to them. Ignorant minds are the strength of a despot's empire—a fit soil for prisons and vice. A mass of ignorant people is the power with which a skilful demagogue who knows how to rouse the passions of untutored minds, can overturn governments. With the fish-women of Paris, and the blinded mass of its suburbs, who were instrumental in unchaining the tide of French revolutionary horrors, he can effect some favorite object, or he can pour them out, like the northern hive of barbarians who stung the Roman Empire to its death, to place him upon a throne of blood, until some other person more skilful than himself, changes the tide of ignorant slaves against their former master, to obtain a still greater tyrant in the shape of a Nero, a Danton, or a Robespierre. Among the truly ignorant, neither virtue nor liberty can long exist. Ignorance is the pest-house from which almost every blast of vice has issued that has withered the happiness and prospects of the world.

A tyrant fears knowledge. He accordingly endeavors to fetter the press and stifle its voice. He knows that if the sunlight of knowledge is permitted to shine in every corner of his dominions, his power will fall, and the iron heart of his tyranny will wither. Accordingly, it has been the policy of a Charles X., no less than of the un-holy Alliance of Europe, to stifle knowledge and free inquiry, for they knew that if the Hercules of intelligence was suffered to attain full strength, all their efforts to cramp mind into subserviency to their wishes, would be palsied. Enlighten mind, call out its true dignity, invigorate its noble powers, and people will not be slaves—they will rise up in majesty, and disseminate a liberty as broad and as generous as the roaming airs of heaven; they will press onward, until man becomes educated, virtuous, and free.

It has become a maxim that money is power. But with much more truth may it be said, knowledge is true power, and ignorance is true weakness. Take an individual who has lived in an uncivilized tribe of men—the properties of whose mind are hidden, though, if they were developed, they might be exceedingly powerful. He may present for admiration a brawny chest, the strongest muscular power, and the noblest developement of a physical frame cast in a Herculean mould. These may enable him to awe a few beings, ignorant like himself, into submission—but here ends his power and the extent of his influence. Take another individual whose body is feeble even, but whose mind has been highly cultivated in all the forms of knowledge. Let him take his pen, and through the medium of the printing-press, cast his thoughts upon the waters of society, and he exerts a power of the most gigantic character. His principles come into contact with other minds; those minds become assimilated to his views; and in consequence are filled with new energies. Multitudes bow to his thoughts, whose opinions are changed through his influence, though mighty oceans separate them from the author of that change. He electrifies others, though freezing in the arctic regions, or burning beneath the fires of a tropical sun. And even when his body mingles with the dust, he lives in the immortality of his literary works. Yet all this is a power exhibited by a cultivated mind exerting its knowledge. That power is more vast than brute force. It was not a physical blow which made Papal supremacy quail—it was the exertion of mind belonging to Martin Luther and John Calvin. It was not the sound of a cannon which awoke the terrors of the French Revolution—it was the voice of infidel minds, which, by sapping the walls of religion, virtue, and moral restraint, precipitated the nation into the ruin which befel it. It was not the mere pushing of a bayonet which aroused the patriotism of our sires—it was the knowledge of their rights, which inspired a stern determination to defend them.

Mind, cultivated mind, is the true sun of the moral world. Accordingly, the power of Galileo and Newton is everywhere felt—while a giant might be admired and dreaded only within the limits of some paltry village. Knowledge confers power from Red Jacket to Daniel Webster. Demosthenes could sway the Athenian multitude; Cicero could command the Roman ear. And in more modern times, knowledge, flowing from the tongue of eloquence, or pouring from the page of the laborious scholar, influences multitudes. It flies farther than the eagle; its supremacy is greater than that of the Roman banners; its dominion is broader than that of Napoleon Bonaparte. The chains of the slave are falling before it; ignorance shuns it in dismay; while its vision is bringing the rights of human beings into view. And the more mind is permitted to look into the arcana of nature and moral truth, not only will all there be found beautiful and harmonious, but the various forms of knowledge, coming in contact with intellect, will alter the complexion of society, arouse the dormant energies of mind, purify community, and strengthen all the advantages of virtue.

Such being the advantages of a mind strong with knowledge, let me urge you, young gentlemen, forming the male department of this institution, to consider more fully the fact that you are placed here to cultivate your minds and obtain knowledge. And while your teachers kindly point out to you the means of attaining instruction, be it your duty to pursue them with energy and ardor. Let no ordinary difficulties impede your way. Let the instances of men, who, with great obstacles to overcome, have combined every point of knowledge within their reach, until they have made the halls of legislation tremble beneath their overwhelming eloquence, or else sent forth the results of their private study to sway community more potently than the sceptre or the army; let these incite you onward. It is very true, that in future life, all can not become Franklins, Rushes, Sharpes, Cuviers, and Bucklands—yet you may become stars of literary power, which will shed a benign and pure light upon community. Remember, that knowledge of philosophy and morality, will give you influence, gain you respectability, acquire you happiness, and gather you riches which will make age pleasant and serene, causing life to go down like the sun on a calm summer's eve. Remember, and encourage your teachers by your industry, prudence, and propriety, and by your vivid sense of the importance of availing yourselves of their labors in enabling you to obtain knowledge in its various branches. To see your minds expand and glow with increased power and vigor, will to them be a rich reward, and to you a blessing more dear than the monies of earth. A cultivated mind will enable you to enjoy what money alone can not command. By it you can understand the voice of nature, read the secrets of the sciences, and enter upon the sublime duty of communing with God through his word and his works, which will more vigorously arouse within you the hope of existing as an intellectual being when all the earth shall cease.

Fathers, mothers, sons, and daughters of civilized and Christian communities, hear the solemn truth, that the dissemination of knowledge through a correct education, and other sources embracing all forms of instruction, is the mighty defence of the liberty which enfolds America; the cornerstone of her prosperity; the happiness of her people, and the power by which the banner of her institutions will ultimately cast its shadows over the whole earth. The moment that a portion of our population becomes ignorant, unacquainted with its rights, wants, and capabilities—the exact machine for disorganizers to propel against freedom, and the very materials for vice to feed upon—that moment we have a power among us fatal to free institutions, fatal to pure democracy, fatal to the results of that American Revolution which struck the chains of political slavery from the limbs of an infant nation, fatal to the exercise of pure religion, and fatal to the future interests of the world. Our national freedom depends on universal education: let every mind be cultivated and expanded—place knowledge at the door of every dweller of the soul—diffuse it as freely as the airs of heaven—let a school-house, with a proper teacher, be placed on every hill-top and in every valley—let all freely come—and then our nation will be as imperishable as the pyramids of Djizeh.

Hence the necessity of education, thorough education in all its forms. And that person who adds aught to the power and influence of education, is a benefactor to community and to his country. Consequently, Girard, by endowing the noble institution which is now being raised through his munificent legacy, has done more to secure the liberty of America, than he who should surround our land with a triple wall of brass bristling with bayonets and frowning with cannon. For, very soon will that institution pour into community a stream of educated men, whose influence shall be felt throughout all our dominions. And the more of such institutions we can have—the more people can look into the harmonies and arrangements of the geological, geographical, mineralogical, and physiological worlds—the more clearly they can understand the laws of nature and of language—the more capable they become of tracing the sublime Author of the universe, in all his works and in all his ways—and the more effectually they can commune with science in all its forms, the greater will be their happiness, the more nobly will they fill their stations as members of community, as citizens of a free country, and as moral stars in the Saviour's kingdom of glorious truth.

Hence it is not only the duty of every person to encourage all the efforts which are instituted for the advancement of education, but it becomes our duty to sustain this Institution, the examination and exhibition of whose scholars, have proved so creditable to them, and so approbatory to their instructors. It has hitherto been too much the case, that many of the seminaries of our land were confined with the lock and key of sectarism, to frown in darkness upon those who wished to enter them believing another faith than the one written upon the pages of the fashionable creed-book of the day. A few individuals, feeling this evil and the necessity of having a Liberal Institute, by their energies awakening the energies of others, succeeded in rearing this seminary of learning. And, situated as it is, in a delightful and healthy portion of our country, strengthened by able, judicious, and scientific President and Assistants, it is worthy of approbation and encouragement. Let us send here our sons and daughters for that general education which will fit them to nobly act out their parts on the great stage of action, in relation to God, to community, to themselves; and that they may better appreciate and understand the truth, that ultimately, when the chemistry of death shall have consigned all earthly bodies to their original elements, all minds shall return to Deity, and in infinite and constantly increasing knowledge, enjoy the felicities of immortality. ADIEU.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;

FOR SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1838.

COL. III: 1-17.

Baptism, the rite of initiation into the Christian church, seems to have been employed and interpreted by the apostles as an emblematical representation of the death, burial, and resurrection of all mankind, and as a commemoration of the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus. In the preceding chapter Paul had been improving this meaning of baptism to urge upon the Colossians the putting off of their old habits and practices, which they had, figuratively, buried in baptism. More particularly, "in the 12th verse of the preceding chapter, the apostle had told the Colossians, that they had been buried with Christ in the waters of baptism as dead persons, in token of their relinquishing their former principles and practices; and that in baptism, likewise, they had been raised out of the water with Christ, as an emblem and pledge of their resurrection with him to eternal life. The former of these doctrines the apostle had applied, chap. ii: 20, to show the Colossians the absurdity of subjecting themselves to the ritual precepts from which they had been freed by their death with Christ. And now, as the application of the latter doctrine, he told them in the first verse of this chapter, that since they had been raised with Christ out of the waters of baptism, and thereby had professed their hope of being raised with him to an eternal life in the body, they were bound to do their utmost by faith and holiness, to obtain the possession of the joys of heaven, where Christ now sitteth at the right hand of God, vested with full power to bestow these joys on all who are capable of receiving them."—(Macknight.)

By any one who considerately peruses the epistles of Paul, it will readily be observed that the hope of a glorious immortality—of a resurrection from the dead—of being with Christ and having a body like to his glorious body, was a thought ever present to, and nearly uppermost in, the mind of that apostle. Were Paul addressing us now, we might expect, therefore, a like prominence given to this pervading thought, and to have like exhortation founded upon it. Probably the allusions to the emblematical meaning of baptism might be omitted, but in the main, an address to us on the same subject would, otherwise, be the same in outline as the one now before us.

Basing his arguments and persuasives upon the hope which we entertain of a resurrection from the dead, of having bodies like to Christ's glorious body, and of being admitted to his society, Paul would urge us by the power of such considerations, to endeavor after a resemblance to him while we lived upon earth. "Who," he would ask us, "who can relish the spiritual pleasures of eternity, that has not become spiritually minded? Who could enjoy admission to the society of Jesus and the spirits of the just made perfect, that is not like them? Why should one hope for heaven?" perhaps he might say, "and how expect to be happy there, if he has not formed a taste for its habits of purity, worship, and love." To preserve any consistency between our hopes and our conduct, he would tell us that we ought to be frequently contemplating the character of Christ, and always endeavoring to act, in whatever circumstances we are placed, as we suppose that Jesus would have us to act, or as he himself would have done in the circumstances. Whatever feelings or habits we have been accustomed to indulge, that are inconsistent with this hope, he would persuade us to renounce—to put under the process of mortification. Whatever temptation Jesus would have overcome, that we must essay to overcome also. Defeats must not cause despair; to a strenuous perseverance, confident of ultimate success, he would encourage us. To expel from our character everything unlike to or unworthy of Jesus; to cultivate all the excellences of his transcendently pure, useful, and peaceful life, is to be the business of our lives.—He would tell us to seek such things—things that are above, that is, to let them employ the chief of our thoughts and endeavors, to keep an eye upon them so as never to lose sight of them. The formation of a complete Christ-like character is, he would tell us, the natural and consistent result of the hope which we profess to entertain. He might say—"In all that you learn, think, feel and do, you are to have reference to this end. Whatever tends to promote this, you are to cherish and favor. Whatever hinders this, or in any way operates injuriously upon it, you are to discountenance and shun. All that gives bias to your passions and appetites, to your inclinations and thoughts, to your opinion of yourself, to your conduct towards others, your private or public employment of your time, your business and gains, your recreations and pleasures, is to be judged of by this standard, and condemned or approved accordingly. You are to feel that nothing is of so much consequence to you as the Christian character; that to form this, is the very work for which you were sent into the world; that if this be not done, you do nothing,—you had better never have been born; for your life is wasted without effecting its object, and your soul enters eternity without having secured its salvation. The provisions of God's mercy are slighted, and for you, the Saviour has lived and died in vain."

To such as profess to entertain this hope of immortal and happy existence in the society of Jesus and of his sincere followers, such might be yet the language of Paul. Another apostle says, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God: and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when we shall appear, we shall be like him, and that we shall see him as he is. And every one who hath this hope in him, purifieth himself even as he is pure." This is a sentiment exactly parallel with that of our present paragraph.

Brethren, we profess to entertain this hope.—Is our conduct consistent with it? Do we aim at any excellence lower than that of Jesus Christ? Do we rest satisfied with any attainments short of perfection? Are we making progress towards a Christ-like character? Are we more desirous of such a character than of any worldly possession? Let us answer these questions to ourselves, my brethren; and act as becomes consistent men, and the expectants of the heavenly inheritance with Christ, and with God. P. P.

PASSAGES FROM THE DIARY OF A WORKING FARMER.

II. Joseph said of the events which brought him into Egypt, that though intended by his brethren for evil, the Lord meant them for good. It is a very interesting field of speculation to conjecture regarding the events of individual and national history, what were the designs therein, of the supreme Disposer of events. I have frequently indulged in such enticing and adventurous speculations: and although I have frequently been led to relinquish the opinions which I had previously considered specious and plausible, yet have I never regretted the time spent in such investigations. If I fail twenty times in my attempts to reach the "veiled design," yet am I, by these, educating myself in the knowledge of God's mode of government, for it is my supposed better knowledge of the objects and plans of this over-ruling Providence which makes me reject views, which formerly seemed probable. Besides this, I create for myself a high degree of interest in observing and meditating upon the events passing before my eyes, or spread out by the painter of the past upon the historical canvass. Wherever I think I can discover the footsteps and the purposes of the King of kings, there I delight to linger, meditate, be instructed, and adore. It is delightful also to be able "To justify the ways of God to man."

III. I have generally found it a more useful exercise to inquire into the immediate, operating causes of any evil with which I have been afflicted, than to follow the too common fashion of becoming peevish, or venting idle complaints. The one exercise generally shows me how to avoid the same evil again; the other but makes me feel my smart the more keenly. I have this day been thinking, not of the immediate causes of afflictions, but of what may be called their remote causes. Why are pain, misery, and affliction permitted? why made a part of the constitution of this world? Not without necessity, absolute necessity, I am well assured; for Jehovah "doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men." For what then are we visited with rods and chastisement? For our good; and especially that we may renounce those dispositions and habits which separate us in feeling and in likeness from our Father above. When do we act wisely under affliction? When we bear it with patience; when we look on our distresses as gentle remembrances from Him that we are going astray; when we submit to our spiritual Father; when our chastisements yield the peaceable fruits of amendment, and progress in righteousness.

IV. I do not know a more delicate, yet a more important task, than that which devolves upon the inspectors of common schools. How hard to refuse a certificate of fitness for the business of teaching, yet how important that the unqualified should be excluded! We say important, for as is the master, so, generally, is the school. If they discharge the important trust committed, well and faithfully, they will raise the standard of education among us. Let this nerve them to their duty.

V. How vague and indefinite is the trite word happiness. A man that is rich is said to be happy. A man that is healthy is said to be happy. A man who has attained to fame or distinction, is supposed to be happy. A man who has time at his own command, is thought to be a happy fellow. With such diversity of character, what then is happiness? A valuable coin much counterfeited.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

No. 33.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.

Utica, September 7, 1838.

DEAR SIR:—

My "philosophic limb," as you are pleased to term my Scriptural arguments, occasions you a great deal of trouble. You can do nothing with it till you have first distorted and shaped it over anew in your 26th letter. When a man in controversy has to manufacture the arguments of his opponent, it is a pretty sure sign that he can not refute those that his opponent himself adduces.

2. You say my four grand assumptions are, "1. That punishment and chastisement are but two names for one idea. 2. That all punishment necessarily terminates in the reformation of its subjects. 3. That punishment is never properly exemplary, etc. 4. That punishment is not necessary for the honor of the Governor of the universe." etc. That these assumptions "are all false," and hence I "very prudently" am "content simply to assert them." When and where have I ever asserted them? No where—they are not to be found in any part of this discussion, nor any other writings of mine. In relation to the first, I have maintained, and do maintain, that punishment and chastisement, if not always, are often used synonymously—that the word rendered punishment, Matt. xxv: 46, means chastisement, and that God chastens all for their profit that they may be partakers of his holiness. Heb. xii: 5–11. Ps. lxxxix: 30–35. 1 Cor. iii: 13–15, and their numerous parallels.

3. Your definition of punishment, viz. "penalty or pain for transgression without any regard to what the issue of that pain or penalty may be," is quite as descriptive of the unfeeling revenge of the savage, as of the righteous administration of our heavenly Father's government. You however admit that punishment "may always have three objects in view; 1st. The glory and honor of the Lawgiver; 2d. The good of the offending subject; and 3d. The guardianship and defence of the unoffending." "Something in other words is due to the King, to the subject, and to his fellows on every transgression."

4. Thus, Sir, you have completely overthrown your favorite doctrine of endless wo. The above language can never be reconciled with endless punishment till you can show that such punishment is for "the good of the offending subject." But this can never be done. Your doctrine of endless torment supposes the king shall never be honored by the obedience of the subject—that the subject shall be tormented with no other view but that of revenge, and that his fellow-beings shall only be permitted to witness an endless Auto de fe! I believe the Lawgiver shall be honored by the ultimate obedience of his subjects—that the subject shall be justly punished, and yet subdued, and that the fellows of the punished shall behold and admire the blended justice and the mercy of the administration.

5. In your 5th paragraph you speak about satan and his rebel hosts in the other world suffering six thousand years of banishment from the presence of God. But what do you know about satan? who is he? what is he? Who made him, and for what purpose? or is he self-existent, omnipotent, omnipresent, etc.? What do you know about his hosts in the other world? You say you have facts against my hypothesis. What are those facts, and how proved? Neither John Milton nor A. Campbell is sufficient authority for facts relating to the other world.

6. Your 6th paragraph is a strange medley of assumptions and misapplied Scriptures. What does John say, Rev. xxii, about "the final assemblage of God's elect into the eternal city"? Nothing at all. What does he say about sorcerers, idolaters, etc., having their evil characters indelibly fixed? Nothing; nor is any such sentiment intimated, in all the Bible. Paul speaks of some such characters, 1 Cor. vi: 9–11, and says to his Corinthian brethren, "and such WERE some of you; but ye are washed—sanctified—justified in the name of the Lord Jesus and by the spirit of our God." And no intimation is given but what those mentioned Rev. xxii: 15, might be with all others finally sanctified in like manner.

7. Again, you declare "Solomon also said, 'in hades, or the world of spirits, there is no work, nor devise, nor knowledge, nor wisdom,'" etc. I beg your pardon, Sir, Solomon never said any such thing. If he had, it would be equally fatal both to your theory and mine. For where there is no "knowledge nor wisdom," there can be neither happiness nor misery, and universal annihilation, or unconsciousness, must be the result. The truth is, Solomon said nothing about "the world of spirits." He spake of hades, the grave, or state of the dead, (i. e. of the body in the grave,) without any reference to the condition of the soul or spirit. Thus all your false assumptions, witticisms, and sarcasms that follow your perversion of Eccl. ix: 10, are pointless and out of place.

8. Your 7th paragraph is equally irrelevant: for in the first place you attempt to refute what I have never argued, and in the next place you utterly fail in that attempt. For though punishment is often designed more directly to be exemplary, yet when inflicted by the divine Being it is not incompatible with the final good of the sufferers themselves. This is proved first, by the fact that God says he took away Sodom and Gomorrah "as he saw good." But no being could see any good in merely transplanting them from a state of temporal sinning and suffering to one of greater and endless sinning and suffering: consequently the latter is not true. Second, By the fact that the final reformation and restoration of those wicked people is clearly predicted in the 16th chap. of Ezekiel. Third, By the fact that the text you quote from Isa. lxvi, speaks only of temporal punishments, and fourth, By the express testimony of Scripture, Ps. lxxxix: 30–35. Matt. xxiii: 38, 39. Hos. v: 9–15, and numerous other passages.

9. In your 8th and 11th paragraphs you charge me with having been once identified with a class of Universalists from whom I am now separated, and of apostatizing from my brethren of the school of genuine Universalism, etc., etc. Be it known to you I have never altered my distinguishing sentiments since I publicly avowed my faith in a world's salvation; and I am now connected with all and with just such Universalists as I ever have been since that period. It is not my business to defend opinions that I never held; nor does it become you to misrepresent and scandalize opinions that you have never been able to refute. Recollect, Sir, your business and mine is with the questions at issue between us. But you seem disposed to enter upon any thing and every thing but the questions. And you seem altogether better versed in the school of Heathenism, with "the fabled Nine," and "passages through Avernus," with "Orcus," and "limbus purgatorius," than with the momentous theological questions before you.

10. The first part of your 9th paragraph is an entire misrepresentation. I hold that God can and does punish the sinner, and in that punishment benevolently unites "the honor of his own throne," "the sinners good," and "the good of his other subjects." You ask, "For what did Christ suffer through life? and for what did he die?" I answer, in the language of Scripture, "For the joy set before him he endured the cross, despising the shame," etc. "God commendeth his love to us in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." He died "that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, and deliver them who, through fear of death, were all their life time subject to bondage."—"For in that he himself hath suffered, being tempted, he is able to succor them that are tempted."

11. In your 10th paragraph you say you can see no use that I can have for any Christ, Bible, preacher, faith, hope, etc. The old maxim runs, "There's none so blind as those that won't see, and none so deaf as those that won't hear." I will tell you what use I have not for a Christ, Bible, faith, etc. I have no use for them to placate an implacable divinity, to ward off omnipotent wrath, to screen man from the justice of God, or from deserved punishment, to make God friendly to man, to save him from an endless hell, (with which he was never threatened,) nor for any similar purpose. To me, however, their utility is incomparably great and precious. They acquaint me with God, my Father and my Friend. They reveal his love and win my affection for and reconciliation to him. They wean me, while I follow their dictates, from the love, and dominion, and bondage of sin and error. They bring life and immortality to light, rob death of its terrors, give hope as an anchor of the soul, sure and steadfast, and impart to the mind, life, peace and joy unspeakable and full of glory. Are these all useless trifles? Other blessings too numerous to name here, I derive from the same blessed medium.

12. You but faintly state the two fundamental truths of Calvinism and Arminianism. But faintly as you state them you can not refute them. It is true, as the Arminian holds, that God wills the salvation of all men, and as the Calvinist holds, that he will save all he wills to save, and "worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." The Arminian sentiment is equally true, that Christ "tasted death for every man," and "gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time," and likewise the Calvinistic sentiment, that he did not die in vain—that he will save all he died for, and "see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied." Pray, Sir, be so good as to refute the united strength of Arminianism and Calvinism, and you will have effectually refuted Universalism.

13. Either letter I have written of this whole series is a sufficient refutation of your 13th paragraph. Where have I, (as you charge me from your 14th to 20th paragraphs inclusive,) sought to "derogate from the heinousness of sin," or represented it as "a mere pecadillo, a speck, a cutaneous sore, a frailty, a momentary evil," etc.?—You know I have never done it, nor attempted it—these are terms of your own invention. But, Sir, let me ask, do you not deceive mankind, by representing sin greater than it really is, and its punishment to be beyond the dictates of either nature, reason or revelation, and thus weaken the restraints upon sin by begetting in the sinner a latent skepticism in regard to the infliction of such penalties? I think you do. Threaten a child with cutting off his head for accidently breaking a tumbler, and he will not believe nor heed the threat; but tell him he will receive a just punishment for his carelessness, and he will both believe and heed you.—There is, Sir, much latent skepticism in the world on the subject of endless punishment, even among those educated in the sentiment. It looks to them so unreasonable and disproportioned to their deeds that they do not believe they themselves will suffer it. But threaten them with a more reasonable and consistent penalty, and they will believe.

14. You call the doctrine that "sin is an infinite evil," the "doctrine of other days and of other men," charge me with injustice in attributing it to you, and then go to work with all your might to prove the doctrine true! The questions you ask, to prove it, are extremely sophistical. Your query, paragraph 15, is founded on a case that is not supposable. If man here were immortal, he could not be killed; if not immortal he would die without being killed. You ask again, "If A rob B of a thousand pounds, has not B lost it forever?"—Yes, in that sense of forever, i. e. during life, (unless he should regain it, which is not impossible,) but not for eternity; because he could have held it only during life, if he had not been robbed.—The Congressional conspirators and murderers of my Universalist brother Cilley, (if he were a Universalist, which is doubtful,) deprived his wife of her husband and his children of their father only for life, (or the period he would have lived had he not been murdered,) and not for eternity. And though those murderers were as orthodox in the faith of endless damnation as yourself, the act was but finite, and its punishment must have an end.

15. The Bible does not speak of, nor do I believe in, any sin that is to remain unexpiated.—To give you back your own language, I will say, "Sir, it is an insult to reason and the God of reason," to suppose "that he should have instituted such an expiatory remedial system" as that of the mission, and labors, and sufferings, and Gospel of Christ, and yet perpetuate the reign and miseries of sin to all eternity! "It is a libel on the wisdom, power, justice, goodness, truth, holiness, mercy, condescension, and love of God." For he expressly and repeatedly declares he will "take away the sins of his people, turn every one away from his iniquities, take away the sin of the world, finish sin and make an end of transgression," etc., etc. Who dares contradict him and say this shall never be done?

16. I heartily respond amen to your declarations, that "the soundest philosophy of civil government ever taught, enforces the necessity of making punishment certain rather than severe." "The certainty of punishment has incomparably more power to prevent sin than the magnitude of punishment." But a more suicidal declaration for your theology, you could not have made. You hold that every sin is an infinite evil, demeriting endless punishment. All have sinned and come short of the glory of God. Ergo, all must suffer endless damnation; for you say God "must make the punishment of sin commensurate with its demerits."

17. To avoid this dilemma, you may try to make out that there is some other way of getting around sin, expiating it, or clearing the guilty, without their suffering the condign punishment of their crimes. But in doing this, you must again resort to the old Serpent's doctrine, "Ye shall not surely die," directly contradict your assertions above quoted relative to the certainty of punishment, and also contradict the express declarations of Scripture you quote in Letter 28, in which God says he "will BY NO MEANS clear the guilty," etc., etc. Thus, Sir, it is absolutely certain, either that sin is but finite, or that God will not punish it according to its demerits, or that endless damnation must be the portion of the whole human family. Take which horn of this trilemma you please. Suppose, after the example of my learned and polite opponent, I should add, "Hence Campbellism, Mormonism, Atheism, Deism, and Infidelity, never did and never can reform society, but are subversive of it and of all morality, by either divesting the universe of a moral Governor, or denying that he will adequately punish sin!"

18. Your 20th paragraph is mere declamation on the infinity of sin, spiced with a little of Milton's poetic fancy relative to satan's expulsion from Paradise. Suppose we improve it a little. A boy steals an apple! and yet sin not an infinite evil! A girl steals a pin!! and yet sin not an infinite evil!! A youth robs a hen-roost! and yet sin but a finite evil! A man murders his family, and then commits suicide! and yet sin not an infinite evil!! Sir, the bare statement of these relative sins, the smaller and greater, is a sufficient refutation of the monstrous notion of the infinity of sin.

19. When you show wherein I have disjointed, distorted, and violated the contexts from which I quote, it will be time to notice this charge of yours. I deny that I have perverted or misapplied Scripture. But I freely acknowledge that I consider God the Father alike of Turk, Jew, and Gentile, and that all are not only allowed, but required to address him as such. But you would orphanize creation, deny that God is the Father of all spirits, and forbid needy, lost man to address him as such. In other words, you would tell the sick man he must get perfectly well before it will do for him to call on a physician.

20. You accuse me, paragraph 22, of maintaining that punishment annihilates itself. The charge is groundless. Sin is a disease: Christ is the physician; punishment is one of the various kinds of medicines he administers to cure the patient. When the disease is removed, he ceases to administer the medicine. Whether he administer judgments or mercies, they are alike medicines of his prescription. Again, you say I "make the effect destroy its cause"—"suffering, the effect, destroy sin, its cause." I grant it, if by this you mean that by the sufferings he experiences, the sinner is brought to repentance and reformation, like the prodigal, so as in future to avoid sin. As God says, Jer. ii: 19, "Thine own wickedness shall correct thee, and thy backslidings shall reprove thee"; and as David says, "Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now have I kept thy law." If your charge embrace any other or different idea from the above, I deny its justice.

21. Did you, Sir, ever violate any known law of God, and afterwards by obeying it find peace, and happiness, and salvation from your former guilty disobedience? If so, why not allow that others may do the same, either in this or any other world? Are God's character and government the reverse in another world from what they are in this? Or does death dissolve the tie between the creature and Creator?

22. Your 28th letter came to hand more than a month behind its time. Will you oblige me by informing me on which of our four propositions you intended it to apply? I thank you for the compliment you undesignedly pay me in comparing my late letters to mortar in mason work.—That article serves not merely to fill up space, but is essential to the strength of the wall. And permit me to hint to you, dear Sir, that a little mortar in your own wall, might prevent its tumbling to pieces, as it does, by its own weight. But your materials being so very miserable, you have need that the mortar should be exceedingly well tempered.

23. I thank you for the many valuable quotations your letter contains from the Bible. I as devoutly and firmly believe all those scriptures as you do. And Universalists quote many of them much more frequently than your or any other denomination do, in proof of the absolute certainty of punishment, and of their distinguishing sentiments on the subject. There is not in the whole, a single text that militates against the final holiness and happiness of all men, nor one that favors the merciless dogma of endless wo. Nine-tenths of them are shown by the most eminent Orthodox Commentators, believers in endless misery, to be in perfect harmony with my views, and the other tenth I can easily show to be so. But as you have made no comments that go to show the reverse, I need not bestow one word here on the subject. Again, Sir, I thank you for the quotations. But as a controversialist, would it not be well for you answer several of my letters and scores of direct proofs of Universal Salvation which yet remain unanswered? This you are bound to do first, before attempting any proof of endless misery. I wait to see you make that effort.

Yours, in all fidelity, D. SKINNER.

LETTER FROM BR. ROGERS.

According to promise we give the excellent letter from Br. Rogers a place in our columns. I sincerely hope he will alter his present opinion of me, and let us hear from him oftener. I have divided the letter—giving all he says so humorously pathetically on the subject of Phrenology, in a separate article—both for the purpose of adding a few remarks to it, and of getting a short article for this number. A. B. G.

Br. GROSH—Being at present on the shore of Lake Erie, and therefore more within the range of your paper than of the STAR IN THE WEST, I am reminded of the claims of my old acquaintance, the MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE, upon my wayward quill. For some reasons, (perhaps for the eminent service they have rendered the cause I love,) I feel it a sort of debt I owe to it and the UNION, to scribble for them when I can find leisure to do so. By the way, a want of leisure is not my excuse for not oftener complying with the demands of this debt—for every body knows that but little leisure is required for scribbling a tolerably readable newspaper article, (and therefore the less excusable they, who, with more of it, and at least equal ability, contribute nothing at all, when their doing so would tend so to increase the variety, and thereby to elevate the character and extend the influence of our papers.) My real difficulty is, that I find so many—so very many things to write about, (which may be their case also,) that it is difficult confining my attention long enough to any one—I lack concentrativeness, I suspect.

And this phrenological term brings me to say a little on that topic. Are you not almost bored to death with it? I confess I am. Somebody says that the cant of Criticism is the worst of all cants; but he could have known nothing of the cant of Phrenology. We have got to be fairly demented on this head—a man can no longer claim an exclusive right to his own cranium, for every conceited oaf with whom he may chance to meet, will set himself to fumbling it, nolens volens. All heads belong now to the public in joint stock. Pocket combs were never more indispensable than at present, and at the same time more useless; for what avails their office of smoothing the hair, when at the next moment it may be toused out of fix, to enable some quack in Phrenology to ascertain the developements? I protest against this kind of foolery—I do seriously—for, fumbling apart, it puts a bashful man out of countenance to be stared at, and scrutinized, and his cranium, the seat of his soul's housekeeping, mapped off into sections, 1, 2, 3, 4, etc., and surveyed like a tract of Congress land by the eye of the speculator. The times have become so truly dangerous, in this respect, that it becomes every man to stand up for the rights of his head; remembering that when one member suffers, the whole body suffers with it.

Thus much in half-sport, half-earnest. In sober truth, my opinion is, that the science of mind can not be truly and satisfactorily established, except on phrenological principles. At the same time, I believe that the craniological details of the science, as laid down in the charts, have been too hastily settled, and too implicitly adopted; and that when the reigning mania subsides, they will be scouted as the chief hoax of the age.

As to the philosophical tendency of the science I am far from sympathising in the fears of those who think it to be to materialism—much less to atheism. With the former it may indeed consist, but it can not with the latter. Why? Because it most clearly takes the anti-atheistic side of the long mooted question, whether certain faculties and propensities are instinctive, or whether in each class of animals they are not the result of early effort and habit, transmitted down to present generations. Phrenology determines—yea, demonstrates that the former is the case; and thereby it adds to the number of natural contrivances by which ends are effected of extensive utility and benevolence.

(To be concluded in our next.)

REMARKS.—I hope the remarks intended for the Correspondents—or rather no-correspondents of our papers, will be attended to, by all who are concerned. Our ministering brethren, especially, who are supplied with periodicals gratuitously by our publishers, are tacitly under obligations to write for them, if they do not render other, and as useful services in their behalf. For our part, I must say, that for a year past, we have been well supplied with communications—many thanks to their writers!—so much so, that a part of the time, we have been obliged to keep some of them waiting a good while. And what is still more to their credit, nearly every one of them has waited patiently—not a growl or grumble did they utter! Heaven bless them.

The craniological details of Phrenology scouted as the chief hoax of the age! Never, Br. Rogers, unless the philosophy of the science is scouted with it. Hast ever read the history of its discovery, brother? If not, permit me to say to you, that Dr. Gall was no system man—even after he had discovered nearly all the developments, he called them by their abuses rather than by their uses; and never thought of classifying them, until Spurzheim came to his aid. The latter made no alteration in the locations adopted by his master; but adopting the details, found that Nature had correctly grouped the organs—that all he had to do, was, to discover the classification existing in the human brain, and adopt it as true. On these details—these discoveries of outward developments, thus heedlessly and miscellaneously named by Dr. Gall, and afterwards added to by his followers, the philosophical portion of Phrenology rests. Take it away, and your philosophy will be baseless—a castle in the air!

As to the "fumblers" of whom you complain, I know of but two remedies—1st, comb your hair upwards from the front, so that it shall bristle up like palisadoes round a fort, and they will as soon think of fumbling a chesnut bur! Or, 2d, get a bust cast of your head, and carry it with you. You can refer your tormentors to it for all information, and either look on at the fun, or retire to save your blushes at their commendations of your large and well rounded nob. A. B. G.

REVELATIONS XX: 12.

"And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened; and another book was opened which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works."

In my former article on this passage I showed that it did not support the common views of a great day of judgment at the end of time—using the term judgment in the too common acceptation. I showed that the judgments mentioned in the Bible were according to works, and not faith, etc., as is the common opinion—that in them God or Jesus comes to earth, instead of mankind going to eternity—that the days of judgment are in time, and not in eternity, where there are no days—that none of the judgment days are ever called the "last judgment," or by any other numerical designation—and that the Scriptures never connect the resurrection to immortality, and language used in strict reference to it, with any judgment day; and showed that the text itself, construe it as literally as possible, directly contradicted the common opinions of a last, final judgment day in the eternal world, in various other particulars. I then promised to show that our text harmonized clearly and entirely with the teachings of all the rest of the Bible on the subject of judgment, the resurrection to immortality, and the eternal world. To this task I now will bend my efforts, and direct your attention.

Our text declares that "the dead" spoken of "were judged" "according to their works." This doctrine is based on the justice of God, as evinced in all his dealings with men—in all his requirements of men, and in all the sentiments of justice which he has implanted in the human heart. To exhibit this clearly, notice

1. They, that is, each one of "the dead" were judged according to their works—they, themselves, and not another for them, or in their room and stead. The doctrine that imputes our sins to Jesus, lays our guilt on his innocent soul, and thus makes him a justly punished sinner in our behalf, is as false as it is pernicious, and as destitute of support in Scripture as it is of sanction in reason and nature. The wise man says, "He that justifieth the wicked, and he that condemneth the just, even they both are abomination to the Lord"—also, "to punish the just is not good, nor to strike princes for equity." Prov. xvii: 15, 29.

2. "The dead" were judged "according to their works." This shows that there is some measure, some proportion—and an exact proportion, too—between their works and their respective punishments. A most righteous sentiment, in accordance with all that is revealed to us, and required of us, of justice and equity. But there is, there can be no measure or proportion between finite works, and infinite punishments. The very nature of the case precludes it. Our Lord said that the knowing servant should be beaten with many stripes; but the more ignorant servant with few stripes—consequently our text agrees with Jesus in teaching a limited punishment; for there can not be few and many, where both are infinite in number; but only where they are finite. The justice which deals out a punishment according to works, is in accordance with the purest mercy; for, as says the Psalmist, "Also unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy; for thou renderest to every man according to his works." Ps. lxii: 12. By "every man" receiving it, God is proved to be impartial in his justice and his mercy. A punishment according to works is also consistent with forgiveness. Hence the Psalmist declares—"Thou art a God that forgavest them, though thou tookest vengeance of their inventions." Ps. xcix: 8. And God himself declared to Moses that he was "the Lord, the Lord God, gracious, long suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin, and that will, by no means, clear the guilty." Now endless sin and endless punishment is contradictory of all these declarations of Holy Writ; for there can be no mercy in endless cruelty—there can be no forgiveness of (i. e. deliverance from) sin, where it is perpetuated and punished endlessly—and if God will by no means clear the guilty, and will assuredly punish every man according to his works, either all will be endlessly miserable, or none will.

3. "The dead" were to be "judged according to THEIR works." They are not to be judged according to the works of another. Consequently the abominable doctrine that God will punish the posterity of Adam, for his sin, and that he will free them from punishment by reckoning to their credit the works of Jesus, are destitute of foundation, if our text is true. And herein this passage of the Apocalypse confirms the teaching of Ezekiel xviii: 1-4, 19, 20—"The word of the Lord came unto me saying, what mean ye, that ye use this proverb concerning the land of Israel, saying, The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge. As I live, saith the Lord God, ye shall not have occasion any more to use this proverb in Israel. Behold all souls are mine; as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine: the soul that sinneth it shall die." See the remainder of the passage referred to.

4. "The dead" were to be "judged according to their works." As before remarked and proved, this shows that works, not faith, election, etc., etc., is to be the test of the judgment spoken of. As the Mosaic Law took cognizance only of outward acts—of works—this confirms our belief that the only judgment spoken of in the Bible, in reference to rewards and punishments, were all to be fulfilled under the Mosaic dispensation. The Christian dispensation we well know, judges according to the intents and desires of the heart—not according to works—hence he who hateth his brother is a murderer, and is condemned accordingly, by the voice of God speaking in his soul, so long as he abides in the moral death produced by his hateful and hating disposition.—But this judgment of our text is a distribution of outward rewards and penalties, according to works, and is therefore under the legal dispensation, which, as is well known was wholly temporal in its jurisdiction. Not one penalty can be found in the law of Moses, relating to a future state of existence—all are confined to this life.—And although this judgment was to take place with Jesus for the judge, yet "the dead" were to be judged "out of those things which were written in the books"—most probably the books of the law.

For these, and other reasons that might be named did room and time permit, I am compelled to confine the passage under consideration to the meaning clearly inculcated in similar passages in other portions of the Bible—and the time of its fulfilment to a period as designated in the Apocalypse itself by the phrases "quickly," "soon to come to pass," etc.

In my next article I shall proceed to show when and where "the dead" are to be punished or judged.

A. B. G.

TO A. CAMPBELL, ESQ., OF BETHANY, VA.

Sir:—You are no doubt aware that a written discussion is pending between your spiritual brother, S. E. Shepard, of Auburn, and myself; and that, while on my part the doctrine of the Restitution is defended, on his part the doctrine of destruction carried out to total cessation of conscious extinction and eternal termination, is set forth as the truth of the Bible. This doctrine of destruction as held by Mr. Shepard, you deem a broad error, having no countenance in the Christian statutes—"a suicidal theory" without foundation. Indeed, you remark in a letter presently to be referred to, that "destructionism is to my mind just as repugnant to Scripture language, right reason, and good logic, as your modified Restorationism or ultra Universalism;"—and also, that from your friends who hold this doctrine, you "expected more good sense." This language is sufficiently strong to show your abhorence of the opinion.

He equally abhors the doctrine of endless misery which you defend as a Christian truth. In one of his letters addressed to me, he remarked, "such are the absurdities into which men must run when they admit the truth of the Scriptures, and at the same time, dispute a doctrine which is as plainly taught, in these writings, as that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God." He not only deems his destructionism as clearly proved as the plainest principle of Christianity, but he thinks that those who deny it must run into "absurdities." Thus it stands—he doubtless looks upon your faith of endless misery as a very great absurdity; though he admits you to be "a man of quick and clear perception, of sound and accurate discrimination, of great research, and, withal, a strictly logical mind"—and you expected of him "more good sense" than to believe a doctrine "repugnant to Scripture language, right reason, and good logic." And yet, dear Sir, A. Campbell and S. E. Shepard, Esqrs., stand in the eyes of the public as associates, spiritual brethren and co-workers, in restoring the "ancient order of things," in establishing Christian truth and practice among professed religionists—even when one holds an absurdity and the other lacks "good sense" in his choice of opinion! If you and Br. Shepard desired to arrive at any given spot in geography, would it not occupy a great time to get there, if you differed as much about the way as you do about doctrine?

In my Letter (No. 6) to Mr. Shepard, I quoted a passage against destructionism found in one of your Letters to Mr. Skinner, (No. 15,) to show him, that if denying his faith led us into "absurdities," his friend, A. Campbell, Esq., had fallen into the error of rejecting it and of deeming it unscriptural. Then speaking of Mr. Skinner's views of punishment, you remark, "I trust it is not what some call absolute destruction—the everlasting punishment of a few of my acquaintance, who affect to think that Nero, Caligula, and Judas Iscariot will be doomed to the destiny of a dove or a lamb! for surely if absolute destruction be everlasting punishment, the greatest wretch that ever lived and the most innocent lamb go into the same everlasting punishment." In reply to this argument, to my great surprise Mr. Shepard quoted the following sentence.—"As you quote the language of Brother Campbell to prove me in error, I will give you a translation of 2 Peter ii: 12, which he has approved. But these, as natural irrational animals, made for capture and destruction, speaking evil of matters which they do not understand, shall be utterly destroyed by their own corruptions." Now, with what intent was this passage advanced by Mr. Shepard? Did he mean, that though you had given destructionism a severe blow in the passage I quoted, yet that in the last passage, you had sanctioned and countenanced destructionism as held by S. E. Shepard? Did he not mean, that though at one time you denied detructionism, yet at another you affirmed it? If he did not mean this, then where is the object of his quotation? If he supposed that you viewed the phrase "to be utterly destroyed," as equivalent with endless misery, of what use could it be to him in refuting your argument against destructionism? It is very evident that he endeavored to destroy the validity of your argument, by exhibiting you as denying and admitting the same doctrine at different intervals; or, in other words, by attempting to make you a hypocrite. No person acquainted with your eminent intellectual acquirements and moral dignity, can for a moment suppose that you would pursue such a course, if he decided in an impartial and Christian spirit. But friend Shepard was cornered by your argument, and hence hesitated not to place his brother in the work of doctrinal reform, in an unenviable position before the public. Under such circumstances, you might well pray, "save me from my friend."

The principal object of this epistle, is, to return you my sincere thanks for that portion of your Letter (No. 30) to Mr. Skinner, relating to destructionism. The arguments are good; and such as my friend Shepard will find it difficult to meet, even with his strange method of syllogizing. You have doubtless watched the discussion between him and myself, and no doubt have regretted that he had not the "good sense" to admit endless misery rather than destructionism, though it must be admitted that the latter doctrine is much more mild and benevolent than the former. But however unpleasant it was to you that S. E. Shepard, Esq., should so wander from sound doctrine, yet you did not wish to come bluntly and openly before him. Therefore, you devoted a part of your letter to Mr. Skinner, to the refutation of destructionism, well knowing that I should faithfully hand it over to my correspondent for his consideration. This has been done, and I hope it will assist in making him recant his error. Perhaps both of us joined, may open his eyes to the "knowledge of the truth," or at least, may convince him that he needs doctrinal reformation, before he can join in the attempt to restore the "ancient order of things." In the meantime, while he is digesting what has already been offered him, would it not be well for you to advance more of the arguments which you say you have at hand against destructionism? Perhaps they will have the desired effect, because your arguments may have the most influence, as you, being a giant of more than twenty-five years study, whirl a great sword of knowledge; while the undersigned, being in your estimation but a boy, can only now and then fling a "smooth stone." All such arguments shall by me be handed over to Mr. Shepard, with many thanks to you for them.

Very respectfully yours, G. W. MONTGOMERY.

Auburn, September 4th, 1838.

SELF GOVERNMENT.

The only absolute monarchy that I am prepared to admit as being based upon principles of justice and propriety, is that control which every man and woman ought to exercise over themselves. It is the complete supremacy of the moral powers. The man who indulges in vice, knowing it to be vice, is highly deficient in self-government. The animal propensities are allowed to gain the ascendency; and in many cases, even to such an extent that the individual seems almost to have forgotten that he is endowed with moral power. Situated as mankind are, in this world, they must frequently find occasion for the use of their self-control, or subject themselves to the degradation consequent upon the practice of iniquity. We can not expect to exercise the moral powers, and at the same time indulge in what we know to be morally wrong. The two can never go harmoniously together. Hence it follows that the more man indulges in sin, the more he violates his moral feelings, and conseqently the less he is inclined to turn from the fancied facinating gaze of the serpent, that he is permitting to coil around the tenderest sensibilities of his soul. To continue long in this situation, may degrade the man so far below himself that he will forget that he has power to shake off his degradation. Such a man is really given over to believe a lie that he may be damned. He has lost sight of virtue, by neglecting to practice it. Having but little practical knowledge of the enjoyment to be derived from self-government, and consequently being unable to contrast his present state, with what it would be if sweetened by the exercise of his moral powers, he concludes that there is no situation in which he could enjoy himself better than in his present.

Mistaken man! And have you no other prospect before you, but to yield implicit obedience to the dictates of uncontrolled passion? Have you nothing to do but to gratify yourself in the most beastly indulgences?—Yes! you have an influence to exert upon society and upon yourself. And that influence will either be beneficial or pernicious, according as you govern yourself. Do you not wish to lead the rising generation into the paths of virtue and peace? Know then, that you can not be instrumental in promoting that desirable object, unless you yourself set the example. Nor can any one. Self-government consists in the exercise of the moral powers. But before a man is control himself or others as he should do, he must have some basis upon which to build his determinations. He must have a fixed principle of righteousness. With this principle let him go forward; let him "touch not the unclean thing." Let this control be absolute. Refuse to yield to temptation once, and it is disarmed of half its power.

This is what I call self-government. It is to give the moral powers and feelings the judgment seat, and to yield to nothing that is contrary to their dictates.

THE EXPOSITOR AND UNIVERSALIST REVIEW.

The 5th number, (mind this, ye who have not yet paid your subscriptions, for the Publishers want the money!) has been received and read with much pleasure. "The Duration of Sin," by Br. J. M. Austin, is a valuable, well written article, based on Phrenological views of human nature, and proving that sin has its origin and continuance only in the animal part of man—that the moral and intellectual faculties when enlightened and active, are in their very nature opposed to it—and that, consequently, when man is raised in the resurrection state, sin will cease, together with the animal propensities that led to transgression. "The Unquenchable fire," by Br. H. Ballou, 2d., is a brief but valuable explanation of this much abused phrase. "Divine Government," by Br. W. S. Balch, is another interesting Phrenological article, showing that what are called the evils of the righteous. (as ill health, poverty, etc.) are but penalties for the violation of the natural laws—while what is called the prosperity of the wicked, are rewards for their observance of the natural laws. It also demonstates that the adherence of the righteous to the moral laws of the universe, produces the purest and highest pleasure, while, for conduct the reverse, the wicked are most severely punished. It is a very valuable article, and should be read by every person who, by reason of not distinguishing between the different kinds of laws in the universe, is unable to justify the ways of God to man. "Orthodoxy against Universalism," by Br. H. Ballou, 2d, is one of the best controversial essays ever published in this work. The article, "Causes of Skepticism," by Br. L. C. Browne, is good as far as it goes, but is cut off rather short—he however invites his brethren to deal out the milk of the subject from which he has skimmed nearly all the cream! The remaining articles—"Remarks on a former article, 'Destroy both soul and body in hell,'" by Br. H. Ballou—"Literary History of the Bible." by Br. M. H. Smith—"Grounds of Universalism," by Br. H. Ballou; and "Change in the Jewish doctrines after the destruction of Universalism," by Br. H. Ballou, 2d, are all good, though, except the last, not so interesting to my mind. Br. M. H. S. errs in stating the various readings at 30,000:—they amount nearer to 130,000.—His eulogium on the common version is rather greater than facts will warrant. As to its originality, since the publication of Tyndale's, every one can learn whence King James' translators borrowed it.

The number is closed by two articles from the pen of Miss Edgarton. I have praised her so often, that I am determined to mention her once without saying how much I admire the articles from her pen.

The Expositor is certainly improving, (if we except the last unfortunate number,) and must be sustained by writers and readers. The number before us is worth the subscription price. One number more closes the volume.—Who will be without it? Remember, that the first volume of the old Series can not now be bought for love or money, and be wise enough, all ye who want this volume, to speak in time! A. B. G.

THE UNION IN QUARTO AND OCTAVO.

Br. Price proposes publishing two editions of the Union, containing the same matter—one in Octavo, at $2.50 per annum, and the other as at present, at $2.00. Those wishing to bind it for future reading, had better take the Octavo edition. If they think so too, let them give notice immediately to the Publisher.

The Prospectus for the two editions will appear in our next; but this early notice of it is due to Br. Price, and to all who wish to patronize his highly useful labors.

POETRY

PRAYER.

Go when the morning shineth,
Go when the moon is bright,
Go when the eve declineth,
Go in the hush of night;
Go with pure mind and feeling,
Fling earthly thoughts away,
And in thy chamber kneeling,
Do thou in secret pray.

Remember all who love thee,
All who are loved by thee;
Pray for those who hate thee,
If any such there be;
Then for thyself in meekness,
A blessing humbly claim,
And link with each petition
Thy great Redeemer's name.

Or if 'tis e'er denied thee
In solitude to pray,
Should holy thoughts come o'er thee,
When friends are round thy way;
E'en then the silent breathing
Of thy spirit raised above,
Will reach his throne of glory,
Who is Mercy, Truth and Love.

Oh! not a joy or blessing,
With this can we compare,
The power that he hath given us
To pour our souls in prayer.
Whene'er thou pin'st in sadness,
Before his footstool fall,
And remember in thy gladness,
His grace who gave thee all.

THE SLANDERER.

There is not a wretch whom a kind Providence permits to live and move and have his being upon the bosom of this bright and beautiful earth for some wise purpose, although it may be invisible to human eye, so despicable and so mean as he who descends from the proud station where he had been placed by nature, and utter slanders foul and withering as the Simoon of the desert, against those who never breathed a word respecting him but that of kindness. He comes to you with the soothing language of friendship lingering upon his lips—his eye is lighted up with seeming pleasure at the prospect of a speedy and successful termination of some project which you have undertaken—words of condolence and consolation for your misfortunes are ever upon his tongue—he is as humble and pliant in your presence as the frightened dog, who will crouch at your feet at the slightest bidding,—but despite this apparent friendship and servile humility the scrutinizing and accustomed eye can detect the villain beneath the wide spread drapery. That wretch who has managed to ferret his way deep into the secrets and fond emotions of your hea , will pass away from you and go out into the giddy world and his tongue will be foul with the nauseous breath of slander. The words which you uttered in confidence will be repeated to hostile ears, and their meaning distorted—the secrets of your household—the very household whose hospitalities he has so often enjoyed—will be laid bare to the world by the contemptible monster, enveloped around with black insinuations, which the vicious will lay hold of to the detriment if not the ruin of yourself and family. The vile slanderer steals away your very household gods—your reputation with his filthy and fiendish tongue he levels to the dust, and it is generally done in such a manner, and by so contemptible a wretch, that law and justice are slow in overtaking the black hearted abortion. See the pitiful wretch—his very heart—if heart indeed he has—is gangrenous! See him on the crowded thoroughfare: his eye which but now was upraised so proudly, quails beneath the power of your steadfast gaze. His lip is pale and ashy, as if it had been tainted with the black slanders which his tongue has uttered. He affects a stately and upright bearing, but beneath that garb of affected firmness may be detected that fear and trembling which a dastard only feels. Could that heart be read, we doubt not that on its convex surface would be seen engraved in letters of lurid flame, the detested and degraded sentence "this is a slanderer." But that heart can not now be read except through the medium of a practiced eye; but that eye can scan the detested motto even though it is mystified, and wrapped up in a bosom full of guiltiness and deceit. There is far more true judgment in the world than that base artificer of hell-born villany—the slanderer—can imagine; and that judgment must at some period be brought into the field, and teach, or assist justice to wreak its proper vengeance. Justice can not sleep forever, neither will the world forever be blind to the invasions which the slanderer makes upon the bosom of society. By and by judgment must prevail over prejudice, and the fiendish hate of the slanderer be unveiled, and justice be meted to the unpunished villain, who bears the ugly brand of "slanderer" upon his brow.

We have endeavored to draw a hasty picture; but slight and simple though it be, we feel confident that it is not "overdrawn." Some, perchance, may recognize a likeness, although it is but a fancy sketch, but all, we think, may be able to detect the outline of any despicable wretch who happens to intrude upon their peace and happiness in the shape of a SLANDERER.—Columbia Spy.

SCANDAL.

Nearly akin to the slanderer is the dealer in petty and in itself unimportant scandal. Though of itself unimportant, scandal may be justly regarded as one of the most powerful operatives for introducing into families and into the very bosom of society those scenes of strife and discord which seem to unnerve all for the duties of domestic life and the duty which each individual owes to society. There has been, perhaps, more indirect mischief done to the domestic world through the unholy influence of scandal-mongers than from any other cause whatever. Powerful as may be the lever which sets in motion the human tongue, there should also be at work a counter-action in the shape of what is usually denominated discretion—in order that the power of the one may be at least balanced by the judgment of the other principle. But principle in the eye of a vender of scandal is of little account. The parents who gave you birth may be frightened from their affection by the bitter voice of scandal. The loved one of your youth, she to whom you gave the first offering of a heart unadulterated by care or the treachery of a busy world, even that cherished one may be turned aside from her love by the invidious whisperings of a scandal-monger. The friend of your earlier days, he from whom not a thought was held secret,—the voice of scandal may wean even him from you. And, perchance in after days, when industry and perseverance may have gained you a title of reputation—the shadow of a name—if not at home, at least abroad, (for what prophet receives his reward in his own country?)—it is hard to have it taken away from you, even though the name is but a shadow and the scandal-monger termed good. Oh, the thought is bitter—but the shaft may recoil! We pray heaven that it will not.—Columbia Spy.

DR. CHANNING.—The last number of Fraser's Magazine, a work which is regarded as high critical authority in England, contains a highly complimentary notice of the writings of Dr. Channing. The writer commences with this bold and candid assertion:—"Channing is, unquestionably the finest writer of the age. His language is simple, nervous, and copious in Saxon. His periods are short, and constructed without any appearance of effort. His meaning does not require to be gathered, by dint of persevering investigation, from the heart of a cumbrous phraseology; it strikes at once. Nor is this its transparency the result of weakness or want of compass; the very contrary is the case. From his writings there may be extracted some of the richest poetry and original conceptions, clothed in language unfortunately for our literature, too little studied in the day in which we live. Channing appears to have imbued his mind with the spirit of the masters of our island tongue; their very tones seem to have filled his ear, and have become key-notes to his finest compositions; their strong idiomatic English has evidently worked itself into the mind of our author, and taught him that, in the phraseology which weak minds pronounced to be jejune, there was a versatility capable of becoming, in the hands of a master-mind, expressive of great and ennobling thought." The critic again says that "there is a force and finish in the pages of Channing that indicate at once great genius and protracted elaboration;" and adds, "his writings have charmed us into the attitude of fervent admirers." This is high praise, coming from so disinterested a quarter—but we do not disagree with the Fraserian critic in his estimate of the merits of Channing's masterly style.—Pearl.

What we conceive to be failings in others, are not unfrequently owing to some deficiencies in ourselves, thus, plain men think handsome women want passion, and plain women think young men want politeness, dull writers think all readers devoid of taste, and dull readers think witty writers devoid of brilliancy, old men can see nothing to admire in the present days, and yet former days were not better, but it is they themselves that have become worse.

It is with diseases of the mind as with those of the body; we are half dead before we understand our disorder, and half cured when we do.

MARRIAGES.

In Auburn, August 14th, by Rev. G. W. Montgomery, at the residence of A. D. Leonard, Esq., LANSINGH BRIGGS, M. D., Surgeon and Physician to the Auburn State Prison, to Miss ANGELINA, daughter of Allen Warden, Esq., all of Auburn.

In Auburn, August 27th, by the same, Mr. CHARLES BEMIS, to Miss EMILY, daughter of Amos Underwood, Esq., all of Auburn.

DEATHS.

In Centreport, Cayuga county, on the 18th of August, of dropsy, CHARLES A. SMITH, aged seven months and four days—the only child of his afflicted parents. Thus, ere the bud had become a flower, it was strip from the parent stalk to bloom in heaven. May the mourners find their consolation in the Gospel. G. W. M.

In Virginia Settlement, McHenry county, Ills., Mrs. NANCY GOFF, wife of David Goff, aged 59 years, late of the town of Springwater, Livingston county, N. Y. Mrs. Goff has left a large family, a husband and ten children, to mourn the loss of an affectionate wife and a tender and beloved mother. She was of a slender constitution. After an illness of five days, which commenced on the 26th of July last, she continued until August 1st, at 3 o'clock and 10 minutes, A. M., at which time her spirit took its flight to a better and happier clime. It must be a great consolation to her friends and relatives, to know that she was resigned to the will of her Father and her God. She closed her eyes in death without a murmur or a struggle. A discourse was delivered on the occasion by Elder Wheeler, (Baptist,) from McHenry county seat, from Job xxii: 21. W. GOFF.

In Richland, Oswego county, on the 19th ult., after a short and painful sickness, RUFUS GRANT PRICE, only son of Br. Isaac Price, in the 21st year of his age. In the early death of this young man, his parents mourn the loss of an obedient and affectionate child, his sisters a kind and beloved brother, and community an amiable and valuable citizen. His funeral was attended on the 20th and the evidences of a universal resurrection to immortality and eternal life were presented by the writer to the mourning relatives, and a numerous congregation of friends and neighbors from 1 Thess. iv: 13.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 32.—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.

Bethany, Va., August 22, 1838.

SIR—Now that I have learned more fully your character—in your treatment of those who oppose you, as evinced in this controversy, and in some of your other controversies which have recently fallen into my hand, I could not expect that truth could obtain over you a more signal triumph than is manifest from the letter before me. Your manner is well established. All my readers know it. It is not inferred from a few instances, but from every thing of yours that they have seen. It is, indeed the usual manner of a certain order of men. When fairly confuted, instead of thankfully and gratefully acknowledging it, they rise into a paroxysm of rage, abuse, and vituperation. From you, therefore, Sir, I have for some time expected just such a display of disregard of truth and honor, of wrath and bitterness, when I should sweep your whole foundation from under you. And, Sir, let me tell you, that as this controversy draws to a close, as your arrogant and delusive sophistry becomes more and more manifest, I expect you to abound in vulgarity, scurrility, and a universal recklessness of truth and good manners. With a few exceptions, it is the genuine fruit of your system. I care not what you say of me as a disputant: I have been too long before the public to be injured by any thing you can say of me in that character. I have had too many controversies not to know what is due to an opponent; and if I did not think you would pervert it into a new victory, I would tell you that an opponent stronger in assertion and weaker in proof, a greater sophist, a less courteous disputant, a grosser perverter of truth and reason, has not before fallen in my way. But this is but the echo of my readers; and this is what called forth the apology to them, which you have in your 2d paragraph so shamefully perverted. Sir, a few of my readers only have in any form alluded to the controversy; and with one consent they all regretted that I had to endure "such evil treatment" from an opponent so unworthy of a place on my pages. I have generally told them that you were the best sample of Universalian learning, talent, and good manners, which the party had at its disposal.

2. Your first paragraph contains six assertions, not one of which is true. Of five of them the very opposite is the fact. What you say of "disappointed ambition and mortified pride," of "deep bitterness," and "indignant contempt," in your 2d paragraph, are of the same genus. I told you once before, that for the entire prostration of the whole citadel of Universalism, I should claim neither honor nor merit. Who would load a cannon to destroy a baby-house or a spider's web! You are not the person, Sir, to "disappoint ambition," or even to excite "deep bitterness." It requires a man, a full grown man, to do either. Besides, Sir, I am not of the lymphatic nor atrabilious temperament.

3. You need not, Sir, talk to me one word more about Latin or Greek. I have proved you to be wholly ignorant of the genius, construction, and laws of these languages. Your reference to Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, have been already sufficiently mortifying and humiliating to your friends and unfortunate for your cause. To hear you talk of Abner Kneeland and your Universalian Scarlett, on whose skirts I left you hanging, as good authority or as learned men, is too ridiculous for a serious notice. I am, however, pleased that you have brought forward all that Universalists generally rely on, and have quoted all their arguments; so that, notwithstanding your ignorance of these languages, their arguments are fully refuted in this discussion. If you do not like your present standing with the literary world, you must apply to some college for a diploma. However, Sir, I can assure you, unless you enter their classes and study some years, there is not a college in the civilized world will vouch for your knowledge of Greek, Latin, or Hebrew. Unless, then, you want to fill up your pages, I say again repeat to me no more Hebrew, Greek, or Latin. Keep to the English—the King's English, Sir, if you please!

4. You have pondered three months on my last expose of your learned criticism; and what a defence you have made! Without intending it, if any compliment you could give, would be to any man an honor, then you have done my Appendix to the New Version the greatest honor by approving my Notes on the words hades, gehenna, and aioon. So perfectly impartial are they, that you can not find a single fault to them. Nay, you would seem to approve them. But, Sir, you would pervert them in the eye of your readers: for in this controversy I have not once in any instance departed from, or contradicted a single word in those definitions. Yet you would now insinuate, for you can not do more than insinuate, that in some way or other I have contradicted myself. No mortal can show that I have. My alleging that aioon is used indefinitely in the sacred Scriptures, is perfectly compatible with my saying in the same Note that "more than sixty times in the New Testament it is rendered by such words as express the longest duration." Why did you not quote all this note in your letter! rather than put it into another corner of your paper, with comments that I can not reach, as if to blindfold your readers!! How cunning you are to get out of your present unenviable position! You take another portion of your paper and quote and comment on my Notes above and beyond the limits assigned in our Rules. Thus you give your readers nearly three pages extra of notes and comments for the sake of saving you from their contempt in your learned defence of their delusion! I suppose I must now enter into a new contract with you about republishing my Notes and your comments on them!! Really, you are grievously perplexed, Mr. Skinner.

5. You say, paragraph 9, you are "at perfect leisure and liberty to go back to the third or second, or even first proposition, as often as I do." Yes; but not without me. Then keep to the proposition on hand. I have something more important than to be always driving you out of the bush. I wish to occupy the few pages yet remaining of this controversy more profitably.

6. You are now a Restorationist, if I am correctly informed. You contend that after death wicked men are punished for a time in some place. The wicked dead are with you cast into some unearthy hell. This I do call purgatory, a true and proper purgatory. It is a true and proper name. You can not give it a better. If you can, do pronounce it. You have declined answering my questions upon the subject. So far you have declined sustaining your proposition, if my questions are relevant. In my judgment they are so.

7. Because, first, you contend for eternal life, holiness, and happiness, as the ultimate destiny of all men. When, then, I urge in opposition the scriptural fact that some men are neither holy nor happy in this life, and that they are punished after death; that they go into some place or state of punishment, you affirm that they will come out of that state, because that punishment will purge them from sin and make them holy. I ask you then for the scriptural proof; and you refuse to give any, alleging that you are not bound to do it!! I say you are; for having admitted that the wicked are sent to hell after death, you must bring them out of that state, or give up your ultimate holiness and happiness.

8. Because, in the second place, you allege that the punishment of hell expiates sin, which no punishment in this life accomplishes. This peculiarity of your purgatorial punishment calls for special proof. In proving that your purgatorial punishment expiates sin, you must reconcile that idea with Hebrews i: 3; vii: 27; ix: 12, 13, and very many such passages, as intimate that the death, or blood, or sacrifice of Christ expiates sin. If Christ's sacrifice expiates sin, how can the punishment of the wicked expiate it? One of the two is redundant. If Christ's death expiates sin, the pains of the wicked can not do it; if the pains of the wicked do it, Christ's death can not have done it. I say, then, Mr. Skinner, you must prove that your purgatorial pains do expiate sin, or give up your purgatory.

9. Because, in the third place, you allege that the punishment of your prison, or purgatory, (give me a more appropriate name for it, and I will cheerfully use it,) necessarily terminates in holiness or the perfect love of God. Now, Sir, if the wrath of God works love in the human heart, why has not God tried it in this world? Here he uses "goodness to lead men to repentence"—here he displays love unspeakable to produce love in the human heart. Now, Sir, explain to us this new philosophy: two opposite causes produce the same effect. The love of God produces perfect love, and the wrath of God produces perfect love! And stranger still, those hardened by the love of God here, are to be softened by the wrath of God hereafter! You must not explain away this word wrath. Recollect Paul says, "Being now justified by Christ's blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him:" Christ "has delivered us [Christians] from the wrath to come." And Jesus says, "He that believeth not, the wrath of God abides on him," etc., etc.

10. Because, in the fourth place, punishment in this life does not even under its pressure prevent sinning. Men are punished, often punished, as were Pharaoh and the Jews, and yet sinning all the while. Now as you inform us that in your purgatory men will stop sinning when God begins punishing, please name the passages of Scripture which sustain these novel assumptions.

11. You assume, first, that the wicked who are cast into your prison, or hell, or purgatory, will come out. 2d. To prove this assumption you assume that this punishment expiates the guilt of sin. 3d. You assume that this punishment works holiness, or sanctifies all who are the subjects of it. And, 4th, you assume that men will have to expiate the sins of this life only in hell; for that while there they will cease sinning and all become good from the first moment—indeed you make them good and holy the first instant they enter hell: for there they never sin, and only continue as long as to expiate the sins of this life. These are all very extraordinary propositions, and require, if you please, Mr. Skinner, a word of proof—chapter and verse, Sir, if you please. I believe you have twice quoted the Apocrypha in this controversy. I now want a text from the canonical Scriptures!

12. But, Sir, your whole doctrine of post mortem holiness as the result of punishment, is stultified and nullified by your fourth assumption. I therefore print it in capitals—MEN CEASE SINNING AND BECOME HOLY THE MOMENT THEY ENTER YOUR PURGATORY, HOW, THEN, DOES PUNISHMENT MAKE THEM HOLY!! You have yet remaining as much sense as to see that if you do not make them quit sinning when they enter your prison, they never can get out; but you had not sense enough to see that this admission explodes your whole doctrine of the sanctifying tendency of punishment: for they are holy before the punishment begins; and therefore you have made God punish holy beings! To return some of your fine sayings, What a soul-withering doctrine! what a horrid system of nonsense and iniquity is your Restorationism! You had better decline the proof!

13. Another beautiful trait in your system is, that it precludes pardon altogether. There is no forgiveness with your Divinity. You say, paragraph 13, that "God does and will punish every sinner according to the full demerit of his crimes, and there is no escape." These are your own words, and they are the true result of your system; therefore I have italicised them. Then where is the mercy of God—yes, the mercy of God! He punishes without exception, without escape, all sinners; and that, too, according to the full demerits of their crimes. Why talk of mercy, then!! For what did Christ die, if every sinner must still suffer the full demerit of all his sins—if God forgives not one sin? Why did David sing, and Paul preach, "Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered!"—"Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin." With you, Sir, there is no such man—all men suffer in this life all the punishment due for all their sins; or if they do not, they go into your penitentiary, and there they pay the last farthing, and come out without any gratitude or thanks to God or Christ. He is in justice, without mercy, bound to open the prison doors; for they have been punished according to the full demerits of their crimes. Why, Sir, deism is pure and undefiled religion, good sense, good logic and gospel, rather than your Restorationism.

14. It is, Sir, not true—it is, Sir, a calumny of your own invention, when, to revile the doctrine of forgiveness, you say, that "if they will repent and be baptized at your hands, they shall surely escape the threatened death." No, Sir, I never taught so. Jesus says, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved"—from his past sins; and if "by patient continuance in well-doing he seeks for glory, honor, and immortality," Paul says, "he shall receive eternal life." So I preach.

15. My version of your trilemma has, I perceive, thoroughly refuted it. You have confirmed it by making a new one—without point or bearing.

16. You do not state my views, Sir, when you say that "the greatest possible good of the universe consists in the salvation of a minority of the universe," and that "the least possible expense of evil consists in the eternal damnation of a majority." Such a view is not in the premises, and therefore it can not be in the conclusion. What proportion of human kind shall be saved I know not. An immense multitude there will be, when all the days and generations of millennial light, and bliss, and righteousness shall have been completed. This is a poor defence of your system against the drawbacks of all possible bliss stated in my review of your mathematical happy universe, Letter 24, paragraph 24. For any thing that appears to the contrary in my premises, ten to one of human kind may be saved.

17. In conclusion of your letter now under examination, do you not admit a purgatory, but not a Catholic purgatory? Is it a Restoration purgatory? Touching its localities and attributes I renew all my former requests. You say spiritual light is God! and that spiritual love is God! Need I reply? And you say, "In my next letter I shall dispose of the remainder" of (as if you had not yet begun to notice) my letters Nos. 26 and 28. Well, if you do all this in your next, after a reasonable share of abuse, and after telling us the one hundred and first time how completely you have vanquished, confuted, refuted, exploded and disproved every word, letter, and point that I have written, you will have expiated at least one of your former sins of omission. We shall look for it, however, without fear or hope.

18. Having nothing more to reply to, I shall commence an examination of the tendencies of your system. Your theory of a future state—of a penal dispensation issuing in the salvation of all subjected to it, stultifies and nullifies the gospel dispensation to all intents and purposes. The incarnation of THE WORD, the sufferings and death of the Messiah, the ministry of angels, apostles, and prophets—the ordinary preaching and teaching of the word, and indeed the Gospel system of justification and sanctification, of which the New Testament speaks, and of which it is so prominent and efficient a part, are all demonstrably useless and worse than useless on your imaginative hypothesis. If it be true, the Gospel is vain and worse than vain.

19. Let us, then, distinctly state your penal system, and hastily survey its most striking features. Taking into view the whole world of mankind—the Pagan nations, the Turks, the Jews, and all the Infidels—an immense majority, you say, live and die in their sins. Well, now, this overwhelming majority of human kind are all the proper subjects of your penal system, and are all saved in due time by its influence upon them. Hence, of all the inhabitants of this planet for six thousand years, an innumerable majority are hereafter to come forth out of your penal system, pure as the silver from the furnace, holy as God, and fitted for the happy abodes of the eternally blessed. In one word, your penal fires of hell, or your penal system, saves all its subjects—not one of them is forever lost. It triumphantly saves all—Cain, Ahab, Judas, Nero, Caligula, Heliogabulus, the Devil, and all his angels are its splendid trophies. It is, then, decidedly, more powerful, successful, and triumphant than the Gospel: for it is conceded on all hands that as yet but comparatively few of those who hear the Gospel are saved by it. In this first and grand character of the two systems, the Gospel system and the penal system, the latter is incomparably superior to the former—the penal to the Gospel plan.

20. But in reply to this you will doubtless allege that the Gospel is nevertheless not useless, because it saves some from sin and from the penal fires of your purgatory; and besides, it has contributed much to the civilization and temporal prosperity and happiness of the world. Admit all this, and still it is useless and worse than useless; because, in the first place, had there been no Gospel at all, the penal system, seeing it infallibly saves all its subjects, could as easily have saved all that the Gospel saves as it does all that the Gospel fails to save. Indeed those that the Gospel saves would be more easily saved by the penal system than those it fails to save. Now it is useless to employ both a perfect and an imperfect system. The former is sufficient without the latter.

21. But I have said it is worse than useless—because the good that it does here is incomparably more than counterbalanced by the evil it produces under your penal dispensation. We admit all you say of the good the Gospel does here, and still affirm that it is worse than useless; because it is admitted on all hands that the doom of those who hear the Gospel and turn away from it, will be inexpressibly more fearful, woful, and wretched than the doom of the Indian and the Pagan who heard it not. Now as there are more who reject than obey the Gospel, there is a positive accumulation of guilt which will, under your penal system, require a corresponding increase or duration of misery; and thus the alleviation of pain produced by the Gospel here is more than counterbalanced by the aggravation and accumulation of pain and anguish there. So that if the Gospel only enhances the condemnation and misery of two for one it saves, which all must allow, then the increased or protracted punishment of only two millions for example, under your penal dispensation, outweighs the whole gain of the one million saved by the Gospel, who, had there been no Gospel, would, like the devil and his angels and all wicked men, (only still more easily,) have ultimately come out of your furnace—your gehenna, pure as the light of heaven. It is worse than useless in a general system, on the admission of the objection alleged.

22. Let me add, Sir, that if the common views of the present state of the Pagan, Mahometan, and Jewish worlds be correct—that is, if those who are born and brought up in gross darkness as to the Gospel, are liable to the least imaginable quantum of punishment; and if your system of salutary, converting, and sanctifying power of the penal fires of hell upon the soul, be correct, it would have been infinitely better to have suffered all the world to be as ignorant as the Amazonian or the Arabian, and to have sojourned for a time under the mildest chastisements of your imaginative Orcus, and by a shorter passage have escaped to heaven, than to have enlightened them by the Gospel and subjected them to the unmingled vials of divine indignation and the long protracted sufferings under the penal system for the deeper guilt of disobeying the Gospel of the grace of God and slighting the mediation of his beloved Son. This, Sir, on the general scheme of divine government, makes the Gospel rather a curse than a blessing to mankind in the aggregate, and as I before said, stultifies and nullifies the whole remedial system. But, Sir, here I must close before I have finished my picture of the inutility and folly of your system. Now, Sir, in your next, after your regular portion of abuse and of enumerating your triumphs, please notice this point somewhat specially.

Faithfully, A. CAMPBELL.

THE PROPHECIES.

BY REV. W. WILCOX.

Every page of Scripture is stamped with the immutable seal of truth, and no man can examine it without acknowledging a greater miracle in its wisdom and excellency, if uninspired, than any of which the Bible gives us an account. Yet many reject the Scriptures as being the work of man, unworthy the seal of divinity. Hence it becomes us to inquire and search out the cause of this anomaly, in order to see whether it may not be removed. We firstly inquire the cause, and what think ye that it is, Christian friends? Is it that those who reject the Scriptures are more conversant with their pages, and therefore better able to detect falsehood and imposture? This can not be, for I can truly say, that I have never read the writings of a single champion of skepticism, who might be said to have even a tolerable understanding of that volume which he so unreservedly rejects. Nor am I acquainted with one who is able to unfold a correct account of the plan and requirements of the Old and New Testaments. I here speak advisedly, for I know of what I testify, and if any person who rejects Christianity thinks it a hard saying, let him see to it, that we may never have occasion to repeat it. I know that some unbelievers claim to have an extensive acquaintance with the Scriptures, and can very fluently refer to those parts which they imagine to be objections to their sacred character. But can they as fluently converse upon their beauties?—Make the trial, Christian friend, and you will most assuredly see this boasted knowledge vanish as the morning cloud or the early dew.

But some may inquire with regard to the soundness of those objections which are so constantly urged against the Scriptures. And here we find even less wisdom than before. Let us see. First they tell us, "The Scriptures give an overwrought and exaggerated account of the Son of Man."—

"They can not believe a perfect being ever lived upon earth." The next breath they find fault with the Bible for recording the iniquities of the ancient Jews. They tell us "such things ought to have no place in the Bible," and triumphantly ask if we can believe God would have inspired men to have transmitted the account of such horrid outrages to posterity, and very complacently add, they can not. In the first place you find them rejecting the Bible, because it shows you a man without spot or blemish; and in the second, because it describes a wicked man and his wickness, as it truly is.

But is there no way for the unlearned Christian to meet the proud boaster, and to silence him upon the boasted ground of reason? There most certainly is. Leslie, in his Short Method with the Deists, has proved this, as has also Keith in his valuable work upon the Prophecies. These works should be in the library of every Christian, and their contents should be all conned over, so that the Christian always could "be ready to give an answer to every one that asketh of him the reason of his hope, with meekness and fear."

No one will dispute that the Old Testament is a work of very ancient date, and no man of candor will deny that it was written prior to the destruction of Jerusalem. This acknowledged, the Christian has an easy task to drive his opponent from this boasted ground of reason, to that of mere assertion. Read to him Moses' prediction concerning the overthrow of Jerusalem, and the dispersion of the Jews, and will he then reason with you, or will he turn the subject into ridicule, by telling you that these things transpired so long since, he believes nothing about them? But stop not here—read to him the predictions of Moses and the prophets, with regard to the present condition of the Jews—a people scattered, a by word, hissing, and reproach among every nation upon the face of the earth. Read him also the predictions concerning the nations and countries around Jerusalem, and then see the use he will make of his boasted reason. Give him no chance to escape by simply asserting that the prophecies are of a vague and indefinite character, about which but little can be known, for the Christian can read them, and convince the most skeptical that such is not the case. Reader, hast thou any doubts with regard to the truth of Christianity? If so, procure the works of which we have spoken, and see the evidence which those who reject Christianity bring to your aid.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

On the 29th of August, in company with Brs. D. Skinner, A. B. Grosh, G. L. Platt, and B. F. Grosh, I left Utica for Clinton, to attend the annual Examination and Exhibition of the Clinton Liberal Institute.

The friends of this institution will long cherish in grateful remembrance the untiring efforts which Br. S. R. Smith has made in its behalf. When he left this object of his paternal care, to take his post on another part of Zion's walls, it seemed to lament its loneliness. But, God be thanked, the loss which it sustained in his removal to Albany, has been abundantly made up in subsequent changes: since that time, the Rev. T. Clowes, LL. D., in compliance with the request of the Trustees of the Institute, consented to take charge of the Male Department; and, assigning the Female Department to the care of Miss Louisa M. Barker, he now acts in the capacity of Principal. Geo. R. Perkins and F. S. Ellas, A. M., are his principal assistants—both of whom are well qualified for the stations they fill.

The experience of Dr. Clowes in teaching—his affectionate and unostentatious manner—his ardent devotion to the interests of science and literature, and his undoubted talent and extensive erudition, must soon secure for himself a worthy name among us, and an enviable station in the world. And a liberal community, we confidently trust, will not suffer his benevolent exertions in behalf of the rising generation, to pass unrewarded. If we have rightly judged of his character, parents may safely entrust to his care the instruction of their sons and their daughters, and rest assured, that while their minds, under his direction, are expanding with useful knowledge, their hearts will be duly impressed by his examples and his precepts, with the genial principles of virtue and of piety.

The Principal of the Female Department, Miss Barker, is eminently qualified for directing in a proper channel, the more pliant minds entrusted to her charge—for inculcating the principles of morality, science, and literature. In this department, Miss Amelia Stebbins performs the duties of music teacher. Here, too, moral and mental improvement go hand in hand. This is right.—What is the latter without the former?

At 7 o'clock, P. M., the female exhibition commenced. The church, in which they met for the occasion, was filled to overflowing. A laudable desire to please was manifested by the scholars in all their performances; and it must be gratifying to them, as well as to their worthy teachers, to know that they had the good fortune to give general, if not universal satisfaction.

The exercises of the evening were introduced by Dr. Clowes, in a short, comprehensive, and appropriate prayer. This was followed by music from the choir, in the words "O sing unto the Lord," etc. Next were the original compositions; first, by Miss H. Hawkins, subject "Love of Country;" 2d, by Miss H. Carpenter, on "American Forests;" 3d, by Miss S. Tracy, on "Simplicity," and 4th, by Miss J. E. Barker, on "The Influence of Beauty." Miss Underwood, from whom a composition designed to show "Woman's Obligations to Christianity," was expected, was necessarily absent. This was a subject of general regret. As a whole, these productions were good, very good, and creditable to their respective authors. Particularly was this the case with the last two that were read. And it requires no ken of prophecy to foresee that the authors of these compositions will soon be ranked among the most valuable female contributors to our literary and religious periodicals; such, for instance, as the Ladies' Repository, Magazine and Advocate, Universalist Union, etc.

After the compositions, we were entertained, very agreeably, by the recital of several select pieces, which had been committed to memory. All these were well spoken, but some would have been better understood, and consequently better received, had the audience made less, or the speakers more, noise. The addresses, and the piece entitled "Love and Hope," delivered by "that miniature woman," (as Br. Skinner called her,) Miss C. L. Barker, were received by the audience with an enthusiasm corresponding in degree with the merits of the speaker. This little lady, by her modest appearance and graceful movements on the stage, secured for herself many flattering compliments, which I may not repeat. I can not say that I was pleased with the spirit of the article entitled "The Bride." But it was well spoken. And I might perhaps express the sentiments of some others by saying the same of "The Soul in Purgatory," by Bulwer. The author's ideas were forcibly expressed by the speaker, but what were their moral tendency? The "Colloquy," written by Miss L. M. Barker, and styled the "British Queen," contained many valuable hints, and had the desired effect on the audience—it made them smile with an "open countenance."

The Exhibition of the Male Department was equally interesting and creditable to those young men who participated in it. Their exercises were more protracted than those of the females, and partook more of the masculine manners. Let the authors of these orations be actively engaged in the acquisition of useful knowledge, and soon their light will shine over the world, reflected in every direction by the literary page. I would rejoice to see those on "Slander" and the "Eloquence of Sympathy," grace the pages of the Magazine and Advocate. The New Military Band from Utica, honored the Institute with their services on this occasion, to the great satisfaction of those who listened to their performances. At the close of the exhibition of the students, Br. G. W. Montgomery, in an able and appropriate address, on Education, delighted the audience for half an hour.

Thus have we briefly alluded to this interesting scene, which gave us such delight, that others may participate somewhat in our joy. And in concluding our remarks on this subject, we beg leave to call the mind of the liberal portion of community to the interests of this important institution. Amidst the thousands in our State, who despise the sectarian principles inculcated in most of the literary institutions of our country, can not a sufficient number be found who will contribute something for the support of this one, in which the youthful mind, untrammelled by creeds which have their origin in "the wisdom of this world," may expand with useful knowledge, without being, from day to day, bathed in the sluggish waters of religious error? It is time that Universalists aroused to a sense of their duty to themselves and to their children. If they commit the untutored minds of their tender offspring to the care of errorists, for instruction, let them not complain if they are impressed with erroneous views of the divine character, the administration and final result of the all-wise government of God, and are rendered miserable by the views which, under these circumstances, they imbibe. But instead of entailing such miseries upon them—miseries which flow from early imbibed errors, let them, in obedience to the dictates of parental affection, secure for them the advantages of a school designed purposely for such as love the broad, anti-sectarian principles of the Gospel of Christ—let them secure the advantages of the Liberal Institute for their children.

And let ministers throughout the State, or throughout the United States, exert themselves in procuring books to replenish the library belonging to the Institute, and inducing parents to reap the benefits of it, by sending their children there for instruction. Its venerable Principal and his worthy Assistants, need their aid to support them in their arduous task. They can render these servants of the public much valuable service, and through them secure to the rising generation an invaluable blessing. Let us, then, as ministers of Christ, yield implicit obedience to the dictates of philanthropy and religion; and, as far as we can, subserve the interests of mankind, by promoting the welfare of this nursery of science and literature, let us be diligent. T. D. Cook.

Note.—The above brief and correct description of the exercises, and appeal in behalf of the Institute, was unintentionally passed over. It should have appeared last week.

I have made an informal but earnest request for several of the orations spoken by the young gentlemen, through one of their number, and hoped, ere this, to have been able to solicit those named of the young ladies. But, alas, many cares drive form before them! May we not hope for them on this public request?

PASSAGES FROM THE DIARY OF A WORKING FARMER.

VI. Franklin's mode of spending his time, and his choice of an epitaph is very much to my mind. An independent farmer is, of all men, most the master of his own time. In his Familiar Letters we find this account of his manner of life:—"For my own part, at present, I pass my time agreeably enough. I enjoy through mercy, a tolerable share of health. I read a great deal, ride a little, do a little business for myself, now and then for others, retire when I can, and go into company when I please; so that the years roll round and the last will come, when I would rather have it said, he lived usefully, than he died rich." Franklin, I wish a century had not divided us!

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1838.

1 THESS. IV: 13-18.

If the apostle commiserated the condition of those Gentiles who, when they were parted from their friends by death, could not indulge in the fond hope of meeting them again; how much more would he sympathise with those Christians whose faith permits them to receive the doctrine of a resurrection, but at the same time gives to this article of their belief an edge more keen to wound, than it is powerful to heal! If those are to be pitied who have no certainty of a future meeting with their friends, how much more so, those who fear that their future meeting may be only for association in rival guilt, mutual enmity, and endless wo!—how much more to be compassionated, those whose gloomy creed gives room for fear, that they may meet their nearest and dearest in a future state only for a moment—only to hear them curse their fate, their friends, and their God, and then to see them hurried by the vengeful ministers of Almighty ire into a fiery furnace where they shall weep and howl for years unnumbered, yet never be able to obtain one look nor act of mercy from their worse than inhuman—from their relentless foe. If Paul so much compassionated those parents, those sons, those daughters, those husbands, those wives, whose unhappiness, at separation, consisted in the dread of annihilation, in the fear that their hours of sweet and social intercourse were never to be renewed, as to take up a portion of a brief epistle to banish such fears, and implant more consolatory views, what pains would he not now take to expose the fallacy of those views which harrow the feelings of thousands of timid and credulous Christians? With what pathetic persuasion, with what pitying remonstrance, with what force of scornful exposure of error, with what earnest and eloquent enforcement of truth, would his tongue and his pen abound!—Travel-worn and fatigued, in season and out of season, we would hear of him at every sick-bed, every funeral meeting, in his circle, expounding the ways of God to man, imparting consolation and hope, banishing gloom and despair, and urging all to confidence and to resignation in the arrangements of heavenly Goodness. Earnest, eloquent, persuasive, would be his appeal to the reason of man, and the truth of God, against this false, this melancholy, this maddening creed of a corrupt form of Christianity.

It is evident from the tenor of the remainder of this passage, that there must have been other differences in the state of sentiment prevailing among the inhabitants of Thessalonica from the existent opinions among us, besides the one to which we have just been alluding. The doctrine of a resurrection was new to the Gentile world, and much confusion of idea regarding it, from the novelty of the conception, and the mixture of ancient fancies, seems to have prevailed among those to whom it was first announced. From the 15th, 16th, and 17th verses of this chapter, we may logically infer, that the Thessalonians, and probably many elsewhere, were of opinion that those who were alive at the coming of Christ were more certain of being noticed and taken with him to his kingdom of glory and power, while many of the dead, if not all, might be neglected and passed by. What Paul says regarding this prevalent misconception, would not be repeated or addressed to us, were we the persons to and for whom he was writing; for no opinions among us require any such correction.

The common version and commonly received interpretation, favor what we deem a gross perversion of the meaning in verse 14th. "Those that sleep in Jesus," is the erroneous version, and the doctrine which it is supposed to favor is the equally erroneous one, that God will only admit into his society those who are said to have fallen asleep in Jesus. The true meaning is guessed at by Doddridge, and thus given by Wakefield.—"For, if we are persuaded that Jesus died and came to life again, then must God through Jesus bring with him them also, that are asleep." The plain and general meaning of the preposition dia, through, not in; the correspondence of the Improved Version with Paul's doctrine of the resurrection, particularly in 1 Cor. xv: 13; and the intention of the passage in which this verse occurs, all go to demonstrate the impropriety of the common, and the justness of the version given above. Paul intended to furnish topics of consolation to bereaved friends, and to those also in the prospect of death; but what comfort could be extracted from the doctrine of a partial salvation, and of the resurrection of a few to life and the society of Jesus?—Had we no other reason but this one to suspect the common version, and incline us to that of Wakefield, it were sufficient, alone. But the other two considerations are equally valid as proof, and equally satisfactory to those who can appreciate them.

We can not quit our present theme without more distinctly indicating the manner in which we extract consolation from the doctrine of immortality. It is this alone which is presented as a source of consolation to the Thessalonians by Paul; he says we shall live again, but of future happiness or unhappiness he does not directly speak. We should therefore be unfair, and, to our extent, injurious expounders of Paul's writings were we to countenance the idea, too prevalent, that only those can take comfort from this address of Paul, whose departed friends were, by general consent, such as were fit for the business and the joys of heaven, and that all connected with those whose characters were here very imperfect, are debarred from the pleasing hope and consolation presented by the apostle.—For another reason, also, we would speak more plainly. We can not lend ourselves to encourage any one to hope for happiness complete and unmixed, immediately after death, for all men. This prospect neither reason nor revelation authorizes; and it is not necessary to the consolation of bereaved and mourning friends. In the words of Channing—"to anticipate a higher existence whilst we neglect our own souls, is a delusion on which reason frowns no less than revelation.—Dream not," he continues, "dream not of a heaven into which we may enter, live here as you may. To such as waste the present state, the future will not, can not bring happiness. There is no concord between them and that world of purity. A human being who has lived without God and without self-improvement, can no more enjoy Heaven, than a mouldering body, lifted from the tomb and placed amidst beautiful prospects, can enjoy the light through its decayed eyes, or feel the balmy air which blows away its dust."*—On these accounts we are prompted to say, what we believe Paul himself would say, if permitted to explain his meaning, that it is consolation enough for any man to know that his friends shall continue, in all future stages of their being, under the protection, care, and discipline of the Heavenly Father, the wisdom and beneficence of whose government are evident even now;—that if the departed have been increasing in intellectual and moral vigor while here, they will continue, probably accelerate, their progress in the future state;—that for those who have made no improvement in virtue in this world, kind and wise arrangements will be provided in future, which will melt them to repentance, and secure their return to their Father, their duty, and their happiness: and that assuredly the aim and purpose of all the arrangements of the Ruler of Heaven regarding his intelligent offspring, is to secure their progressive improvement, and their ultimate felicity. Compared with the darkness of doubt, or the dread of annihilation, is not the prospect of being under the kind and fatherly discipline of Heaven during all the future stages of our existence, a consideration full of comfort, fraught with all the pleasures of a reasonable hope? Immortality is a consoling doctrine; to the benighted of Paul's day peculiarly so; to us, whose prospects the orthodoxy of the present day would blacken and becloud, it is no less so. "Wherefore," in the words of Paul, "comfort one another with such considerations."

"THE WICKED SHALL NOT GO UNPUNISHED."

No biblical declaration is more clearly demonstrated by experience than the above. Observation impresses this truth upon our minds, in the most forcible language—a language equally open to all. "Though hand join in hand the wicked shall not go unpunished; for he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done, as God will by no means clear the guilty." There have been instances, it is true, of crimes of the deepest die, having eluded pro tempore the search of justice, but time has never yet failed to bring to light those deeds of darkness and death. We are constantly meeting with examples verifying this assertion in the public journals of the day.—Though men endeavor to evade the truth of this declaration, they must, eventually, come out and acknowledge their error. They will learn that "to be happy they must be good," to live in the enjoyment of peace and tranquillity, they must be innocent—no thoughts of moral turpitude must oppress them—no dark, deep, daring deeds enter their nocturnal reveries. "The wicked are like the troubled sea, which can not rest; whose waters cast up mire and dirt." Peace can not be their heavenly companion. If we would be happy, our thoughts must be pure and virtuous—not associated with evils for which blood can not atone, and no repentance wash away.

When will men learn to be governed by the declarations of God, and not by the affirmations of their brethren? When will they learn to be guided by that doctrine of rewards and punishments, which is confined to this life alone, not deferred to an infinity of ages to come? When will they remember that sin, like the poison of the venemous serpent, brings a punishment adequate to its quantity and quality, magnitude and strength; that no sincere sorrow, no true penitence, can in any wise avert the inevitable consequences which are sure to follow the commission of evil; and above all, when will they cease to teach their fellow-men, the flattering dogma, that whatever may have been their conduct through a long series of years, if they repent ere they die all is well—that a sacrifice is hereby offered, good and acceptable, and ample atonement made? If there is any thing that will encourage the sinner to continue on in his course of wickness and crime, the doctrine of future rewards and punishments is that thing calculated to do it.

MORAL COURAGE.

Moral courage—I was just narrating a tale by way of illustration, but tales are wearisome—the lesson is best learned from the moving school around us. In this mass of intelligence how manfully it sits on the brows of some; how to be pitied are those in whom it is wanting. It is the constituent of a man, a freeman; without it he is but a slave; he is in manacles stronger than brass or iron; his mind is enslaved. Of all servitude, mental, moral servitude is the most galling—sinks its subjects lowest, for it destroys that elemental attribute which distinguishes man from all else animate. But unlike all other bondage, its subjects are the first to boast of their freedom, and fancy the very chains that bind them, their gayest ornaments, and their clanking, the sweetest harmony. I see about me the favorites of nature—favorites, for they bear the choicest gifts—who shrink not to tread the mazy windings of science, who love to wander with astronomic vision, away to the starry worlds, or plunge to the depth of metaphysic philosophy, who are proud of the name "freemen," and would repel with scorn and indignation the charge of cowardice; yet to public opinion, to popular prejudice, they bow in meek submission! Samsons they are, shorn of their locks—ay, they are deep in mental bondage. Many, very many of them I esteem for their virtues and admire for their noble qualities, and uncourteous will seem the expression from one fallible like themselves; but on religious subjects I have marked their course, and here I must say they do not, they dare not think for themselves. Not that they do not think as I do, but they do not think, investigate, at all: they adopt the opinions of their fathers, the creeds that popular prejudice sanctions, and call it presumption, heresy even, to question their validity.

One of the rudest of the rude storms the trumpets of endless wo ever gathered, has just spent its force on this devoted community. Noble, daring, generous minds have been crushed by the terrors sounded by the notorious K. Yes, they were terrors "terrible as hell!" yet terrible and monstrous as they were, these minds, that on other subjects would act so energetically and gather strength with increasing opposition, yielded to public opinion, and, swallowing the whole, prostrated themselves by the effort. One, once the ornament of the social circle and with literary attainments of no ordinary grade, acknowledged that he surrendered his reason in the act, and was borne along by the impulse of feeling. O, the power of sympathy! Another, an amiable classmate, heard the parable of the rich man and Lazarus interpreted as literal fact—he arose when the preacher called the vote that "that night's effort had utterly overthrown Universalism!" Yes, my friend that eve voted with the preacher, and then bowed at "the anxious seat," as he said, "to show the world on which side he stood," and the next day he went and purchased the Presbyterian Confession of Faith to learn the creed he must defend!—his parents were Presbyterians!! But why multiply examples! The mass of mind around me in its vacant stare at the mysteries imposed by clerical declaimers and enforced by the stronger ban of public opinion, proclaims in audible tones, that MORAL COURAGE is wanting to scan those dark mysteries with reason's eye. Once let their minds be free as their bodies—then might they see through the clouds of mythologic fiction, and behold religion pure and amiable, shedding her cheering radiance over a benighted world to make it glad unto salvation. Then might these tears of anguish be followed by sweeter tears of joy, and these unearthly sobs and groans give way to raptures of delight, and earth enjoy a foretaste of heaven.

The weary duties of the day were being closed by religious exercises. I was marking the cheerless countenances around me, and tears did trickle down, for the rude one, fanaticism, had been here, and rung the knell of a lost world to their terror stricken souls. Our worthy and esteemed President arose to offer his evening petition to Heaven, for the flock committed to his watchful care. His closing sentiment yet sounds on my ear, and I would it could sink deep in the young hearts of those who heard it—ay, be written there in letters as enduring as time, and resound to them in after years as they go forth to the world to lend their labors for good or ill:—"MAY THEY DARE TO BE WISE: MAY THEY FEAR GOD, AND NO ONE ELSE."

Union College, July, 1838. ELLA.

I owe Ella an humble apology for the delay in publishing the foregoing. It was preceded by a general article, and not perceiving that this one was local, after reading the introductory remarks, it was filed away with the other. But I hope that the delay has given time for thought to those "captives of delusion," and that those of them who may see this article, will feel its force, and obey its dictates more readily now, than they then could have done. Moral courage—it is the attribute of humanity only—without it, man is but an intelligent animal. A. B. G.

UTICA, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1838.

LETTER FROM BR. ROGERS.

The remainder of this letter, (with the exception of an isolated extract already published,) follows, and is well worthy a perusal—and more, a consideration that will lead to a consistent practice. I have taken the liberty to add a few remarks at its close, not to oppose its leading principles, but to detach from them a few useless adjuncts, which may clog them in the minds of some of our brethren.

CHURCH ORGANIZATION.—"Union is strength." That is a trite truth, but not the less a truth for its triteness. Union, however, without organization, is as the union of particles in a mass of sand, which a breath of wind will blow apart. I think, too, that the union will be closer as the laws which govern it are the more strict. We may thus account for the strength and durability of the Methodist body. Small secessions from it have occurred at different times, it is true; and of these new unions, on more lax principles of government, have been formed; but they either have all come to nothing, or been re-absorbed in the parent church—and even the Radicals, although they started with a very fair portion of strength and talent, do not, by a great deal, prosper as the old church does—in the ratio of their talents and advantages (1). My maxim therefore, is, that the rigorous, is preferable to the lax extreme, in church—and indeed all popular governments. I say popular governments—of course, then, I will be understood as not wishing for any other—but I do wish for one as rigorous as may be, consistently with that principle.

If ever a people were suffering for want of organization, we are that people. We have not even a standard hymn book—three are extant, a fourth, a tenth, a twentieth may be issued, and the travelling preacher must drive a cart, for the purpose of having with him one of each kind in use (2). If difficulties arise between brethren, how are they to be settled? Both appeal to the public, as the case now stands, and they each gain a party to their side of the quarrel.

"Well, well!" I think I hear you impatiently exclaim, "it is easier to point out faults than remedies." It is so, I grant; but still the remedy here is not very difficult, I think. First of all, each society might be instructed to choose delegates to the Association within which it is comprised, with express reference to the framing of a code of rules for association and society government—each Association might send delegates to the State Convention for the same purpose. In State Convention let the delegates thus accredited, enter upon their important trust in good earnest. Let the session be prolonged, if necessary, in order that the business be well accomplished. (Let the preachers be well seen to by the legislators, in this case—for they have always needed more watching than any other class of persons.) The code thus formed might be experimental for one year; at the end of which, such amendments as might be seen necessary, could be adopted, or alterations made—after which it would be the law for the Convention, Associations, and societies, (or to speak collectively, the church.) of Universalists throughout the State, and a strict conformity thereto should be the price of fellowship to both preacher and laymen.

Is the above a good proposition? I care not whether it is or not: the fact is, that I only thought of it as I wrote it; my object being to make a beginning. I have so made it, let others, of more legislative skill, take up the clew and follow it out to a consummation of that desired object. I shall be most happy, and I promise in advance, that be the form of government what it may, (so it may be strict enough,) I will be a most obedient subject—even though it tie my feet, and compel me to confine my labors within a restricted sphere. I rejoice to find that the brethren in this part of the State are quite alive to the necessity of church organization—they feel that there can be no permanent prosperity without it.

You are against the eucharistic observance, Br. Grosh (3). We disagree then, for I am for it most decidedly—not, however, as a matter of obligation, but of utility. Man always needed external symbols to aid his devotions. The general tendency of these, I know, is to degenerate to superstition—but better so than that we verge to frigidity in feeling—and to skepticism in faith. And think you that Universalists can ever be made to think, that this or that observance is indispensable as the price of divine favor? This you are aware is the basis of all superstition. * * * * * *

Organization, then—strict organization—a leaning, in practice, to puritanism, rather than to rationalism—such outward rites as will serve to refresh the memory as to the leading facts in our faith—churches in which the visiting preacher may reckon on finding some Universalists—and in which, too, when a preacher is not present, lay brethren may be found both able and willing to lead in religious worship—laws which shall compel each minister to fulfil his obligations to the church or churches to which he ministers, and which shall oblige them to fulfil their engagements

NOTES.—(1). I differ from Br. Rogers here. The despotism of the Methodist Episcopacy, however strong it may be, (and its greatest strength is the ignorance of its laity generally,) is beginning to decline. Its ratio of increase is certainly less than that of other denominations—less than that of the population of the United States—whether the Radicals are increasing, or not. Indeed, for the years 1836 and '37 it has lost instead of gained, by some thousands, by its own admissions.

(2). This is unnecessary—let each congregation supply the minister with a hymn book, during his stay with them. At all events, I hope our denomination will never be so foolish as to attempt erecting standards in literature, unless they can render them as progressive as the minds of the people, and as varied as their wants.—Overgrown Book Establishments are a curse to the liberties of any denomination, and are not necessary to a good and efficient organization.

(3). This is so vague that it may be taken for more than I am willing to allow. I am not opposed to others celebrating the eucharist as a merely commemorative rite, and in an appropriate manner and spirit. But I am opposed to making it a requisite to church membership—to enforcing it as obligatory on Christians, by command of Jesus—as a necessary part and parcel of Christianity. Those who thus enforce it, do more to prevent its general observance, than those who directly oppose its observance. They keep up the superstition which has caused many to abstain from it, who would be willing to celebrate it as they celebrate the birth and the resurrection of the Master. At present, I confess myself to be thus driven to abstaining from it. I have never partaken of it, and possibly never may—but I have never opposed any one's practicing differently.—On the contrary, I aided, however little, in providing for its observance in the church in this city—and in every society I have aided in organizing, I have urged the introduction of a clause in the Constitution, which would secure to those who wished it, the privilege—the right of observing it, whenever they thought proper.—Can all those who are so zealous for it, as to urge it as a part and parcel of Christianity, prove their liberality toward us who differ from them, by similar acts? If they can, and if they will, whatever may be our differences of opinion, there need never be any differences of feeling among us. We can be one in general sentiment—one in fraternal affection—one in charity and liberality—and with heart and hand can go for strict organization, church discipline, and equal rights. A. B. G with him, etc., etc. These are the measures for which I contend—they seem to me to be called, and to be all that is called for, to secure an ultimate, rapid, and overwhelming success to our cause. The impressions of their necessity among the laity of the West, is becoming deep and wide—God grant it may, ere long, lead to simultaneous action toward them!

CHRIST-IANS.—The denomination so nicknamed, once nearly overspread the whole State of Ohio. The suddenness of their up-growth and the rapidity of their spread, was a cause of serious alarm to the churches termed orthodox. But what has become of this once numerous sect? It has utterly vanished from these parts—the places that once knew it, now know it no more. I know of but once society of the kind—one puling and languishing society, within the bounds of the entire State! How shall we account for this mushroom durability of the sect? Were its preachers particularly wanting in ability?—or in moral character? Were its doctrines particularly objectionable? or were its members in any marked degree deficient in Christian charity, or rectitude of life? No, neither of these was the case. The true solution of the matter is, that this sect was never strictly organized—even its doctrinal principles were never well defined. Some attempts towards these ends were made, but in too late a stage of its decline to avail it much. Thus it has happened that this new-light in Christendom has been snuffed out.

As near akin to that sect as cousin-german at least, is the denomination nicknamed CAMPBELLITE. It is trying to gather up and save the scattered fragments of its short-lived relative. (There is small profit, methinks, in transfering cider from a burst barrel to a leaky cask!) Time was, when this sect also was much more rife than it is at present, in Ohio. Several of our preachers attached themselves to it. (and, in the estimation of its great high priest, they, of course, were at once metamorphosed into gentlemen—for he has never met a Universalist preacher who was such.) Like its prototype, this sect starts up with much suddenness on new ground, and spreads for a brief space with great rapidity; but, alas! it is like "the morning cloud, and the early dew," it soon "vanisheth away." I could wish it otherwise—I could, sincerely—for there is much that I like in this people. I could name some of our preachers in this region, who, previous to the pending controversy—Campbell versus Skinner—were so strong in their leanings toward this sect, that their formally connecting themselves with it would have occasioned no great surprise amongst their brethren, but they are now cured of that, and content to stay where they are. One of them told me, himself, in relation to said controversy, that he was never more surprised in his life, nor more—— ah! I bethink me, that I am, in some sort, a party concerned in this matter, and that it behooves me to be silent about it while it is pending. Well—to take up the thread where I broke it off—this people are as short-lived as were their defunct neighbors, the Christians—and without doubt from the same cause, for (as before remarked) they have much that is good among them—much, both in doctrine, and in spirit. But they want a better organization and so do we! We, to be sure, on account of the almost self-evident nature of our tenets, may endure longer without it than they—we have so endured, and are increasing in numbers and moral power continually, but not by any means, as we should if we were more strictly organized. Therefore a closer, more systematic, and better regulated union amongst us, say I. I hope you will say the same, and that it will be echoed and re-echoed throughout our wide-spread and wide-spreading denomination, until the sound shall give place to the substance—and the talking about it to the doing of it.

Br. Grosh, in two years from this date, if it please God, there shall be an Association organized in the south-eastern section of LOUISIANA, including NEW ORLEANS. It shall be my object within that space, to get up several societies and churches, within the territory named; and have it supplied with several good preachers; for, believe me, it is as good a field for Gospel culture as I have found in the whole course of my ministry, it is so, more especially, on account of the highly intelligent and generous character of the inhabitants generally. To meet the No's. of the MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE in that remote quarter, was like falling in with an old friend—I enjoyed that pleasure at the residence of my valued friend, Major Parmele, who, with his amiable family, is a staunch and intelligent co-religionist of ours. Ere I close my long-winded epistle, I will take the liberty of stating an incident, and of propounding a deep metaphysical problem thence arising.—The incident is briefly this. A rat, mistaking the naked toe of a drunken man for a piece of pork, or some other equally dainty edible, took a mouthful out of the same, which occasioned a highly inflamed sore, resulting in mortification; insomuch, that it became necessary to cut it off in order to save the poor fellow's life. Such is the fact.—Now for the problem. As the bite of the rat occasioned the man much pain, and the loss of his toe forever, did not the mischievous quadruped commit an infinite sin? Adieu—may God bless and prosper you! Amen. GEO. ROGERS.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS....NO. VIII.

"When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through dry places, seeking rest, and findeth none. Then he saith I will return into my house, from whence I came out; and when he is come, he findeth it empty, swept and garnished. Then goeth he, and taketh with himself seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there; and the last state of that man is worse than the first."—Matt. xii: 43-45.

Let it be observed, that the human body is compared to a house, swept and garnished, and that into this house the evil spirits went. But what are the spirits? Many suppose that they were demons or devils, who took possession of the heart and corrupted it. But nothing is said in the passage about devils, and if there was, it would not prove that there were actually such demons; for such an opinion belonged to the Pharisees, who believed that insane and epileptic persons were possessed by the spirit of some departed individual, which opinion, our Saviour admitted for the time being, because he knew, that to combat every private notion was useless; for after he should have succeeded in establishing the great principles of truth, he saw full well, that those opinions would sweep away every minor erroneous opinion as a matter of course. It is necessary, however, to prove this now.

It is a well-known fact, that nothing was more frequent among the Jews, than personification of principle. In the Proverbs of Solomon, we find wisdom personified as a female, and represented as speaking and warning simple people. So Paul personifies death; "O death! where is thy sting," making him a monster, stinging the human family. So in the present passage, evil is personified and represented as walking, and taking companions, as entering the heart. It appears to me, that our Saviour intended nothing more than this—a man commits wrong, he makes a resolution to do so no more, he sweeps his heart and conduct clean from iniquity, but his resolution is feeble and can not long resist. Hence the evil is represented as concluding, after endeavoring to find another place, that no habitation is better fitted for it than the one it last possessed. Nothing could better exhibit the consequences of a weak resolution; for if an individual, after having once resisted temptation, yields to his besetting sin, he lets in seven other sins, for no act prepares the way for swifter destruction, than broken resolutions; it seems to open the floodgates of vice in the heart, and to destroy shame more rapidly.

We now inquire, in what application did our Saviour use this plain fact? From the context we learn, that he was engaged in conversation with the Jews, and that this language was used in express reference to them, for he says, "even so shall it be to this wicked generation." By the spirit leaving a man, the partial renovation of the Jewish people was intended under the preaching of John the Baptist, who came as the forerunner of Christ, to train the hearts of the children to their fathers, preparing the way for Prince Messiah. By the return of the spirit with seven others, is intended the relapse of the Jewish people into wickedness, through the influence of the Pharisees, whose examples and teachings led them to reject the Messiah, and to cry out, "crucify him, crucify him; his blood be on us and our children." They were garnished and prepared for all iniquity; consequently, their latter state was worse than the first, when John the Baptist came. And they wilfully continued to wax worse and worse, notwithstanding the tears, the efforts and the warnings of the Saviour, until the Roman Power was poured upon Palestine, sweeping away the chosen people to the endurance of that "everlasting punishment," in which they have wandered for eighteen centuries, about four hundred years longer than they enjoyed the "everlasting possession" of the land of Canaan, or the "everlasting priesthood."

This is obviously the true application of the passage. But upon what an important principle it is based—the futility of weak resolutions and the necessity of strong resolutions. Had the Jews been firmly resolved to keep out the spirit of evil, after it was once out, and not permitted its entrance, which paved the way for seven others, but embraced the Saviour and followed his advice, they would have escaped the unmingled horrors which befel them. But their resolutions were broken, and they fell.

It is necessary that resolutions should be cautiously, and understandingly made, and with a proper view of their bearing. And yet, whenever we are in the wrong, we should make a resolution to refrain from it. The profane should watchfully resolve to refrain from taking the name of God in vain. And there is so much evil from the use of ardent spirits, so much misery arising from it, so many fine men destroyed by it, who are capable of being the first men in community, so many families broken up by it, that I devoutly wish every person would make a solemn resolution to break from the habit, and submit to the evil no longer. And if such measures could destroy the evil, I could wish that there was not a distillery in the world—and I am sure, that if such an example would influence those who are ruining themselves, it would be worth while for all of us to make a resolution, not to drink anything stronger than tea or coffee. And I do not believe that there are any believing the "restitution of all things," who would refuse to do this, if convinced that it would be instrumental in saving those who are now rapidly dropping into the vortex of dissipation. And it is worth our while to inquire of our own hearts, whether it would not be best for us to do this. Let every one be persuaded in his own mind. But of one thing we should be cautious—whatever good resolution we make, we should adhere to it; for to make a resolution which is correct and proper, and then to be fickle and depart from it, is but preparing our minds for seven worse evils, and to make our condition more feeble than it was before we made the resolution. We must then not only resolve to depart from all evil, but we must "watch and pray," lest we depart from the resolution. G. W. M.

REVELATIONS XX: 12.

"And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened; and another book was opened which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works."

In my last article on this passage I showed the nature of the judgment spoken of in the text—that it was accordant with all the ideas of justice taught in nature and revelation—that each one of the dead was to be judged, and not another for them—that they were to be judged according to their works, and not with a punishment bearing no proportion thereto—that such just punishment was merciful to the punished, and consistent with the forgiveness of their sins—that they were to be judged according to their own works, and not by the imputation of Adam's sin or Christ's righteousness—and that they were to be judged according to their works, and not their faith or any thing else. From this latter feature I argued that the judgment was to be under the "covenant of works"—under the Mosaic law, and not the Gospel—and must therefore be temporal. I am now to show where and when the dead are to be thus judged.

Where will "the dead" be judged according to their works? I beg the reader to remember, that owing to the highly figurative nature of the book, I do not feel at liberty to apply to it as being of itself sufficient proof of any doctrine—that hence I am compelled to resort to the other portions of the Bible for information and proof; and having found it, to construe all in the Apocalypse in accordance therewith. In this manner I shall answer the question—Where will "the dead" be judged according to their works?

Our text says, before God—the New Testament generally, says, before the judgment seat of Christ. These two phrases mean the same thing. God hath committed all judgment to the Son, and rules, or governs, or judges all through and by him. Hence the question recurs again—where is the judgment seat?

Our Partialist brethren say, in eternity—we say, on this earth—in this dispensation. Remember that Jesus said, "For judgment I am come into this world"—and in every case where judgment is spoken of, the judge is represented as coming to the world, instead of people going to him. "Now," says Jesus—"now is the judgment of this world." Peter says, "for the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God." "For the Son of man," says Jesus, "shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels, and then shall he reward every man according to his works."—When! The next verse will tell you—"Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom. Matt. xvi: 27, 28. "Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give every man as his work shall be."—Rev. xxii: 12.

The passage in 2 Cor. v: 10, so often quoted by our opposers in proof of their views of a last judgment, if read without the words which our translators have added without authority, is decidedly in agreement with these passages. It reads in the common English version—"For we must all appear [Greek—be made manifest] before the judgment seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." The italicising is the same here, as in the Bible, as the reader may see by examining for himself. Now leave out the words in italic, which have been added by the translators who deemed them necessary to make sense, and you have the text as Paul wrote it. "For we must all be made manifest at the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things in body, according to that he hath done, whether good or bad." That is, as the other passages I have quoted declare, that in this mortal body he may be judged according to his works, whether they be good or bad.

In short, every passage, when read in connexion with its context and parallel passages—every passage of Holy Writ that speaks clearly and plainly of a judgment—of the judgment seat of God and Christ—of rewarding men according to their works, represents it as in this world, in this state of existence. Why, then, must our text be applied to eternity, so contrary to all similar passages, and even to other declarations of this book itself? Why, in short, should any part of this book be applied as proof positive of any doctrine relating to the eternal world?

This exposition and application of the text may be objected to, because of the phrase "the dead, small and great." I admit that it was the dead—not the naturally dead, however—still less those who had been naturally dead, and were now alive in immortality—but the spiritually dead—the morally dead—the dead who slept "in the dust of the earth," spoken of by Daniel—the dead spoken of in John v: 28, 29, some of whom had, then, already, as Jesus declares, "passed from death to life"—i. e. life in the Gospel—even the eternal life which consists in knowing God, and Jesus Christ whom he has sent. And my views of this and all similar passages, receive strong confirmation, not only from the Scripture doctrine of judgment in the earth, according to the works—but also from the Scripture doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. I say, then, that the common opinion of a day of general judgment, and the sentencing of a part of mankind to endless misery, at the end of time, can not be true, if the doctrine of the general resurrection, as it is taught in the New Testament, is true. The Scriptures can not contradict themselves. No two truths can be in direct opposition to each other. If I, therefore, show that the doctrine of the resurrection is opposed to the common views of our text, as I have shown that those common views are not taught in the Bible, you will admit, I think, that those common views are erroneous.

Jesus in speaking to the Sadducees of the general resurrection, is so far from connecting with it this notion of a final judgment for works or faith (and surely he would have told these unbelievers of it, if any!)—that, in fact, he excludes the possibility of its occurrence. Read that whole triumphant argument for yourselves, and what constitutes its force? See Matt. xxii: 29-33, and Luke xx: 34-38. The phrase, "those are accounted worthy"—can not relate to moral merit or deserving; for after we have done all we are commanded to do, we are but unprofitable servants. We can not deserve even what we receive in this life; much less an eternity of bliss.—Dr. Franklin has, therefore, well observed, that he who would ask a large farm as the reward for giving a cup of cold water to a thirsty traveller, would be modest compared to him who should expect an endless heaven as a reward for the good works of this life. Besides, we are expressly assured that "eternal life is the gift of God—not of works lest any man might boast," etc. But even admitting that it relates to moral deserving—it then excludes from a resurrection, all others—consequently, they remain in a state of death. For all that are raised, are to be equal to the angels—where, then, is the day of general judgment and endless condemnation? But the phrase "the worthy," probably relates to desert in the scale of creation—thus embracing all intelligent beings to the exclusion of mere animals. "Ye are of more worth than many sparrows," said Jesus to his disciples. Hence, construe it as you may, the doctrine of the resurrection, as taught by our Saviour, effectually refutes the doctrine of a final judgment and endless wo.

Now turn to the treatise on the resurrection as taught by Paul, and you will not find the least hint on which to infer the popular notion of a last judgment. On the contrary, you will find him excluding the possibility of such an occurrence most emphatically. Read carefully 1 Cor. xv, particularly verses 21 to 28, and see if Paul mentions any thing about a day of judgment taking place at the resurrection. Is there any better place in the Bible in which to introduce so important a doctrine, if true, than along about the 24th to the 28th verses?—If there is, where is that place? But read, also, verses 42 to 49, and 52 to 54, and examine, as you proceed, what grounds can be found for connecting the commonly received doctrine of a final day of judgment with this stupendous and glorious event. There are none—not a lisp—not the most distant intimation, even, of such a concurring event. On the contrary, by this chapter we learn that, in the resurrection, all who die in Adam, all men, are to be "heavenly," "new creatures in Christ," "incorruptible."

The Bible is full of testimony to show that God judges men in this life according to their works—while there is none to show that he judges any thus, in eternity. The New Testament uniformly teaches that the judgment seat of Jesus, and all judgment by him is in this life—while there is no testimony whatever to show that he will thus judge men in the resurrection state in eternity. The doctrine of the general resurrection, so full and explicit, not only is not connected in any wise with such a day of judgment, but effectually excludes it. And every use of the words corruption and incorruption forbids the idea of such a judgment, and expressly declares it to be in this life. Take as a mere sample, the following with the many already quoted, and that could yet be quoted had we time. Gal. vi: 7, 8—"Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption—[there is no corruption in the resurrection—no flesh there—for this corruptible will put on incorruption]—but he that soweth to the spirit, shall of the spirit reap life everlasting."

I have thus examined the text, and shown the erroneousness of the construction put upon it—its agreement with the Scripture doctrine of judgment in the earth, and its harmony with the doctrine of the general resurrection. As I have a request for the explanation of the succeeding context, that is, the remainder of the chapter, I will defer further remarks on it, until I enter upon the explanation of the following verses—which will probably be next week.

Reader, may God lead us into the knowledge of all truth. A. B. G.

POETRY

For the Magazine and Advocate.

Br. GROSH—The following "lines" by an esteemed friend and sister in the faith "which is every where spoken against," were written sometime last year, on seeing in the Magazine and Advocate, an article headed "I love the West." They were not designed for publication, but they have a breathing of poesy, which is calculated to awaken kindred emotions in the hearts of those of our faith, who have broken the ties of early associations, and come to "gather flowers, bright flowers" in the "Western Eden;" and it would be doubly gratifying to me, as well as to many others, to see them appear in your paper. Fraternally yours,

D. K. L.

LINES

On reading an article headed "I Love the West."

BY MRS. MARIA WILLIAMS.

To thee, my friend, who lov'st the West,
My echoing heart replies,
The joyous theme which fills your breast,
Hath wakened kindred ties.
This truth with thee I can attest—
Religion's here—"I love the West"!

Yes! here in western climes we see,
Where'er our footsteps rove,
The impress of the Deity,
Proclaiming "God is love"!
And while this theme pervades my breast,
I'll say with thee, "I love the West"!

The book of nature here we find,
Which volume doth record
A healing balm for every mind,
That trusts in nature's Lord.
With joy and peace our clime is blest—
Religion's here—"I love the West"!

And here are those who dare proclaim,
The Gospel's joyful sound,
Good will to all of every name,
"Through earth's remotest bound!
Such is the faith we hear confest,
Rejoice with me! "I love the West."

This is the faith which heals the heart,
By error's anguish riven,
"Love, joy and peace" this faith imparts
And points the eye to heaven.
This is the faith which fills the breast
Of him who says, "I love the West."

"MY GRACE IS SUFFICIENT FOR THEE."—2 COR. xii: 9.

BY MRS. C. D. DOOLITTLE.

When trials and troubles surround,
While tossed on life's tremulous sea,
How sweet to the ear is the sound,
"My grace is sufficient for thee."

Though sin and temptation combine,
Thy bane and destruction to be;
Said the Saviour and Friend of mankind,
"My grace is sufficient for thee."

Though adversity o'er thee may lower,
And thy path through its shadows may be,
Yet remember that heavenly Power
Whose "grace is sufficient for thee."

Should friends prove unkind and deceive,
And forsaken by all thou may'st be,
Still, still his kind promise believe,
That "grace is sufficient for thee."

Then, child of misfortune, look up
To your Father in heaven, and see
That thy portion of life's bitter cup,
Is a blessing of grace unto thee.

Then trust him in life and in death,
In each he thy Guardian will be,
And in thy last lingering breath,
"His grace is sufficient for thee."

DEATHS.

In Clinton, Mich., July 5th, Miss MIRAM PARKHURST, aged 27 years. She was long a member of the family of S. Bingham, Esq., deceased, formerly of Vernon, N. Y., and died in the house of his widow. Amiable and unassuming in her deportment, she lived respected and died lamented. A member of the Universalist church, she adorned her profession by a well ordered life, and departed rejoicing in the hope of a blessed immortality.—Com.

In Lebanon, Madison county, August 17th, WILLIAM, son of Rev. Wm. M. and Martha A. Delong, aged five months.

Ere sin had touched his infant heart,
Or conscience felt the deadly smart,
His spirit soared to realms above
To dwell with God in endless love.

In New-Berlin, August 10th, Mrs. AMY SHAW, consort of Rufus Shaw, and daughter of Benjamin Medbury, in the 44th year of her age. She was a faithful attendant and singer in the choir of the Universalist society in this city, in its most unpopular days. The faith she thus adopted and professed in the face of a frowning world, was her guide in life and her consolation and rejoicing in sickness and death. She bore her illness with resignation, and welcomed death as a joyful release from mortality and its ills.

In Clockville, Madison county, August 31st, by hanging himself in his father's barn, Mr. LUCIUS BLIGH, son of Epaphroditus Bligh, aged 19 years. Funeral on the 2d inst., sermon by Rev. Charles Randall, from Heb. xii: 10.—Com.

In Geneva, September 7th, of consumption, Mrs. MARIA PRESCOTT, consort of Imley Prescott, in the 43d year of her age. In her life and in her death was manifested the power of that faith which promises salvation to a lost world. It enabled her to bear with uncommon calmness of mind her prolonged sufferings, and stayed her soul in dissolution. The funeral was attended by a large concourse of sympathizing friends and neighbors. Sermon by Br. Zenas Cook. J. B. C.

In Boonville, August 27th, of dropsy on the heart, MERCY, daughter of William and Mary Burgess, aged 14 years. Funeral services the 28th. Sermon by

PROSPECTUS

Of the Fourth Volume of the Universalist Union.

The Fourth Volume of the UNIVERSALIST UNION will commence on Saturday, the 10th day of November, 1838. From the time which the paper has now been before the public, its character and course must be generally known, and little need be said thereon, in entering upon the labors of another year.

It was remarked in the Prospectus of the Third Volume, and may be repeated here, that "the paper has never breathed the atmosphere of excitement, but has rather in all its investigations of the momentous question which divides Limitarians and Universalists, aimed to address the sober, reasoning faculties of man, while a good portion of its labors have been directed to a proper development of the moral influences of its own peculiar tenets, and the upbuilding of the same in the hearts of all who take upon themselves the profession."

The past is the best pledge we can give of its future labors. As heretofore, a portion of its columns will be devoted to miscellany, of strict moral tendency. No effort will be spared to make it an interesting and instructive periodical, creditable to the denomination to which it belongs, and a welcome visiter in the domestic circle. And to this end, its heretofore able correspondents, are respectfully, but earnestly, invited to continue their contributions to its columns. And others are respectfully invited to join them.

The experience of a year or two past, has shown the imperious—the absolute necessity of prompt payment of subscriptions. Hereafter no paper can be sent out to new subscribers without the money in advance, or on receipt of the first number, except the name comes through some known responsible person, or agent, or Postmaster, and then payable within three months.—Those of our present subscribers who have always been prompt in their dealings with us, and to whom we are indebted for the sustenance of our business thus far, we shall always be happy to supply, relying securely upon past punctuality for future transactions. We hope they will one and all stand by us for another year.

In accordance with the wish expressed by several subscribers, we propose issuing on the fourth volume, two editions, weekly, of the Union, one as it now is, quarto form, and another in octavo. This latter has been desired for greater convenience in binding. It will contain the same matter as the present form, and same size sheet, but made up in pages of half the size, giving sixteen pages octavo, to the sheet, in place of eight pages quarto, in its present form. This will be a very desirable form for binding, making a handsome volume of eight hundred and thirty-two pages, octavo, per year; or two half yearly volumes, of four hundred and sixteen pages, each.—The terms, it will be seen, for the quarto, are the same as formerly, $2 per annum, and for the octavo, $2.50.

Should a sufficient number of the octavo edition (to make it an object to issue both) be ordered by the middle of October, 1838, ensuing, we shall publish the two editions—otherwise continue it in the present form alone. Remember, it will be continued in its present form at any rate. Persons, therefore, desirous of securing the smaller (octavo) form, will see the necessity of giving us as early information as possible, through agents or Postmasters.

Agents of the paper, and friends generally of the sentiment it advocates, are respectfully invited to exert themselves in procuring new subscribers and making as early returns as possible.

TERMS—Two dollars per annum, for the quarto edition, and two dollars fifty cents for the octavo edition.—No paper sent out, except as conditional in the fourth paragraph of the prospectus above. Letters should be addressed, (post paid, unless post free,) "Universalist Union, No. 130, Fulton-street, New-York."

A VOICE TO YOUTH.

This valuable work, which has been favorably noticed in the N. Y. Mirror, New-Yorker, the Boston Pearl and Galaxy, and sundry other periodicals, may be had at our Bookstore, wholesale and retail—in cloth, $7.20 per dozen, or 75 cents single; in elegant morocco, $9.60 per dozen, or $1.00 single; morocco extra, $12.00 per dozen, or $1.25 single; Turkey and other morocco, extra and gilt edge, $15.00 per dozen, or $1.50 single.

Those who wish to make presents to their young friends, will not find a more beautiful and valuable gift than this work in these splendid bindings.

Orders respectfully solicited.

THE BIGOT.

BY MISS MARY M. HAMILTON.

It was one beautiful evening in 18—, that Mary was seated in a favorite bower, near her dwelling; the zephyrs gently blew among her silken tresses, kissing her cheek with perfumes from the rose tree and violet; the myrtle beds looked beautiful, surrounded by a thousand flowers that vied with the rich groves of the East for delicious sweetness; while, to add all possible perfection to the scene, the gorgeous king of day had rolled his splendid car far adown the occidental steep of heaven, and was just sinking into a world of waters. Lake Erie lay extended like an immeasurable mirror, its bright surface unruffled by the gentle breeze that stole softly over its placid bosom.

But Mary wept. One would think that amid such delights, the heart could but expand with joy, and drink in endless pleasures at the fountain of divine Love. Such scenes must certainly inspire the susceptible mind with the holiest emotions, and fill the breast with the most devout sensations. Nor was Mary devoid of all the feelings that these would naturally inspire; but her mind was engrossed with a painful subject, and she could not but yield to its impulse, and in prayer and tears, seek for sweet resignation and relief.

In this situation she did not long remain, for soon a form advanced towards her, his eye sadly fixed on the ground, and his mind absorbed in a deep reverie. Mary smiled at his approach, and welcomed him to her retreat, but the penetrating eye of her visitor saw that it was a forced smile; and though closed was the fountain of her tears, yet it was evident she had been weeping. Theodore's mind was less at rest than Mary's: he had come to bid her adieu, and, in a distant section, to seek relief from present ills, by burying the past in oblivion. They were at an early age, betrothed, and in the innocence of unexperienced youth, their vows were pledged, and their hearts yielded up to the shrine of mutual affection. Mary was deprived early in life, of her parents, but had been reared by kind and indulgent friends, and had enjoyed all the advantages which affluence could bestow. Her friends, though kind, were somewhat superstitious; for they were believers in the endless misery of the wicked, and, as a matter of course, she was educated in the same doctrine, and at the early age of fourteen, became an easy victim to an excitement that spread through the length and breadth of the land. Soon she was within the pale of the church, and proud were its members that so bright a genius, and a mind so aspiring, and that bid so fair to be of great utility to them, should be found among their number. Great were their hopes, and in the bosom of the church was she nurtured like a "tender vine," as if some harm might befall her, should she wander abroad. She did not believe in the doctrine of endless misery because she had investigated for herself; for her mind was not sufficiently mature for such a task; but her minister had, and she did not consider it necessary to trouble herself about these things farther than duty was plain. Thus four years passed away, and Mary was still happy as she had ever been—yet it was not perfect happiness. The unending torments of the lost and ruined soul, often recurred to her mind, and her imagination harrowed up her soul with the most horrid scenes that human powers can invent, and suppose to be endured in the world to come. But as her mind became more mature, she began to feel that all was not right. In every object in creation, she saw the love of God plainly manifest, and could it be possible, (she would reason in her own mind,) that a Being of infinite love and perfection, would thus create millions of human souls to exist but for a day, and then sink into interminable anguish? Could it be possible that nearly all the family of mankind were created with the full knowledge, and of course the design, of tormenting them through unceasing ages? But this was not all that staggered her mind. She saw in the pastor of the church, propensities no better regulated than those of private members, and in the private members, minds as carnal and dispositions as evil as in "the men of the world." She saw one of its most prominent females traducing the orphan, and turning with scorn and a deaf ear from the widow. It was true, she prayed long for the upbuilding of the church—for the prosperity of the minister, etc., etc.; but when the multitude did not see or hear, the love of mercy was forgotten. Surely, thought Mary, this is not acting upon the broad principle of benevolence and love!

Her mind was now convinced of the error under which she had labored, and for one year she devoted her whole attention to the study of divine revelation; and at the expiration of that time, she was heard, with the greatest consternation, to make the avowal that she believed in the universal salvation of the world, for God had promised that he would "not contend forever, neither be always wroth, for the spirit would fail before him, and the souls that he had made." The effect of this was astonishing. She had conceived no pleasing result, but yet would not sacrifice her duty, nor the principles of her heart, to worldly interest. She met with persecution on every hand, but remained unshaken. She saw friends forsake—yet one remained that she prized above all, even the Friend of sinners. The love of many seemed to wane away, but One was there who so loved the world as to die an ignominious death for its sake; and should she refuse to acknowledge him or his doctrine, for paltry interest?

But in her weakest hours, when she saw friends forsaking and denouncing her as a heretic and encourager of infidel principles, she could not but almost wish that her mind had not been led to this subject—but then the life-giving consolations of the Gospel, that "all things work together for good to those that love God," would strengthen her faith, and inspire confidence in divine protection.

It was under feelings and circumstances like these, that we behold her among the richest beauties of a Summer twilight, seeming unconscious of all around her, when the well-known form of Theodore approached her. After a sad and prophetic silence, Theodore thus addressed her:—

"The pensive shade that now overspreads your countenance, was not wont to darken your sunny brow in former days. Once you was happy as the gay bird—your spirits as buoyant as the pure air—nothing earthly seemed to obtrude upon your heaven of bliss—nothing transitory could darken the bright vision of eternal joy that seemed ever before you."

"Nor can aught darken this bright vision now," said Mary; "for it is brighter and holier than ever. My mind has been enlarged, and I can more fully enjoy the heavenly emanations of divine love and impartial grace. Though all the powers of earth combine, yet will I not relinquish the precious promises of God to the human family."

"I know," said Theodore, "that you are unwavering in your belief of universal salvation; were it not so, dear Mary, happiness might yet be mine. But now, alas! I see naught but misery or oppression before me."

"What can you mean?" asked Mary. "Do you regret that the lamp of divine love has been lit up in my heart? 'Were it not so, you might yet be happy!' Explain yourself, for I can not endure suspense. Do not hesitate to declare to me the whole truth."

"Yes, Mary, I will be frank, and you shall know the whole. You know my father's original intention of giving me a liberal education, and of preparing me for the ministry. That education, you know, is not yet completed, and I am yet young and under his control. His bigotry and superstition you are no stranger to. No doctrine but that of endless misery, which he hugs to his bosom as avarice does its gold, can be tolerated by him. Once he loved you next to a child of his own; but since he has become convinced of your change of sentiment, he has forbidden me all intercourse with you, on pain of his everlasting displeasure. Our engagement he has long known and sanctioned, and never said aught against it, till of late. I have plead with all the eloquence of affection, that he would not pronounce such a chilling sentence, and thus deny us both of that felicity which, from childhood, as we anticipated, has been accumulating for future enjoyment. But I can not prevail. If I persist, I am cast off as a vagabond, disowned by my parents, and deprived of that education which has been my hope in obtaining a respectable competence through life. If I obey, I am deprived of all that can render life desirable. Can I leave you? Must I—

"Yes," replied Mary, "leave me. Whatever duty bids, that do. Go—be free. Yes, go—bury forever the remembrance of Mary, and"—

"Stop," cried Theodore, "or you will distract me."

"But the Scripture saith, 'Children, obey your parents in the Lord'—and if your father commands, would you not be far happier to obey than to feel that not only a paternal curse is resting upon you, but the disapprobation of Heaven? Go, seek amid stranger hearts, that friendship which I have so long bestowed upon you."

"That will never be; so long as reason retains its empire in my mind, the image of my early friend will never be effaced."

"But go," said Mary—"be virtuous and you will be happy. Embrace 'religion, pure and undefiled,' and your pathway will be illumined by an unfading lamp. Let truth be the lady of your love—defend her."

"You have prevailed," said he, "in a measure: for the present I will leave you; and as virtue is never unrewarded, you will yet enjoy all that is due to intrinsic worth—to unequalled merit. Farewell, dear Mary, may Heaven's richest blessings be yours for time and eternity. Perhaps we shall meet again!"

"Perhaps we may—farewell!"

Thus, by the bigotry and uncharitable spirit of a professed minister of the Gospel, were two friends separated, whose love was seated in the springs of life—whose attachment by him had been sanctioned, till maturer years had rendered it inseparable from happiness, and then blighted by the very hand that had helped to rear it.

Theodore sought a place far distant to pursue his studies, and soon was a member of the Theological Institute at ———. Here two years passed quietly away, save in the heart of Theodore. There, could one have penetrated its deep secrets, could have been discovered the warrings of an undying affection, with the cold and stern commands of a bigoted parent. Those who surrounded him, little thought that his apparent devotion, and sanctimonious countenance, arose from a cause they knew not. They little suspected that the fervency with which he addressed the throne of Grace, arose more from a troubled spirit, than from ardor in the cause which they so eagerly embraced. They little thought that in the heart of this pious and devoted youth, there was vegetating a plant destined to increase in strength and size, till it should spread wide and become a mighty tree, to which thousands would flee from the miseries of fanaticism, and find a peaceful and happy retreat under its broad spreading branches. But so it was: he was not long destined to be illuminated by the blue light that emanated from this institution. He had a mind too benevolent and too well capacitated for divine enjoyment, to exclude a greater part of his fellow-beings from the joys of heaven. He, as might have been expected, began the investigation of Scripture truth, but before he had finished the perusal of the sacred volume, he became a happy believer in the world's salvation. It was now, for the first time, that he saw God in his real character—a being of love. He now too, for the first time, rejoiced "with joy unspeakable and full of glory." In every object of God's creation, he saw marks of his infinite love. In man, who was made after God's own image, he saw perfections which before he was a stranger to. In the sea and its finny tribes—the air and its harmonious tenants—the earth and its variety of inhabitants—its herbage, fruit, and flowers—all afforded him a new theme for praise and adoration to God, of humiliation to himself, and in truth could he say to the earth, thou art my mother, and to the worm, thou art my fellow-being. He saw no distinction between man and man, for they were children of one common parent, and destined for a heavenly home beyond this humble vale. Now the conflict of his mind was past; but a fiercer conflict awaited him from without.

The institution now felt the deepest regret at this circumstance, and was convulsed to its very centre. Some offered up prayers unceasing, that he might be reclaimed from the dreadful error into which he had fallen; while others branded him as a heretic, an infidel, and could hardly refrain from calling down curses upon his head.—Yet was he not daunted. The holy spirit of God nerved him for the conflict, "being girt about with truth, and shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace." He, however, was dismissed from the institution, with letters to his father, informing him that it was contrary to their rules to harbor such impurity.

Sad was Theodore's heart, as he approached the dear home of other days, where the fond smile of parents, of brothers, and sisters, had so oft greeted him around the cheerful fireside, his father's hearth. Now, thought he, the frown will lower on my father's brow—my mother will weep at such intelligence, and all will shrink from me as from an evil genius. He lifted his heart to Heaven, and implored strength from on high to assist him in the most trying scene of all. Soon he was locked in the fond embrace of maternal love; his father greeted him with kindness, and all were happy to see him again. After the greetings were over, he presented the letter from the Faculty of ———, and as he had anticipated, a dark frown beclouded the stern brow of his father, seeming to speak volumes to his heart. The mother, too, the most beloved of all, wept in bitterness. Loud were the denunciations of his father against the whole sect of believers in the impartial grace of God; but Theodore's better angel presided, and forsook him not in the trying hour. He defended his cause with candor and all that energy which would naturally be produced by the defence of a good, but defamed and persecuted cause. Thus passed a short time, and then was Theodore ushered upon the arena of active life, to use his own words, "without a friend to assist or advise—his education unfinished, and future purposes not planned." He who had been nurtured in the bosom of friends, kind and affectionate, now finds it impossible to be happy among them, and is forced from the home of his childhood, unassisted and unadvised, upon the world, to seek among strangers that friendship which might be expected, but yet was denied him at home. The first impulse of his mind was to preach the everlasting Gospel; but then, the dread thought of opposing his father, would intrude upon his mind, and silence the idea; and thus duty and affection contended in his heart, until wearied with opposing spirits within, he vowed in his heart to live for God, and propagate the holy doctrine that plucked him from the deep abyss of darkness and superstition, and illumined his mind with the true and unfading glories of the upper world, where the ransomed of the Lord will meet, and join in one unending song of impartial grace and boundless love.

But, to return to the Summer bower of Mary. After Theodore's departure, Mary did not sink into despondency—the smile yet played upon her lip, and health yet added the rose's tinge to her luxuriant cheek, and contentment seemed to beam from her soft eye with a heavenly lustre. From nature she learned to be happy—this happiness was heightened by the transporting thought, that after having passed through the vicissitudes of life, she would one day arrive in that haven of peace, "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest." She would say, "although storms assail my bark on life's tempestuous sea, yet there they will no more disturb my halcyon rest; though friends that are bound to my heart by a thousand tender ties, are separated from me, yet when the sands of life are run, I shall meet them in that bright world above, where we shall dwell forever in beatific vision; although my hopes are dead, and my brightest anticipations never realized, yet will I not murmur, for

'For earth has no sorrow that Heaven can not heal.'"

Such was the character this amiable girl maintained through every trial, and mark the result.

* * * * *

Years had gone by, and Mary was again seated in the bower near her dwelling—not the lonely and weeping girl as in former days, but the happy and triumphant wife. The same form was by her side, in whose arm hers was interlinked, and in whose society she was enjoying the greatest felicity earth could give. Her eyes were no more bedewed with tears, nor was the smile forced that played upon her sweet face. Theodore had sought her after the above-mentioned circumstances, and found her the same as in years past, save more mature. He recounted to her the occurrences already mentioned—claimed the promise of early years, and led her to the altar with the fond hope, that though sorrow had clouded their young days, yet the joys of their latter days would increase; and though they had been tossed about on the ocean of life, yet now they had found an anchor to their souls, "sure and steadfast"—and a home of their own, where they might sit unmolested under their own vine, and worship the God of salvation in the enjoyment of untroubled affection, the unclouded hopes of pure faith, and in the beauty of holiness.

CONSOLATION OF THE GOSPEL.

The consolation afforded to believers in the blessed Gospel of our divine Lord, was very forcibly brought to my mind, a few days since, while being solicited to attend the funeral of one who suddenly departed "to that world from whose bourne no traveller returns." I felt to rejoice that in complying with the request, I should be enabled to go before the afflicted with a message from Him who spent his whole life for the best interest of the world, calculated to bind up their wounded souls, to heal their lacerated bosoms, and reconcile them to Him who afflicts with a father's hand, and whose chastisements are designed to make us partakers of the divine nature. Oh! the value of the religion of the Son of God, which assures the children of men that death is not their final home, nor that millions of the human race will be everlastingly miserable in the world to come. Let me fancy myself, said I, a believer in no resurrection from the dead, no immortality for a desiring world. I am called upon to pay the last sad respects to a fellow-worm of the dust, and to console the weeping mourners. In addressing them, my language is—"Beloved friends, you are called to mourn the loss of one to whom you have been long and fondly attached—one who has kindly nourished and cherished you; who rejoiced with you in prosperity, and sympathized with you in adversity. But death has cut him down. Soon shall we deposite his earthly remains in the cold urn of the grave. Mourners, you will behold his face no more in this transitory life, and as it respects another state of existence, it is a figment of the imagination. Embrace these exhilerating truths, for they will raise your sinking minds, and incite you to rejoice in the midst of tribulation." What must be the feelings of the sorrowful to be addressed in this manner! Every person of common understanding must know, that instead of alleviating their afflictions, I have made them a thousand times more wretched by endeavoring to imprint upon their minds the dark and cheerless doctrine, that all mankind were ushered into existence to be sometimes in the sunshine, and then in the shade, and finally to go out forever.

In view of this system, Dr. Young, in addressing the heavenly hosts, has well remarked:—

> "Could you, so rich in rapture, fear an end,
> That ghastly thought would drink up all your joys,
> And quite unparadise the realms of light."

Away, then, with a religion that will not meet the wants of man in the hour of grief and mourning. And the system which teaches that some of those to whom we are warmly attached—who are strongly united to us by the ties of nature—have left this world of trouble, only to enter upon one where they will suffer the displeasure of God throughout the boundlessness of eternity, is still more disgusting, and unfit for the ears of the suffering sons of Adam, than the anti-scriptural and inconsistent idea that there is no being beyond this vale of tears. Give us, then, the faith of Jesus. How inexpressibly glorious does it appear beside the above-named imaginations and creeds of men. It affords the delightful assurance that when friends are taken from earth, we shall meet them again in a state of uninterrupted purity and joy, where death can not come, and disappointments harrass them no more, and where "every creature who is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them," shall sing the song of redeeming love—the key-note of which shall never be lost—saying, "Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." PASSAGES FROM THE DIARY OF A WORKING FARMER

VII. For what purpose was this immense continent reserved so long from the knowledge and the incursion of civilized and commercial Europe? Why did the red man so long remain in undisputed possession of these boundless fields of fertility? For what was this vast territory, this fertile soil, these undeveloped treasures and resources—for what were they reserved? Such questions have oft occurred to my mind. Why was this country not settled sooner! If it had, gross darkness, gloomy superstition, and tyrannical sway would have been imported along with any settlers in an earlier age. And when would we have been able to throw them off, had they once obtained a foothold among us? Not as yet, altogether, it appears to us.—Civil and religious freedom had hardly obtained their present vigor and firmness had these fabrics of opposing dominations been to be demolished and bid away. Had not the love of freedom and independence been brought with the first settlers, we might yet have had among us the miserable hovels of degraded, ignorant and wretched serfs, instead of happy cottage homes, and the elegant mansions of our cities; and instead of enterprising, independent, intelligent yeomen, we might have had around us the hard-tasked slaves of a despotic few. I can not resist the fond persuasion that we are another chosen people, and that this land was reserved for the high destiny of being the asylum of oppressed nations, and of taking the foremost rank in routing from the earth the many evils which have so long afflicted her population. In what country, among what people could the cause of truth make such progress, as it has done in this country, among unfettered freeman, since John Murray proclaimed among us the joyful tidings of God's universal love, and man's final felicity.

VIII. Man was made for progress—was intended to make progress—that is, he is surrounded with circumstances which conspire to this purpose. This might be shown in various ways: today, however, I was thinking of the following mode of proving it. Man is not happy unless he is making progress, unless he is improving his condition. Now this unhappiness of a backward, or a stagnant course deters from it. Take two men who are now upon a par as to wealth, but one of whom has been more wealthy, the other less so. Although he who has been more wealthy has expended the most money, and received the greater number of physical gratifications in return, yet who will doubt that he who has advanced from a less wealthy situation, has enjoyed the greatest amount of happiness, and this simply because he has been sensibly making progress. Our enjoyment, most wisely is it so ordered, does not arise so much from the situation in which we may be in, as from a sensible, perceptible, conscious improvement of that condition. Thus all are stimulated, goaded to exertion, the highest as well as the lowest, and it is about equally in the power of all to procure happiness.

UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATIONS—1838.

The Chautauque Association met in Fredonia August 22d and 23d—chose Br. S. Adams, Moderator, and Brs. T. C. Eaton and N. Brown, Clerks—after which transacted the business following.

Appointments.—Brs. Gillis, McDonald and Green, Committee on public services. Eaton, McDonald and Gowdy, Committee of discipline for the year. Adams, Green and Culver, Committee on fellowship and ordination. S. Adams, T. C. Eaton, (ministers,) N. Usher, and R. Green, (laymen,) delegates to the State Convention. Adams to deliver the next occasional sermon.—A. N. Alexander, Carrol, L. Harrington, Westfield, and W. Miller, Dunkirk, Committee to receive letters from destitute societies and places, expressive of their wants, numbers, ability, etc., to sustain preaching among them. Br. Eaton to prepare the Minutes for the press.

Resolutions.—Invited ministering brethren present from other Associations to seats in the Council; and lay brethren present to take part in the deliberations of the Council. Adopted the report of the Committee of discipline—"no complaint." Granted fellowship to the First Universalist society in Portland. Recommended to the societies of the Association to take up collections for the purpose of defraying the expences of delegates to the State Convention. As means of grace in advancing the spiritual interest of our common cause, of cultivating and perpetuating a spirit of devotion and brotherly love among us, and of extending a proper knowledge of the truths and principles of the Scriptures and Gospel of Christ, we would recommend as far as practicable, the establishment of Bible classes, Sabbath schools, social or conference meetings in our respective societies. We would recommend that such societies as are destitute of regular preaching, to meet each Sabbath, or as often as convenient, to spend their time in reading and hearing read sermons, in exhortation, prayer and praise. Where it is practicable and circumstances will admit, we would also recommend church organization in our societies—the observance of the ordinances of Baptism, and the Lord's Supper, and other religious practices that will tend to the advancement of our Redeemer's kingdom of peace on earth and good will to men. Resolved, also, that the societies be requested to give the ministers the time necessary to attend conferences, without deduction of salary.

Ministers present.—N. Brown, Salina; J. Babcock, Hume; J. Billings, A. Bond, Springfield; E. Beals, ———; S. Adams, Carrol; L. Paine, Panama; L. L. Spalding, Morganville; C. Morton, Conewango; J. Todd, Ellicottville; I. B. Sharp, Pharsalia; T. C. Eaton, Dunkirk.

Seven sermons were preached by Brs. Paine, Spalding, Brown, Adams, Bond, and Babcock—Brs. Billings, Beals, Todd and Sharp, taking parts in the services.

Harmony prevailed in Council—the news from societies showed an increase of numbers and graces, and that the cause was onward. A still closer and more efficient organization is needed, and will be attained. It is computed that, notwithstanding the hurrying season, 1000 persons attended the meeting, and filled the house which the generosity of our Baptist brethren opened for their occupancy.

Adjourned to meet in Carrol, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday in August, 1839.

The Steuben Association met at Liberty Corners, September 5th and 6th—chose Br. S. Miles, Moderator, and Br. Queal, Clerk—after which transacted the following business.

Appointments.—Brs. Wisner, Goff and Shattuck, Committee on public services. Wisner, W. Goff and C. Graves, Committee of discipline for the year. Wisner, Graves, and Dr. A. Baker, Committee on fellowship and ordination. Wisner, Van Alstine, (ministers) Goff and Holmes, (laymen,) delegates to the State Convention. Van Alstine to preach the next occasional sermon. Wisner, Goff and Bradley, Committee on Conferences. Wisner, an agent to procure hymn books for the Association. Br. Queal to prepare the Minutes for publication in the Magazine and Union.

Resolutions.—Adopted the report of the Committee of discipline—"no complaint." Resolved, unanimously, to recommend to the brethren every where, and especially of this Association, the adoption of a church covenant and constitution, which may recognize the observance of the ordinances, that those who deem them important may be privileged with their beneficial influence.

Lay delegates present.—C. Graves, Wm. Goff, Howard; L. Shattuck, D. Parmeter, Liberty Corners; H. Smith, L. Bradley, Bath.

Ministers present.—S. Miles, Perrinton; M. L. Wisner, Bath; T. P. Abell, Rochester; W. Queal, Bristol; W. Andrews, Wolcott; T. J. Whitcomb, Victor; D. Van Alstine, Campbell; G. Sanderson, at large; A. Upson, Hornelsville.

The Association adjourned to meet in Kennedyville, on the second Wednesday and Thursday in September, 1839.

The Chenango Association met in North Norwich, September 5th and 6th—chose Br. N. Doolittle, Moderator, and Br. J. T. Goodrich, Clerk—after which transacted the following business.

Appointments.—Brs. Gorton, Perlee and Doolittle, to arrange the services. Brs. Eels, C. S. Brown and Doolittle, committee on fellowship and ordination.—Clark, Brown and Sherburne, Committee of discipline for the year. Doolittle, Goodrich, (ministers,) H. Balcom, and A. Chandler, (laymen,) delegates to the State Convention, with power to appoint substitutes. Brs. Soule, Griswold, Goodrich, Clark, Brown, Finch, Sherburne and Doolittle, a committee to visit every society in the Association, destitute of regular preaching, for the purpose of rousing them to life, and encouraging them to action—also, to visit and preach in other places, and where practicable, organize societies, and recommend such measures to the friends, as, in their judgment, the good of the cause demands—and that said Committee be authorized to divide the whole territory of this Association into eight districts, as may best suit the field of labor to each member of the same. The Standing Clerk was appointed to appoint Conferences on application therefor. Goodrich to preach the next occasional sermon, with power to appoint a substitute. The same, to prepare the minutes, and publish them in the "Magazine" and "Union."

Resolutions.—Adopted the reports of the Committees on fellowship and ordination—"that they had granted a letter to Br. J. T. Goodrich, during the past year, and granting letters to H. B. Soule, and W. H. Griswold, of Oxford." Adopted report of the Committee of discipline—"no complaint." Granted fellowship to the first Universalist societies in Binghampton, and in Colesville, and to the Second society in New-Berlin.—Invited ministering brethren to take part in the deliberations of the Council. Recommended the societies in the Association to take up collections on or before the first Sunday in January next, for the purpose of defraying the expences of the delegates to the State Convention—the amounts thus collected to be forwarded by the Clerks of the societies to the Standing Clerk of the Association, who shall equitably apply the same, keep an account of its receipt and expenditure, and report the same at the annual meetings of this body.

Sermons were preached by Brs. Sherburne, Whiston, Barray, Landers, Clark, Grosh, Potter, M. B. Smith, and (in another part of the society,) Goodrich—assisted by Brs. Delong, Kibbe and Doolittle—Addresses by Br. Potter.

Lay delegates present.—A. Cary, D. Brown, Oxford; J. Kirby, J. Stephens, Bainbridge; C. Per Lee, E. Gorton, North Norwich; C. Rich, E. Blackwell, 1st society, New Berlin; B. Brown, J. Sherburne, 2d do. do.; T. G. Lamb, L. Spurr, Columbus; S. Drew, W H. Bartles, McDonough; S. Eels, Walton; P. Bradford, Binghampton; J. Clark, Upper Lisle.

Ministers present.—L. Babcock, Pharsalia; J. Boden, O. Whiston, Cooperstown; A. C. Barray, at large; C. S. Brown, A. G. Clark, Upper Lisle; W. M. Delong, Lebanon; N. Doolittle, Norwich; T. J. Smith, J. C. Eddy, Winfield; S. Finch, Binghampton; W. H. Griswold, H. B. Soule, J. T. Goodrich, Oxford; J. S. Sherburne, South Oxford; G. W. Gage, J. S. Kibbe, M. B. Smith, Clinton; S. P. Landers, Bethany, Pa.; J. S. Palmer, Brooklyn, Pa.; J. Potter, Fort Plain; A. B. Grosh, Utica.

The Association stands adjourned to meet in Binghampton on the first Wednesday and Thursday in September, 1839.

REMARKS.

We learn from the letters received from societies, and the delegates present, that our cause is decidedly onward. Of the ten societies represented, eight have stated preaching, nine reported that they were increasing in strength, and one, that its condition had not materially changed during the past year. Three new societies were received into fellowship. In no place within our limits has there been a decline of Universalism, during the past season; and we confidently look forward to the future, for still greater zeal and prosperity. Two young men of unexceptionable characters, and good talents and acquirements, received letters of fellowship, which, with the writer, makes three accessions to the ministry, in this Association, during the past year.

The weather was delightful—our friends in North Norwich were hospitably kind, and in the Council, as among all present, unanimity, friendship, and good will prevailed throughout the session. It was a Universalist Association—no bickering, no strife, no enmity gave occasion for "a jubilee in hell," on account of the proceedings of our meeting.

The Gospel was proclaimed in its purity. The unbeliever was powerfully exhorted to reasonably examine the evidence of its truth, and the believer was affectionately entreated to practice its precepts, and be active in its promotion.

The preaching was heard with attention, by a large, and on the second day, an overflowing congregation.—Joy seemed to beam on every countenance, and peace and good will to pervade every heart. We verily believe much good was done to the cause of our Master, and may our energies be aroused, and each, and all of us be duly encouraged to persevere in our exertions, by considering that by so doing, we shall materially aid in ushering in that happy day,

> "When Christ shall reign, where'er the sun > Does his successive journies run."

TO BR. G. MESSINGER, SPRINGFIELD, OHIO.

Dear Sir—For the last few weeks a report has been industriously circulated here, in Bainbridge, and through this region generally, that you have renounced Universalism, and joined the Episcopalians. Our opposers exult greatly, and manifest unusual confidence in the report. As they so obstinately adhere to this story, and are so zealously engaged in its promulgation, our friends have advised me to write to you, that you may inform us, over your own signature, through the Magazine and Advocate, whether you have returned to the beggarly elements of Partialism, or hold fast the profession of your faith, without wavering. THE SUNDAY MAIL;

FOR SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1838.

1 THESS. V: 12-28.

It is said that some, in writing a letter, put the most important part of the business into the post-script. Paul's practical admonitions, at the close of his epistles, may be fairly considered the more important part of the whole letter. In this portion of these ancient letters, which was intended to correct errors in conduct, to give directions suitable to the particular circumstances of those addressed, and to be a directory of conduct generally, we may expect to meet with several advices which have no more bearing upon, or applicability to our conduct, than the doctrinal portion has to the particular state of opinion among us. And it is so. The circumstances which called forth expositions of truth and directions for conduct, are in many cases gone by, and no similar ones exist among us. A knowledge of these circumstances is necessary to understand these letters, and a discreet use of them is our best guide for making a practical application of them to ourselves. An address by a missionary to the first converts to Christianity in a heathen land, might be exceedingly appropriate to them, and yet contain little of any interest to those in such circumstances as ours. We mention these things, because there is a pretty general impression that all the apostolic injunctions are incumbent and obligatory upon us. From the circumstances of those written to, many of these must be inapplicable to us: and from a correct interpretation of these letters, it is evident that the case is so.

We shall not seek, therefore, to apply to ourselves each one of the directions in this paragraph, or bind them upon our consciences as of present and perpetual obligation. We shall seek only to carry away from our meditations upon these verses, strongly impressed upon our minds, some useful lesson or two, of which it were well to be more mindful in our life and conversation.

Meanwhile we would introduce, here, a supplement to our last week's "Mail." After finishing it, we met with the following most excellent remarks in Macknight's Commentary, and in the hope of their impressing many with a determination to employ their time and conversational powers to better purposes than they have heretofore done, we hasten to give it extended circulation. The remarks refer to 1 Thess. iv: 18, and v: 11. "It were much to be wished, as Chandler observes, that Christians, entering into each others' true interests, would banish from their conversation that calumny, slander, folly, and flattery, which engrosses so much of this short, transitory life; and by discoursing of things of substantial worth, endeavor to fortify each other against the snares of life, and those innumerable temptations which lie in wait to ruin us. With what comfort should we meet each other at the great day, (and every day,) were we on that occasion (and always) able to recollect, that in general we had managed our conversation to our mutual advantage." Such would be rational conversation, good for the use of edifying. But where and how oft do we find it?

Had the Christian world adhered to the advice of Paul in the 12th and 13th verses of this chapter, we would have been saved the pain of witnessing a crafty priesthood, and a priest-ridden people. For, ministers of religion would then have been respected only by those who prized the work of moral and religious improvement in which they were engaged, and the respect yielded them would have been in proportion to their sincerity and success in helping us onward in our heaven-ward progress. They would have been respected for their work not for their office. But alas! Paul's admonition has been forgotten, and the world has witnessed professors of Christianity bowing down their intellect and their conscience to the unqualified assumers of the sacred office. Instead of discriminating between the efficient and the injurious occupants of that important office, and yielding respect accordingly, men have too generally given a blind deference to the office, be the occupant who and what he might.

There are other advices of Paul in this paragraph which can not be neglected without incurring evils as great or greater than that just alluded to. We will attend only to those brief ones in verses 16th and 17th.

Rejoice evermore, or maintain a state of constant cheerfulness. If we understand Paul's meaning aright, he intended to say that those who professed the Christian faith had good cause for constant cheerfulness, and that to be consistent professors, they ought to maintain a state of sober and subdued joyfulness. If we do not enjoy this Christian cheerfulness, it is not because there are not abundant sources of it in the "glad tidings" of our Heaven-sent Teacher. It must be because we do not receive the Gospel in its purity, or because we too seldom meditate upon, and realize the cheering views which it presents to us. I have pleasure in adducing in illustration of this, the words of a "beloved physician." Dr. T. Southwood Smith says—"He who believes that a Being of almighty power, unerring wisdom, and unbounded love, is seated at the helm of affairs, and is making every event promote, in its appointed measure, the highest happiness of all intelligent creatures, must possess perpetual serenity and peace. The storm of adversity may gather above him and burst upon his head, but he is prepared against it, and it can not dismay him. He knows that the evils which encompass him are but blessings in disguise. The fair face of nature smiles upon him with a brighter radiance. The boundless expanse of heaven above him, the painted plain beneath him, the glorious sun which diffuses light and life over the ample and beautiful creation, are magnificent gifts of his Father, on which his enlightened eye beholds engraven the promise of his higher destiny.....Indeed a firm persuasion that our Creator is possessed of every possible excellence, that he is our constant and best Friend, that we are entirely at his merciful disposal, that he is conducting us and all our brethren of mankind, by the wisest means, to the highest happiness, and that the natural and moral disorders which afflict us are the instruments by which he will eventually establish the universal and eternal reign of purity and bliss, can not but tend" to produce the most calm and constant cheerfulness. All this the believer of the Gospel in its purity has to tranquillize and comfort him, in addition to the various other sources of rejoicing which a Beneficent Providence has secured to us as the rewards of obedience to the physical, organic, and moral laws of the creation. A cheerless, gloomy professor of Christianity, Paul would not, therefore, recognize.

Pray without ceasing, or be habitually in a devotional spirit. If a habit of devotion is a part of the Christian character, what poor Christians must we conclude ourselves to be if we neglect prayer altogether, or come short, in any degree, of this devotional spirit! If we neglect prayer, we neglect a powerful means of moral advancement; and if our habitual feelings and conduct do not correspond with our prayers, when we do pray, our prayers are a mockery, a vain oblation of lip-service, inefficacious for our improvement. My brethren, we have been censured as deficient in piety, chiefly, we presume, because our devout exercises are less tinctured with an enthusiastic imagination than with a rational thoughtfulness. But while avoiding the insincere and insensate rant of those who have a name to live, let us more carefully avoid the other extreme of the neglect of prayer, undevout habits. This were a worse evil still; still more unbecoming the believers in God's true paternity. We doubt not that our Master, Jesus, expects from us a recognition of God in all his works, and in all the transactions of life—that we should in all our feelings, thoughts and actions, maintain a sense of the Divine presence, and a disposition ever ready to comply with his will.—Ask yourselves if our Master would have us rest short of this. If becoming, let us strive after such habitual devotion, such unceasing prayerfulness.

QUERY.

Is the Gospel the greatest blessing God ever bestowed upon man?

Mr. Editor—Every reflecting mind has, probably, its season of doubt, and skepticism. For my part, I am willing to acknowledge that I have mine. It seems to me something to which human nature is prone; and is doubtless owing to a lack of knowledge, or to the meddling with things beyond our comprehension. With regard to the divine inspiration of the Scriptures, I have not at present any serious doubts. To reject them because they record miracles, would involve me in the necessity of admitting the existence of greater miracles, if possible, than what is there related. So that the most consistent way appears to be, to admit their truth. But there is one thing which we are often told, both in private and in public, and in Universalist as well as in Partialist desks, which I confess staggers my powers of perception, and which I know not how to admit as true, and that is, the query which stands at the head of this article; Is the Gospel the greatest blessing God ever bestowed upon man? This, Sir, is my stumbling block. What is more common than to hear ministers in the pulpit, represent the Gospel as the greatest blessing of God to man? And as superior either to reason or existence, or any other blessing which God has given to us, and that without it, life is but a bitter cup. That the Gospel is one of the greatest blessings of God, I have not a doubt. But that it is the greatest, and superior to all others, is very doubtful to my mind. I will now state some of the reasons why I think that the Gospel is not the greatest blessing. In the first place, I would ask, is not our existence a greater blessing than the Gospel? Of what possible use could the Gospel have been to us, had we not existed. That it would have been of no use, is self-evident. Then if it is necessary for us to exist, in order to obtain the blessing of the Gospel, is not our existence at least as great a blessing as the Gospel? It will not do to say, that without the Gospel, life is but a curse; for that would impeach the goodness of God, for cursing the largest part of mankind with an existence without the Gospel. It follows, then, that existence is a blessing without the Gospel.—Now, does not this fact, added to the fact that existence is necessary to enjoy the blessing of the Gospel, prove existence to be a greater blessing than the Gospel.

Second—Of what use would the Gospel be to man was he not possessed of reason? Common sense teaches all that it would be of no more service to man than to the brute. Well, does not this prove that reason is as great a blessing as the Gospel? And does not the additional fact, that the larger part of mankind have lived, and do live, by the aid of reason alone, and enjoy more happiness than misery, prove that reason is superior to the Gospel? Man can not live by the Gospel alone, without reason, but he can live by reason without the Gospel. If Revelation is superior to all other blessings, why has God been so partial with it? Why has he confined it to so small a portion of the world? Why did he wait four thousand years before he developed it at all? Why did he not bestow this blessing upon all, and take away, instead, their reason, or some other minor blessing? These questions, I confess, I am unable to answer, and hence I have been led to think that Revelation is inferior to reason. Do not misunderstand me. I do not intend to convey the idea that the truths revealed in the Gospel are inferior blessings to reason, or present existence; but that the revelation itself appears to me to be inferior to them. Thus, Sir, have I laid before you my difficulty. And if you, or some of your numerous correspondents can answer my query satisfactorily, you will confer a great favor upon one who is sincerely inquiring after truth. Was I a believer in the horrible dogma of endless misery, it would take but little reflection upon this question to drive me into rank atheism. But believing, as I do, that all men will be made finally holy and happy, I think

I shall never be led to reject the Gospel, though this difficulty should never be settled. For, as I before said, I consider it as one of the greatest blessings God has ever bestowed upon man. I consider it as worthy of the sincere belief and practice of all, even if it had not a divine origin. I esteem it as superior to all the systems of morals ever taught by the greatest and best of heathen philosophers. I think it better calculated to reform the vicious habits and practices of man, to promote knowledge and civilization, to spread peace and harmony throughout the world, and to infuse happiness into the heart of man, than all the combined efforts of ancient or modern philosophy. And I do most sincerely desire, that the hope of immortality which is brought to light in the Gospel, "which is as an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast, and entereth into that within the veil," may become the hope of every man. It will buoy up our drooping spirits in the dark hour, when trouble or affliction assail us, or when the reproach of a frowning world is cast upon us. It will serve to lighten up the pathway to the tomb, and open to our vision the realities of the unseen world. Let us ever cherish this hope. Let us cling to it like the wave-tossed mariner to his shattered wreck, when the huge billows are sweeping over him, and it will waft us safely onward, to that haven of eternal rest, prepared for the reception of a ransomed world. A. F.

Richmond, Va., September 1, 1838.

I hope Br. F. will not deem me arrogant for taking upon myself the liberty of appending to the above, a few additional remarks. In relation to the efficacy and importance of the Gospel, considered either abstractly or comparatively, I have no doubts. Whatever doubts I may have upon subjects beyond my comprehension, I have none upon the high importance of the Gospel.—Like our correspondent, I consider it "one of the greatest blessings" which God has conferred upon mankind.

That reason is a great blessing, all will admit, and that existence is the same, few will deny. But is it a logical conclusion, that because man must first possess an existence before he can enjoy the blessings of the Gospel, therefore existence is a greater blessing than the gift of the Gospel? The fact that we possess an existence, accompanied with other faculties, necessary to the enjoyment of the Gospel, is conclusive evidence that the Gospel was absolutely required to accomplish God's purposes in relation to human existence. It is true, that the Gospel could never have been enjoyed by man, without that man had an existence; and it is equally true that an existence without the aid of the Gospel could never answer the ultimate design and purpose of God in its bestowment. Both are equally necessary and important.

Man's existence, as well as the promulgation of the Gospel, has a starting point, in the order of time, but both existed in the Infinite Mind from all eternity.—Hence the necessary priority of existence proves nothing in favor of either. But even if it did, it would be against the superiority of simple existence. It occurs to me, that the power of distinguishing between right and wrong is a blessing far superior to simple existence, and yet man must first possess life and being before he can have that power; consequently the priority of his existence does not prove its superiority. To argue the contrary theory, would be to support the idea that animal life is a blessing superior to intelligence. This will be evident upon a slight examination. I will say, that man must possess intelligence before he can enjoy the Gospel. Consequently, intelligence is a superior gift and a superior blessing. I go farther. Man must exist—he must have a consciousness of being, before he can exercise his reason or intellect. The conclusion then is, that the most diminutive creature that crawls upon the earth, enjoys the greatest blessing that ever has been bestowed upon man; viz., animal life. Taking this view of the subject, the argument overthrows itself.

That man can not live by the aid of the Gospel alone, and that he can live by the aid of reason, without the Gospel, are truths. But this does not put these blessings equally in a state of comparison. I would say, that man can not live by the Gospel alone, neither can he live by reason alone. Life is simple being, a consciousness of existence; it is a physical identity which distinguishes the creature from the mass of inanimate matter around him; and as such, considered in the abstract, is totally independent of reason or revelation.—Reason is mental existence, and though it partakes strongly of sensuality, it raises the thinking above the instinctive being. But under the influence of the Gospel, the rational being becomes the Christian. Hence, in considering these blessings separately, as mere things, I agree with F., that their negative qualities appear to be equally balanced. But I do not think that the priority of reason or existence proves their superiority over the blessings of the Gospel. On the contrary, when taken comparatively, the respective influence of each upon the other, I think Br. F. will agree with me, that the character of the enjoyment to be derived from the Gospel is decidedly superior to the others. Experience and reason teach man that there are many dangers and vices which he will have to encounter in his pilgrimage through life, which he must guard against if he wishes to be happy; the Gospel teaches him how to pass them unscathed. The influence of the Gospel, then, is capable of placing man in a far higher station, than any other blessing which he enjoys. In this light, I consider it superior to any other blessing conferred upon man. Not that I would depreciate the value of our existence; for it is through that, that we are enabled to enjoy the higher privileges. But I do say that the fact, that the Gospel could not be enjoyed without a previous existence of man, does not prove that existence superior to the blessings which flow from a revelation of God's will. Man could never enjoy that eternal inheritance which is to be the gift of God beyond the grave, unless he first had an existence; and yet that gift will be infinitely greater than any or all the other gifts which he has yet bestowed upon man.

Again, our correspondent asks, "if revelation is superior to all other blessings, why did he wait four thousand years before he developed it at all?" Admitting for a moment, the premises to be true, upon which the question is based, I observe, Br. F. himself, contends that man's existence is superior to the simple revelation of God's truth. Well, how comes it that existence was conferred upon some men several thousand years ago, and upon others not until the present? Or, why is it that Methuselah was permitted to enjoy life nearly one thousand years, and John Howard only sixty-three years? The answer to one is the answer to both. The facts show that it was best that both should have an existence; and they also show that it was best that one should live nearly one thousand years, and the other only sixty-three. God worketh all things after the counsel of his own will.

But I am not prepared to admit that God did wait four thousand years before he developed the Gospel at all. Paul says, "And the Scriptures foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the Gospel unto Abraham, saying, in thee shall all nations be blessed." It seems, also, that a part of the Gospel, viz., the restitution of all things "was spoken by the mouth of all God's holy prophets since the world began." Hence it appears that the Gospel commenced its development in the earliest ages of the world. And the reason why that blaze of light which burst upon the Gentiles in the days of our Saviour, did not dawn upon the inhabitants of the old world and their immediate successors, is found in the fact that they were not prepared to receive it. They would, in all probability, have scorned it, as the Jews did that consummation of Christian evidence, the vacant tomb of a risen Saviour. But the time had come for the full, the glorious development of its power, when, in consequence of the stubbornness of the Jews, Christ turned "to the Gentiles." There he found a few humble, devoted followers. There the influence of his Gospel took effect, and spread onward, and will continue to spread triumphantly, until the knowledge of God shall cover the face of the earth as the waters cover the mighty deep—until every knee shall bow at the foot of the cross, and every heart shall swell with votion and parise to God and the Lamb for ever and ever.

Thus much, brother, have I written upon the subject, not from disrespect for your arguments and opinions, for I respect them, and think them worthy of serious attention, as illustrating how prone we mortals are, in gazing upon the blessings of the Gospel, to forget the numerous other important blessings with which man is distinguished. Nor is it with a spirit of controversy, that I have penned this article, but simply that I also might give mine opinion. A. R. B.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.....NO. IX.

"Hurt not the earth, neither the sea, till we have sealed the servants of our God in their foreheads." Rev. vii: 3.

The question which arises from this passage, is, what is the allusion of sealing the servants of God in their foreheads? This question leads us to quote another passage, having the same allusion. "And there shall be no more curse; but the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it; and his servants shall serve him; and they shall see his face; and his name shall be in their countenance." Rev. xxii: 3, 4.

When the last stripe of punishment was sent upon the Egyptians for detaining the Israelites, and the first-born child of every family was to be smitten with death, the Jews were commanded to mark the lintels of their doors with blood from the sacrifical Lamb, as a seal that the destroying angel of the grave should leave them scatheless. But this kind of seal throws no light upon our subject. In ancient nations, it was the custom for servants to be marked by an iron with the names of their masters, either on the forehead or shoulder. Even to this day, some of the Hindoos mark their foreheads as a sign which of their deities they worship. Undoubtedly the Revelator alludes to this custom, as we shall soon more clearly discover. John was speaking of the Jewish tribes—hence the 144,000 which were sealed as servants, were selected, and comprised 12,000 from each tribe. The angel who spoke, commanded the four angels that had power to beat the earth and sea, to hold still, and not pour out the vengeance, until these servants, who had submitted to Christ, were sealed. Do not the two facts then, that these servants were all Jews, and that some evil was withheld until they were sealed, directly prove, that John was referring to the destruction of the Jews, and the reservation of their punishments, until every Christian had escaped from Jerusalem? This was the opinion of Dr. Clarke, who says on this very passage—"It is worthy of remark, that not one Christian perished in the siege of Jerusalem, all had left the city and escaped to Pella," (a city over the river Jordan). In the 24th chap. of Matt., our Saviour said, "he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved," verse 13. There were various trials attendant upon a profession of the name of Christ, previous to the destruction of Jerusalem, which are often described in the Gospels—such as poverty, persecution, and imprisonments. But the individual who waded through all tribulation, steadfastly adhering to this faith, would and was saved at the end of the Jewish age, when the Roman power deluged Palestine and swept away the murderers of Christ, Eusebius informs us that not one Christian perished. Hence, it will be discovered, that the seal of these 144,000 servants, was, salvation from destruction, which was evidence that their profession to serve Christ was sincere.

Much is said in these days, about the seal of a Christian. But a great many do not seem to know what that seal is—and they too frequently assign it a wrong location. Some suppose that it is lodged in one church to the exclusion of all others—while the seal is made to consist in subscription to a certain creed, not read from the Bible and in its own language, but stated in the language of man, and written in a book which has no sanction from God, while the seal is too often located in the prejudices, and a persecuting spirit which seeks to make all bend to its dictation.

The true seal of the Christian, is faith. "Believe on the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved," said Paul to the jailor. This seal is located, not in the prejudices of man, nor in the passions; but in their foreheads, in their understandings, in the liberality of principle which teaches us to believe for ourselves, and at the same time respect the opinions of our neighbors.—The manifestations of this seal are good works; for the good works of righteousness are the signs of the Christian, and are more acceptable in the sight of Heaven than the most constant worship in hypocricy. It is not the greatest pretension, the best words, or the warmest eloquence, that is most pleasing in heaven—the noblest diamond which ever sparkled on the brow of a Christian, is universal love towards all men, and its sister-gems are forgiveness, justice, virtue and charity. The Christian character is holy. There is something sacred about the man, whose conduct is in keeping with his faith and pretensions. He who is benevolent, pure in speech and upright in conduct, will command a love and respect, which the vicious rogue, though glittering in gold, may labor in vain to produce. And though the wretch who lives in vice, and like the Promethean vulture, gnaws upon the vitals of community, may affect to despise the Christian faith as a humbug, and him as a dupe who professes it, yet, in his moments of reflection, he would give worlds for the peace of conscience which the humblest follower of Christ enjoys. THE SABBATH.

To the Christian, the Sabbath is and must always be a joyful and interesting season. To have the privilege of resting from toil one day in seven, and while the physical powers are gaining strength and energy, and the mind released, measurably, from the cares of earth, to be thus permitted to lift the heart in secret and social prayer to God, is certainly a high and inestimable privilege. We can not, perhaps, fully appreciate the value of that constantly recurring day of rest, but let us reflect upon it a moment. Let us imagine ourselves deprived of it awhile. Deprived of the privilege of worshipping God, or liable to be disturbed in our devotions every moment, by the unfeeling and impious; compelled to labor day after day and week after week, the mind distracted by a thousand cares and perplexities, and all the feelings of piety and devotion paralyzed through unremitted care and anxiety, and oh! for a day of rest to dawn upon our wasted energies, and permit us to retire awhile within ourselves, and review our moral career, and to set spiritual landmarks for our future guidance.

I verily believe, that it is to the introduction of the Sabbath, and the enjoyment of the Gospel with which we are specially privileged on that day, that all our advancement in morals and civilization is, under God, to be attributed. Were it not for that, all the regulations of society would be powerless, and confusion and disorder would be the ruling law of the day. The mind would forget its higher powers, forget its own immediate wants, in the intensity of its devotion to the fancied wants of the body; yea, and forget its God. I say that without a change in the employment of the mind from sensual to spiritual contemplations, as often as one day in seven, it would soon be incapable of raising its thoughts to heavenly things. But by properly observing the Sabbath, it gains so much strength and freedom from care, that it can pass through the remaining six days of the week with ardent feelings of piety and devotion.

Christians, with few exceptions, have, since the Saviour's day, by common consent, set apart the first day of the week as that day of rest. Not that that day is of itself any more valuable than any other day, not that the sun necessarily shines brighter then than at other times, nor is it that the fields look more bright or beautiful, or that God has constituted that day in the nature of things any better than the other days. These are not the reasons why the Christian loves that day, for they are suggestions which do not exist, in fact. But it is because it is holy—set apart—devoted to a noble, an exalted purpose. It gives an opportunity for intelligent beings to review their past life, to search out their frequent aberrations from duty, to mark them for future avoidance, to trace out their evil consequences, thus enabling them to avoid the besetments of the future. I do not say, however, that by keeping the circumstances of our past life in view, we shall thereby have a talisman that will guard us from all the allurements of the world, for vice often changes its outward appearance. We may be beset in a manner quite different from any that has ever assailed us before, or from any that has ever occurred to our minds. But I do say, that by frequent retrospection, connected with a faithful observance of the other duties pertaining to the Sabbath, we shall discover a rule that will render our walk in the way of holiness, gloriously triumphant over the temptations of sin.

But we should not suffer our observance of the Sabbath to degenerate into idolatry, by worshipping it, instead of improving it in the worship of God. I solemnly believe that we are under a religious obligation to devote one day in seven, to pious purposes. But all I infer from the commandment in the decalogue, as applicable to our times, is the principle held forth in the passage. It is simply this, that it is necessary for mankind to devote one seventh part of the time to religious worship and to an attendance on spiritual things. And since the Jews were more dependent on the immediate instruction of their prophets and law givers, than we are at this day, it became necessary that some day should be designated. But since the days of our Saviour, custom has sanctioned the keeping of the first day of the week. We should regard it, therefore, as a day set apart by common consent, and sanctioned by Divine authority, for the spiritual improvement of mankind.—The man who regards it in this way, finds it a happy season. In it he sees the shadowing forth of better things. It serves to refresh his memory with themes of a noble character. On that day it was that his Saviour destroyed the power of death, opened the prison house of hades, and presented the world with evidence, sufficient to dispel the gloomy atmosphere of annihilation, which hung over the mental horizon of man's earthly existence.

The necessity of observing the Sabbath, will be apparent to every mind that is disposed to serious reflection. Whatever laborious avocation man may be engaged in, let him follow it constantly, from day to day, and the energies of his body will become exhausted; and if it be persisted in, the consequence will be premature death. Man is not constituted for unremitted fatigue. It is neither necessary nor prudent. But suppose there was no Sabbath. Suppose its contemners could succeed in destroying its observance. A cruel slavery to physical labor must be the unavoidable result. It is well known, that among employers, it is considered a wise policy to accomplish their business as fast as the specified number of hands will allow. If, then, the public opinion, and good morals would allow it, the working men would be required to labor Sundays the same as other days. They would be obliged to comply with the demands of their employers, if they wished to insure a reasonable amount of employment. But there are but few men who could bear up under the pressure of such constant toil. Thousands would sink into the grave from exhaustion before they had reached the meridian of their years. But blessed be God, that it is not thus. In the institution of the Sabbath we see the accomplishment of a wise and benevolent end. For while it acts as a check upon the avarice of mankind, it affords that relaxation from fatigue which the health of the body demands.

But it has a still more noble use. The mind of man, like his physical powers, needs relaxation from the cares and perplexities of temporal concerns. The mental eye when under the influence of physical excitement, gazes so much upon the vanities of the world, that if it were not suffered to withdraw from them occasionally, it would become blind to the beauties of spiritual things, and lose the holy impressions of religion and devotion. Hence it is that Christians have united in setting apart one day in seven for religious observances.

I know, indeed, that some few have said, and seem to think, that the Sabbath is an irksome day. They tell us that they can not go to meeting, for the preacher is so dull that they can not avoid sleeping. Or that the heat is very oppressive in church. But, alas for human consistency! these same persons are not disturbed by the heat of the sun, in the open fields or streets, as they wander about merely for the purpose of passing through a day, which, in their moral calender is worse than useless. Nor is the fatigue of hunting, or the drowsiness of passing the day over a gaming table, with some of them, at all thought of. I will not say that all who do not observe the Sabbath are decidedly immoral and unprincipled. But a very large majority of those who desecrate the Sabbath, is composed of the most abandoned and worthless beings in society.

Not so with the Christian. He delights to see his neighbors happy, and he desires to be instrumental in promoting that felicity by joining with them in praising God upon the Sabbath. The feelings of his soul, the nobler propensities of his nature are gratified, strengthened and invigorated. The foundation of his hope is examined. The evidences of God's goodness are dwelt upon in the mind; the halo of rejoicing encircles his heart; the spark of devotion, enkindles upon the altar of his affections, a flame of constant and undying love to God and to man; and the hopes and the joys of religion being felt, are disseminated among all, and its power is witnessed by all with whom he associates. Tell me not, friendly reader, that there is no joy in the religious observance of the Sabbath! Tell me not that there is no enjoyment in mingling heart with heart, and spirit with spirit around the altar of the living God, and offering up the sweetest incense of devotion, and the humble petition of the contrite heart, to the Father of the spirits of all flesh. Tell me not that there is no benefit arising from an attendance upon the ordinances of God's house. If you have not already experienced to the contrary, try it. Set your heart aright before God, reflect that he is your Father and your Saviour, divest yourself of the influence of selfish pursuits, and go up to the temple of the Lord, and worship him in spirit and in truth, realizing your utter dependence upon him for all that you are and all that you enjoy; and then tell me, if you can, honestly, that there is no enjoyment in the exercise.

Brethren, may I not appeal to you? Brethren in the faith of a world's salvation, shall the giddy and the doubting have your example? Yes, I know that they may.—They are looking to you for it. They are not fools, in this matter. They know what is consistent with the character of the followers of Jesus, and they are looking to you for an example. They expect to see you observe the day in earnest devotion. Keep it then. Not superstitiously, but piously. Not in the outward pomp of the Pharisee, but with the humble dignity of a servant of God. Keep it for your own sakes, for the sake of community. Keep it in remembrance of what is past—of the life and sufferings of Jesus for you, and for the world—of his glorious triumph over death and the grave. Keep it as a type of that eternal rest, which our heavenly Father has provided for the ransomed family of man, for in so doing, you will lay up to yourselves the richest treasures of the Gospel kingdom, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, nor thieves break through and steal. A. R. B.

BE CAUTIOUS.

Some weeks since we received a letter from a ministering brother, notifying us that W O* had commenced preaching the doctrine of the restitution to good acceptance in that region, and requesting us to notice the fact. Why, I can not tell, but I laid by the letter, intending to procure more information, if possible, before I noticed the man. Many persons—and reputed good Christians, too—can not say "no," when requested to recommend a man, and hence frequently lend their names to impostors, and make themselves the agents by which to impose on community. I feared this might be the case in this instance. Call it a want of that "charity which thinketh no evil," if you please, but long experience has taught me that it is sometimes prudence not to credit every recommendation.

Well—last week Mr. O. called on me to know why I had not published the recommendatory notice of him which had been sent me. I informed him that I had filed away the letter, intending to attend to it in due time, but had in the lapse of time and the pressure of many cares, forgotten it—which was the fact. He seemed desirous of being noticed, as he was itinerating, and people wished to be satisfied of the character of persons who were to preach to them. At his request, and really ashamed partly, that I had a reluctance to notice a man against whom I knew no evil, I wrote a brief notice, basing it on the information of the letter of the ministering brother aforesaid. To induce me to avoid the mention of that letter, he produced sundry certificates from persons in Oswego, Mexico, Howlet Hill, etc. But two of the signers are nown to me. They are most excellent men—but only one of them testified to his character—the other merely stated that Mr. O. had preached at a certain place on a certain day. I therefore adhered to my original determination, to assume no responsibility for the man, and to make the brother who wrote the letter, the voucher for the information. The next day I saw the last named friend, (who certified that Mr. O. had preached in his neighborhood,) and on conversing with him, was led to believe that my prudence was not ill-timed. A few days after I received from him a letter, from which I make the following extract. The name of the writer is at the service of Mr. O., or of any one who may desire to convince himself of the truth of the statements. I know the writer—believe him to be a strictly honest, upright, straight-forward Universalist—and know that he sustains this character in the neighborhood where he resides. Judge D.'s family, also, is one of the most respectable in that region. Here is the extract.

"I was in at the sitting room of the public house in this place [Camillus], and heard some one rap loudly at the middle door. I stepped to the door and opened it, and there stood Mr. O., who seemed to be considerably surprised on seeing me; but after a little reflection he says, "where is the landlord—I want to get some crackers." I then said to him, "I don't know where the landlord is," and stepped back and closed the door; then went out at the front door to the stoop, and in at the bar room door, and found him drinking what I took to be whiskey. He is now, while I am writing, at the tavern, talking loudly, and bragging about being a Universalist preacher, and about his sermon at Howlett Hill—also of his education. I have also been informed by judge D.'s family, that he came there considerably the worse for liquor, and boasted of his sermon at the Hill, saying every one said it was smart. I must say he comes far short of being a good, moral, temperate man. I have written this, hoping you will notify the public, that they may not be imposed upon as we have been by such an impostor. Br. Grosh, do as you please about using my name as being the one that gave you the information. I remain your friend and brother. C. L."

Mr. O. not being in fellowship, this is the only course that is left to deal with him. He will know who wrote the above letter, and let him see to it. For the present we do not give his name in full; but if this caution is not sufficient, the full name will be given—that is, unless we are satisfied that he is wronged by the above and other charges against him.

One word more. If people would be careful never to certify things they do not know to be true, they would save themselves some mortification and disgrace, and the public no little imposition. The names of such "good, easy souls," soon cease to be taken as proofs of moral character, and public confidence being destroyed, the innocent suffer. God save me from being obliged to rest my character on a certificate from persons who can not refuse their names to any one that asks a certificate at their hands—who will certify that a man is a good man, when the most they can say, in truth, is, that they know very little about him. A. B. G.

HYPOCRISY.

This is such a mean and detestable vice, that I am astonished to find so many practising it in this free and Christian country—and to find it in any way connived at among professing Christians. That a man professing to be free should not dare to worship God according to the dictates of his conscience, but must float like a dead fish wherever the whirling current of the ever changing popular tide carries him, is certainly a slavery melancholy enough; but when that baseness of soul is connived at, if not encouraged by professedly pious and conscientious Christians, words strong enough can not be found to express the loathing it creates in the soul. In fact, these connivers at hypocrisy are, themselves, the basest of hypocrites. They must loathe and detest the base slave that seeks their favor by betraying the cause of God, and professing a faith he deems lies; and yet they will force themselves to smile upon him to his face, because he adds one to their numbers! I have known several such cases. A young man, esteemed by all sects, (for all believed him honest, even though many deemed him a heretic,) endeavored to increase his popularity by taking a seat in a church whose forms of worship he deemed a mummery, whose creed he deemed absurd and erroneous, and whose preaching was unsatisfying to his soul. In conversation with the believers whose sanctuary he deserted, he still claimed the liberal name and creed as his. But he deceived only himself. God knew his hollow and rotten-heartedness. His former brethren despised and pitied his weakness. His new associates found out that he was not the honest man they had supposed him, and freely expressed their contempt of him and his principles, and their want of confidence in his adherance to them, behind his back, even while they smiled upon the cowardly slave, and used to their advantage his mean hypocrisy. He lost all—he gained nothing; and when they have squeezed all they can get out of him he will find himself cast aside and trampled under foot of those very hypocrites who now smile on his hypocrisy. Oh, when will men learn that, in all things, honesty is the best policy! A. B. G.

Those who want the work by wholesale, had better send their orders soon, as we shall soon close the edition, when no more orders can be supplied. G. and H.

TO BR. PRICE.

Dear Brother—You will remember that a mistake was made in the printing of my Convention Sermon, and that public notice was taken of the same. You will also remember, that in a letter addressed to Br. Grosh, (which, though published, was not by me intended for publication,) I remarked, that I had almost made up my mind not to send any more sermons for publication. You seemed to think that this remark applied wholly to your paper. Not so. It, at the time, applied to all. But it was made at a season when my feelings were chagrined at the mistake—it has, however, passed from me, like other hasty sayings. Mistakes will sometimes come in the best regulated plans, and no blame can be attached to you; and I am sorry that your feelings should be hurt at any remarks of mine. And I thought this public notice necessary; for I wish not to harm that valuable "Union," which is so glorious a support of our cause, and for the judicious management of which, you are deserving of so much praise. Affectionately yours,

Geo. W. Montgomery.

MONEY.

We must entreat our friends who are yet indebted to us, not to forget us. We are deeply indebted, and want every aid we can get. There is now more outstanding than there ever has been since this paper was started—and now that the times are improving, we must press on the minds of those on whom we have waited so long under great disadvantages, to remember us substantially, as soon as possible. Let every one avail himself of the offer made a few weeks ago, that our accounts for all time past may be squared up within this present volume. The aid this will afford us, will free us from embarrassment, and enable us to do something handsome for the improvement of the paper for 1839.

A. B. G.

THE BIGOT.

I would respectfully invite the attention of our readers to this well written tale in our paper of to-day. It is the first production ever written for the public gaze by the writer, who is a female—and although it contains nothing intricate in its plot, or unusual in its manner, it certainly is written in an easy style, free from errors, and gives good promise of increasing beauty and usefulness. We hope the writer will "try again," and often. A. B. G.

To Correspondents.—We have a number of articles waiting our leisure to prepare them for the press, and room in the paper, for insertion. Those who write a plain hand, and in a style the nearest to fitness for publication, are preferred as a matter of course, in such times as the present—unless, indeed, it is a highly valued correspondent—valued because of the soundness of his views, or the originality of his style or subject.

Now that Br. Hutchinson has returned in good health, business will move on, we hope, more briskly—and as soon as I have done up a little travelling on my own account, the other department will "go ahead" again, also. A. B. G.

Br. Tompkins—Send current volume to the following persons—George Smith, Livonia, Livingston county; Mrs. C. Knapp, Green Bay; Henry G. Hardin, Exeter, Otsego county; Miss Mary Roberts, Hampton, Oneida county; credit each $2.00, and charge G. and H.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in October, by Dr. Clowes, at Oneida Castle—Br. T. J. Smith, at Cedarville—Br. C. B. Brown, at Pulaski.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in October, by Br. C. B. Brown, at Onondaga South Hollow.

Br. C. B. Brown, will preach on the evenings of October 8th, at Clay Corners—9th, at Liverpool—10th, at New Bridge—11th, Cold Spring—12th, Bellisle—13th, Caseton, Howlett Hill—15th, red school-house, Hastings—16th, at Button Settlement—17th, Union Settlement—18th, Union Square—19th, at the school-house, near Br. POETRY

[From the Rural Repository.]

THE OCEAN BURIED.

BY REV. E. H. CHAPIN.

"Bury me not in the deep, deep sea!"—
The words came faint and mournfully,
From the pallid lips of a youth, who lay
On the cabin-couch, where day by day,
He had wasted and pined till o'er his brow
The death-shade had slowly passed, and now
When the land and his fond-lov'd home were nigh,
They had gathered around him to see him die.

"Bury me not in the deep, deep sea,
Where the billowy shroud will roll over me—
Where no light can break through the dark cold wave,
And no sunbeam rest sweetly upon my grave.
'It boots not,' I know I have oft been told,
'Where the body shall lie when the heart is cold'—
Yet grant ye, oh, grant ye this boon to me,
Bury me not in the deep, deep sea!

"For in fancy I've listened to well known words—
The free, wild wind, and the song of birds—
I have thought of home, of cot and bow'r,
And of scenes that I loved in childhood's hour.
I have ever hoped to be laid, when I died,
In the church-yard there on the green hill-side—
By the bones of my fathers my grave should be—
Bury me not in the deep, deep sea!

"Let my death slumber be where a mother's pray'r
And sisters' tears can be blended there.
Oh! 'twill be sweet ere the heart's throb is o'er,
To know, when its fountain shall gush no more,
That those it so fondly has yearned for will come
To plant the first wild-flower of Spring on my tomb.
Let me lie where the loved ones can weep over me,
Bury me not in the deep, deep sea.

"And there is another, her tears would be shed
For him who lay far in an ocean-bed.
In hours that it pains me to think of now,
She hath twined these locks and kissed this brow—
In the hair she has wreathed shall the sea-snake hiss?
The brow she has pressed shall the cold wave kiss?
For the sake of that bright one who waits for me,
Bury me not in the deep, deep sea!

"She hath been in my dreams"—His voice failed there,
They gave no heed to his dying prayer.
* * * * * * * * *
They have lowered him slow o'er the vessel's side—
Above him hath closed the solemn tide.
Where to dip her wing the wild fowl rests—
Where the blue waves dance with their foamy crests—
Where the billows bound and the winds sport free—
They have buried him there, in the deep, deep sea.

RELIGION

It can not fail to be discovered by every attentive reader of the Bible, that a considerable portion of the Holy Book is devoted to the instruction of mankind in morals, righteousness and heavenly truth. The New Testament, particularly, contains a very great number of important and useful lessons upon the subject of good works—of holy living.

The illustrious precepts of the Son of God, and the numerous epistles of his faithful apostles, furnish ample evidence of the truth of this assertion. Indeed, it is universally admitted, that no work of any description ever appeared so worthy the attention of mankind, on account of the purity of its precepts, the value of its moral teachings, and the justness of its requirements, as the Bible, and especially the New Testament.

The epistles of John contain a fund of useful knowledge, and furnish an amount of salutary instruction equalled by the productions of no eminent philosopher, or modern divine. The first letter of that beloved disciple to his brethren in the faith, whom he frequently addresses as his children, is replete with sound doctrine and wholesome instruction.

At the time when this epistle was written, there appears to have been more than common necessity for pure teachings and plain exhortations, inasmuch as some of the followers of Christ had lost their first love, and abandoned the cause; whereas, those the apostle calls anti-christs, had made their appearance in considerable numbers.

By way of encouraging his brethren, John writes this epistle,—setting forth the true doctrine of Christ—entreating them to persevere, and warning them against being led away by deceivers. For their encouragement and best good, he tells them that God had promised them eternal life,—that Jesus Christ is their advocate, and that he was manifested to declare the love of God in the salvation of the world.

He exhorts them to believe not every spirit, but "try the spirits whether they be of God," because many false prophets are abroad in the world. And in order that they might distinguish truth from error, he says, "Hereby know ye the spirit of God: Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is of God: And every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God." He warns them against being deceived, saying, "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar, for he that loveth not his brother, whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?"

Such instructions were highly necessary at that age of the church, and, indeed, indispensable to the prosperity and support of the cause of pure religion. Nor should they be neglected in this day and generation.—They are equally important at this time, and deeply concern all Christian believers in this age of the world.

Religion is now what it was in the days of our Saviour. It has not undergone any change. It is unvarying, and its followers stand in need of much of the same teaching as did the primitive Christians.

The words of the apostle John are as applicable to men in this age, as they were to whom they were originally addressed. "He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in darkness even until now." Some men act as though they thought religion to be something made expressly for particular times and places. Upon all solemn and mournful occasions they think it necessary, and upon the arrival of the Sabbath, all worldly conversation must be avoided, and even the visage altered from its week-day appearance.

Now such conduct is by no means compatible with the teachings of Scripture. Religion is not confined to the church, the sick chamber, or the house of mourning, but is to be the companion of man every day, and on all occasions. It is not to be distinguished by the outward appearance of men, but takes up its abode in the heart. It is suited to the mind of every man who desires to be happy. All should practice virtue. Every person should, for his own comfort, and for the peace of others, be religious. And upon no class of Christians has religion a greater claim than upon those who believe in the doctrine of universal salvation. They should strive to cultivate every Christian grace. And at this period particularly does it devolve upon us who have tasted the grace of God, to be active in the cause of religion, to practice the doctrine we profess to believe, and to be extremely cautious that we do not by neglect or imprudence, bring disgrace upon our own flourishing cause.

We are bound to let our light shine, and in conformity with the instructions of the Holy Word—"Do good unto all men, especially unto those who are of the household of faith." These things are equally important now as formerly—"because the darkness is past, and the true light now shineth."—Gospel Witness.

"THERE IS NO MORAL CHANGE AFTER DEATH."

So says the believer in the doctrine, that a part of mankind will continue in sin and rebellion, and suffer endless misery in the immortal resurrection state. But, how does this statement agree with their preaching at the present day?

We have nothing to say respecting the great change in the moral feelings of the inhabitants of those celestial regions who, they tell us, shall look down with composure and see their friends and fellow-beings, endlessly tormented in the fiery gulf, "roasting in the liquid lava of hell's molten sea—shrieking in hopeless despair." We wish, merely, to show in this article, that a great moral change must, necessarily, be wrought upon those who are doomed to the abodes of despair, in order to prepare them to suffer these torments. The reader is probably aware that the old notion, that the torments of the damned, are bodily pains in literal "fire and brimstone," is wholly discarded by nearly all of the (so called) orthodox divines, at the present day.

But these divines now tell us, that the punishments of the wicked, in the future state, consist in mental torments, and "horrors of conscience." They also frequently tell us, that "the mind, heart, or moral feelings of these wretched victims, are so hardened and their consciences so 'seared' as it were with an hot iron, that they can not suffer the punishment due to their crimes, in this life." Sinners can not receive "the wages of sin" here "in the body," they say, because they are in love with it, and their consciences are so "seared."

But, after death, there is to be such a moral change, that their consciences will torment them "day and night forever and ever." Surely, "there is no moral change after death."

But, "as death leaves us, so judgment will find us." Chimney-corner scripture; chapter and verse unknown. —Watchman.

DEATHS.

In this city, August 31st, of consumption, Mr. JOSEPH MIX, in the 38th year of his age. By this dispensation, a wife and two children are bereaved of an affectionate husband and kind father, and society of an humble though useful citizen. His funeral was attended on the following Sunday, and his remains taken to Sangerfield for interment. A. B. G.

At the residence of her father, Dr. Wm. Holloway, in Raisin, Lenawee county, Mich., June 20th, Mrs. ADALINE SEYMOUR, wife of Selleck Seymour, in the 31st year of her age. Her disease was liver complaint, which, after four or five years, terminated in consumption. A letter from the bereaved and deeply afflicted husband, who was absent from her death-bed and burial—for a sudden change in her health, took her off unexpectedly—informs us that she was a believer in God's impartial grace, and ever adorned her profession by the exercise of a meek deportment, an affectionate and trustful spirit, and a life of active piety and benevolence.—He mourns not without hope—for in this day of trial he finds the grace which supported her, sufficient to comfort and heal his wounded heart, and to enable him to rejoice in the prospect of a reunion with her, and with the vast family of humanity, where parting and sorrow are never known—where God will be all in all.

A. B. G.

In Pitcher, Chenango county, September 3d, REUBEN N. STREETER, aged 14 years. The fatal accident which caused the death of this young man, should be a caution to others. He went out gunning, and while walking on a log, some little distance from the ground, he rested the breech of his gun on a stick lying across the log, which broke and caused him to fall on the muzzle, when the gun discharged its load in his left side.—He ran about 18 rods, and fell from loss of blood. A young man hearing his scream, went to his assistance, and with difficulty got him to the house. Conscious that he must soon expire, he advised them not to go for a physician, for he should die before he could arrive.—Seeing his mother overcome with distraction at the sight of her child covered with blood, he, although in extreme pain, endeavored to comfort her. He asked if his father had yet arrived, and on being answered in the negative, said, "I shall not see him again in this world, for it begins to grow dark—I must bid you farewell!" and immediately expired. The funeral was attended on the 6th, in the Baptist meeting-house; and as some feared that his death was so sudden, and that he might not have been prepared, by the supposed mysterious change, to enter immortal felicity, I felt called upon to address the audience from the words of Paul, 1 Cor. iv: 5—"Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall every man have praise of God."

May the mourning friends realize that God can bring good out of the most dark and afflicting dispensations of his own providence; and thus be enabled to say, "Father, thy will be done." C. S. BROWN.

GOD'S PEOPLE.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"For the Lord taketh pleasure in his people."—DAVID.

On reading this passage, the first question that seems to present itself, is, who are the people of God? Sometimes a nation may be his people in a peculiar sense. Thus, Peter says, "But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people, that ye should shew forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light; which in time past were not a people, but are now the people of God, which had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy."—First Epistle ii: 9, 10. It is always admitted, that the righteous are the people of God; and so they are, in the highest sense of the word. But then, it can be easily proved that all mankind belong to the Creator. Indeed, man can not dissolve the connection by any act of his own, if he would. Wickedness may alienate the mind from God, but it can not destroy the relationship. This endures under all circumstances, and throughout all time. There is one remarkable fact that everywhere presents itself in the Scriptures. It is, that man is still a child of God even in the most sinful state: "Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth: for the Lord hath spoken, I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me. The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib: but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider."—Isaiah i: 2, 3. "For my people have committed two evils: they have forsaken me, the fountain of living waters, and hewn out to themselves cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water."—Jer. ii: 13. But we need not multiply passages to prove this point.

God takes pleasure in man as a moral being.—He has formed him in his own image. As parents love to see their image in their children, so God loves to see his perfections manifested in mankind. This image may be defaced by sin, but it can not be lost forever. This whole subject is well illustrated by the parable of the Lost Piece of Silver. Though lost, it still retained its original value. And as the woman searched until it was found, so will God search for the sinner, till he is brought into a reconciled state. Such is his purpose and his pleasure:—"Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are in earth, even in him."—Eph. i: 9, 10.

God taketh pleasure in reconciling the world unto himself. It is his own work—a work which he will not give up, till it is entirely accomplished. It is worthy of a God. A partial reconciliation would derogate from his character. The same power, wisdom, and goodness that were displayed in creation, are now employed in the still higher work of redemption. But we find ourselves entering on a theme boundless as the presence of God. We have the inclination, but neither the time nor the ability to go into the glories and depths of the subject. "The soul," says Addison, "considered in relation to its Creator, is like one of those mathematical lines that may draw nearer to another for all eternity, without a possibility of touching it;" and can there be a thought so transporting as to consider ourselves in these perpetual approaches to him who is not only the standard of perfection, but of happiness.

THINK AND JUDGE FOR YOURSELVES.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS."

In our perusals of the discourses and conversations of their Master, which the historians of Jesus have recorded, we have not unfrequently been persuaded that the above-named lesson is that which the Heaven-sent Teacher would wish to inculcate and enforce. Whenever we find him proclaiming, "He that hath ears to ear, let him hear," we are convinced, satisfactorily enough for ourselves, that his meaning is, "Do the labor of candidly interpreting these, my sayings, for yourselves; look not to me to do that labor for you; if ye will, and are in earnest to find my meaning, ye have faculties sufficient to the task." We feel much inclined to the opinion, that Jesus spake in parables, with the frequency denoted by saying that "without a parable he spake not," partly that he might supply his hearers with a stimulus to think for themselves. Those who would not take this trouble, he does not seem to have thought worthy of being rescued from the evils which follow such indifference to learn and know, or such indolence of the mental capacities. He leaves them to their fate—seeing, yet not seeing; hearing, yet not understanding. But to confine ourselves to a single instance: It will be remembered that after John the Baptist had been incarcerated by Herod, his disciples visited him in prison, and reported to him the miraculous works which Jesus was continuing to perform. Whether these works established the Messiahship of Jesus, was a question which, doubtless, oft occurred to John's disciples, if not to the mind of John himself. It was probably more for the satisfaction of his disciples, than of himself, that John devised the plan of sending some of his disciples to Jesus with the question, "Art thou He that is to come, or may we expect another." The Baptist or his disciples, doubtless expected an explicit and satisfactory answer to their question. But Jesus did not see fit to do the work of judging for them. He gave them no opinion; but he pointed them to the data from which they might form their own opinion, and come to a conclusion for themselves, without dependence on his or any man's judgment. He gave no opinion; but in the presence of those who had come to be resolved of their question, he gave a specimen of his miraculous powers: "he cured many of sickness, and torments, and demons, and kindly gave sight to many blind people." If they could not, from such premises, come to a resolution of the question for themselves, we may presume from the manner of Jesus, that he thought it of little consequence that they should hold an opinion upon any other foundation.

Our own experience, as well as our observation, teaches us that we are too ready to lean upon the judgment of others. We are too indolent to take the trouble of making researches for ourselves, and from well-ascertained data, to draw the legitimate inferences for ourselves. We wish it were otherwise. We wish we could be persuaded to overcome our natural indisposition to intellectual labor; for we are assured that among the happy results of such a victory, it would not be the smallest, that mankind would no longer submit to have their opinions dictated to them by demagogue or tyrant, by domineering priests, or a fashionable oligarchy. We should more frequently be delighted, as well as instructed, by a display of the manhood—we may say, the divinity of mind.

When we meet with one hardy enough to judge for himself, and caring little whether his conclusions agree with or differ from those of other men, he irresistibly becometh an immense favorite. For this reason, the hero, if we may so call him, of the ninth chapter of John's Gospel, is an especial favorite. We delight to read his story. It is animating, it is spirit-stirring. The leading men among the Jews, thought to quash all belief in the Messiahship of Jesus, by the question, "Have any of the Pharisees believed in him?" With such a man as the blind man, whose story we love to dwell upon, such a question would prevail but little. We recommend this ninth of John to our readers' notice, knowing that the fearless and self-confiding deportment of the blind hero of the story, will recommend itself to every man's judgment—we would be delighted that many should become the imitators of his spirit and conduct. Oh! for a race of sturdy, manly, scrutinizing, common-sense inquirers!

TERRESTRIAL AND CELESTIAL BODIES.

BY REV. S. MILES.

There are two kinds of bodies, earthly and heavenly. The first is natural, and the second is spiritual. The first must be destroyed before the second can exist. The first is mortal, the second is immortal. The first is represented by the scapegoat that bare upon him all the iniquities of the people unto a land not inhabited.—See Lev. xvi: 10, 21, 22. It is said of the wicked, "His bones are full of the sin of his youth, which shall lie down with him in the dust."—Job xx: 11. "Their iniquities shall be upon their bones, though they were the terror of the mighty in the land of the living."—Ezek. xxxii: 27; Psalm cix: 18. "But these, as natural brute beasts, (like the offerings under the law,) made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things that they understand not, and shall utterly perish in their own corruption."—2 Peter ii: 12. "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body."—1 Cor. xv: 44. "It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption." Now, if this natural body passes down into the grave with all the sins and iniquities which it has committed in this life, attached to it, then is it not evident that sin is the work of the flesh, as declared Gal. v: 19-21. And has not Christ condemned sin in the flesh? Is not the body morally dead because of sin, even of those who have been spiritually renewed by the word of life?—See Rom. viii: 3, 10. And is it not true that "flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of God"? And is it not also true that Christ will deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father, when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority and power? If so, then let this body of flesh and blood, which is now excluded from the kingdom of God, be destroyed, forever destroyed, that the glory of the latter house may be greater than the former.

Let those who contend for destruction, have destruction; I care not, so long as the Word of God declares that "all the ends of the world SHALL REMEMBER and turn unto the Lord: and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee. For the kingdom is the Lord's, and he is the Governor among the nations."—Psalm xxii: 27, 28.

Now, if those who were destroyed, were shut up in an unconscious state of being, there to remain in silence without end, then how and when will all the ends of the world remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations worship before God? It is true that the spirits of those who are unrenewed, are in the flesh, which is excluded from the kingdom of God; but Christ, is authorized to raise up and quicken whom he will, (John v: 21,) and the work is going on, and will go on, "until he has subdued all things unto himself." Then he will have finished his work of raising them up into his kingdom, and then cometh the end, when he shall deliver up the kingdom to the Father, who will raise and change our mortal bodies from mortal to immortal. So when Christ shall have delivered up the kingdom to the Father, then he will no longer sit in his kingdom, judging those unworthy of a place in his kingdom, who walk after the flesh. There will then be an end of flesh and blood, because they will all have been raised by the Father, and will have remembered and turned to him, to worship him without end. The two resurrections, the first by the Son of God, and the second by the Father, will finish the glorious work of salvation. The first by the Son, who shall save his people from their sins, and the second by the Father, who will save a world from mortality, corruption, and death, to live with him in endless bliss.

PIOUS SLANDER.

BY REV. T. P. ABELL.

"And the children of Israel heard say."—Josh. xxii: 11.

Whenever a doctrine is unpopular and its advocates "few and far between," we can easily conceive of many ways by which they may become the objects of public calumny and reproach. Whether from private pique or denominational policy, it matters not; it is an easy thing to set some rumor afloat, and pious pretenders are ever ready to give it an additional impetus; and thus it becomes enlarged and widely circulated, until it seriously affects the moral character of an individual or of a people.

It required no solemn oaths and protestations to convince the Canaanite Hebrews, that their brethren in Gilead had been guilty of the grossest idolatry and sensual abominations. "The children of Israel heard say," and this was all they knew about it. They did not wait to ascertain the facts of the case; they heard a flying report—perhaps it was from open enemies—perhaps from interested deceivers, or equivocating friends, and this satisfied them of the guilt of their neighbors. They did not query as to the truth or falsity of the story; they only seemed to want an opportunity of showing their devotedness to God, by saving him the trouble of chastising a portion of his supposed rebellious children.

It is often thus. It matters but little as to the foundation of these reports; if the "people hear say," this satisfies them at once, and they are forthwith ready to give ample practical proofs of their love to God. They are perfectly willing to have it understood that they are warmly attached to the religion of their fathers, and heartily despise all innovations. Hereditary belief is the thing that they love; and he who builds an altar of his own, is soon convinced of the intention of some to make war upon him, however trifling his departure from the established worship of the day, or however sincere may be his convictions of duty.

I once read of a man—and there was a moral beauty gathered over all his life, but he was the victim of much sectarian invective and scorn.—The traditions of the elders were early and assiduously instilled into his mind. He became a votary of popular religion. He embraced the faith of one of the "straitest sects." But it was an incubus upon his soul. It could not answer the deep and inherent longings of his heart. It promised nothing satisfying in life—nothing supporting in death—nothing unalloyed in eternity. And years passed away, and the benevolence of his heart expanded, and the magnet of celestial love touched his waiting spirit; a rainbow of hope was thrown across the horizon of his existence; his liberated soul basked in a new and enlarged atmosphere; his long hoarded feelings gushed out in spontaneous gratitude to God, and to his renewed and increased vision, a glory rested upon the intelligent creation. The grave was robbed of its prey, and the sting plucked from death; and he deemed that it was indeed good for him that he had his existence. But a dark desolation passed over his heart; for, if there is one thing more than another that will sicken the spirit within, it is the turning away of kindred and friends, and the treachery and ingratitude of a cherished world.

And that lone being bade adieu to the land of his birth. He was borne over the white foam and the salt wave. He became a stranger in a strange land. His arrival was hailed by a redeeming spirit. And he was led to speak of the light which had been poured into his heart, and of the faith which had caused a flood of sunshine to flow over all created things, and I ween that his soul was lifted high towards heaven, as he spoke of the exhaustless riches of free and imperishable grace, and of the bright and unfading destiny that awaits the countless throng of intelligent beings emanating from the great Eternal.

And did the acclamations and the applause of the great, and the smiles of the high and the learned, and the munificence of the wealthy, and the favor of the powerful, follow that pilgrim herald?—Gathered he any laurels of honor? Were temples reared to eternise his glory? Was his name inscribed upon the world's scroll of fame? Nay. He went forth alone amid a multitude. For his labors of love he received the scoffs and scorn of his opposers; for his tears and prayers came the buffetings of his enemies; and for his message of glad tidings came the coldness, the indifference, and the contempt of a pharisaic and an ungodly generation.

And what did the world know of that heavenly messenger? Had he imbued his hands in human blood, thus to merit their contumely and condemnation? Had he burned children to Moloch? Had he kindled the faggot-flame around the body of a Servetus? Had he castigated the Baptists, and decorated the neck of the peaceful Quaker with the convincing hemp? Nay. He done nothing like this. He passed along in all the inostentatiousness of charity, and his character was not blackened by one such demon act.

And what did the world know of him? "And the children of Israel heard say," and this was all. Rumor with her ten thousand tongues went before him, and so they deemed that he had built an altar to some idol-god, and then persecution stretched out her black arm, and swore revenge.

And strong must have been the heart of that lonely wanderer, and his faith deep anchored in heaven, to have withstood the evil machinations of his foes, and borne up under the weary weight of calumny that gathered darkly around him.

But a little band of the true and faithful followed that man of God, for they felt that his was a faith fraught with everlasting good to man. It possessed a redeeming power. It had a balm of feeling for the stricken heart, and the mourner was comforted, the desponding cheered, and the wayward reclaimed. And that meek messenger of Heaven re-enlivened the fires of eternal truth; and they burn gloriously now, and will thus continue, until God shall be honored by all his children; and ere then shall the thanksgivings of an enlightened and happy posterity cluster around the name of the immortal John Murray.

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1838.

1 TIMOTHY III: 1-13.

We believe it is a true saying now, as much as it was in the days of Paul, that he that earnestly desires the office of a religious and moral instructor, desires an honorable and a useful employment. The motive, however, is less likely to be pure and disinterested now, than it must have been then. The service of Christ, in the age of Paul, brought to those engaged in it, little of either honor or emolument; and we can scarcely conceive of any motive which a man could entertain, who wished to dedicate himself to that service, save the sincere and disinterested love of promoting the virtue and happiness of his race. Circumstances have, however, changed, and to different extents, in different countries, and among different sects; but in all countries, and among all denominations, there are aspirants for the Christian ministry, in our day, who would have recoiled (as from poverty, dishonor, and death) in the days of Paul, from any prominent place in his service. If, in the day of its dishonor, therefore, it was proper to guard the doorway to the Christian altar, so that no unfit intruder might be permitted to serve there, how much more proper and even necessary is it now, when the Christian ministry is reputable and sometimes gainful, to see that no unqualified person presumes to occupy the sacred desk.

While we would gladly welcome to the ranks of the Christian soldiery, every one who is competently acquainted with the purposes for which his great Captain was commissioned and sent into the world, and who is sincerely, disinterestedly, and ardently desirous of promoting, to the utmost of his abilities, these great objects, we would not have any such forget that there are many modes of employing themselves, many spheres of usefulness, beside the occupation of the preacher's desk. He who might be useful to Christ's cause in the circle of his neighbors, by conversation, by example, by unassuming devotedness, might be very unfit for a public instructor. We might remind such a one, that even in a narrower circle he could find work enough—even in his own family, perhaps even in his own heart. Every aspiration to aid in the cause of Christ, we would encourage; but we would wish to recommend good sense and propriety as dictators of each aspirant's appropriate sphere. We would frown also upon the passion for notoriety and display, which keeps locked up so many exertions, which but for this delusive love of display, might be urging forward in private and world-unnoticed channels, the great work—the reformation of man. Babes in Christ we would encourage to work as well as full-grown men; but we would not have any one to refuse to co-operate in the promotion of the cause, merely because he can not have the foremost place.—Is this the cause why any of us, my readers, are inoperative in Christ's cause? Let us examine ourselves, and banish, if present, any such unworthy feeling. There is work enough for us all, my friends; let us make an endeavor to discover where, and in what way, our efforts can be made most efficient for good.

All disposed to co-operate with Jesus—to enlist in the cause of the Captain of our salvation, may find an appropriate sphere for action and for usefulness. In proportion as we approach to his acuteness of intellect, superiority to temptation, and immaculateness of character, we may reasonably expect to be successful in our endeavors. If, as all will allow, it is incumbent upon the most humble and unnoticed of his followers, to strive earnestly after an approximation to the virtues of his Master, how much more binding is the obligation upon those who occupy a prominent place in his service. If the most secluded Christian should strive, in the cause of his Master, after such qualifications as will make him a still more efficient co-laborator, how much more imperious is the necessity to aim at progress and perfection, lying upon that man, who puts himself forward in the foremost ranks—"the observed of all observers." For, in proportion to his intellectual and moral vigor, and his participation in the spirit which animated Jesus, will be his success in his Captain's cause.

Fellow-soldiers of the cross! let us put on the whole armor of God. Let not even all the qualifications enumerated in our paragraph, as befitting the most prominent servants of Jesus, limit our aspirations and exertions. Let none of us, however confined and unobserved our sphere of action, rest contented without a perpetual straining after the likeness of Christ being formed in us. Forgetting the things that are behind, let us press forward to excellencies yet unattained. Let us be diffident in challenging the observation of the world by assuming a prominent place; but if any of us will assume the sacred office, let us be sure that no temptation of indolence, of vanity, or of flattery, shall ever make us flag in our efforts after the highest attainments of a Christ-like character. All we can do, all we can attain to, will scarcely save us from the reflection that we are, and have been unprofitable servants. Let no evening close upon us without having endeavored, in the course of the day, something in the cause of Christ, and some progress towards greater efficiency in his cause. To stimulate and aid us in our efforts, let us keep our eye upon "the recompense of reward," when from Father and from elder brother, shall come the enrapturing applause, "Welcome, good and faithful servant, enter upon the joy of thy Lord." A REMINISCENCE.

About twenty years ago, I was in Canada with a companion about my own age. We had been disappointed in business—had spent our last shilling, and had now, nothing to do but to get home if we could. The only way for us was to journey on foot from the head of the Bay of Quinta to Kingston, thence across the lake to Sackets Harbor.

We started early one bright morning in July, and, being impelled by "necessity dire," walked fast. About the middle of the afternoon, not being much used to that "mode of conveyance," our feet became much swollen and blistered. Every step was painful, and like the Paddy, when he hurt his nose, we limped on both feet. I was brought up a Baptist, and my companion was a Methodist. He knelt and prayed in a most melancholy mood, that the Lord would be "feet and legs" to him that afternoon. I could not help remarking, that I thought he might be more benefited by making the best use he could of the feet and legs the Lord had already given him. He replied he never yet knew a Baptist have any faith; but admitted at the same time, that he walked no easier than he did before he made his prayer. Arrived at a house, we told our situation, and requested the privilege of staying through the night, but were refused. My friend then wished he could find a Methodist family; for in that case, he said, we could have a home for two days, if we wanted one so long. I contended that we should do well enough could we once get among Baptists. On meeting a person on the road, my friend inquired for a Methodist family, and was informed that such a family lived in the next house. He was now overjoyed, and already, in imagination, swallowing "catfish, and eels, and roasted potatoes whole." But he was doomed to suffer a disappointment; for, on making his request, he was informed that they could not keep every Methodist pretender that straggled along the road. I now inquired for Baptists; found some people who called themselves so, but with no better success. It may appear singular that two men in our situation could travel, or rather hobble, seven miles among people who call themselves Christians, requesting admittance at almost every house, without being able to gain it; but such was the fact. At length very tired, hungry, lame, and melancholy, we sat down by the side of the high-way almost in despair. After resting for some time, we mustered courage to go on and try once more. On approaching the next house we found the occupant at the door chopping wood. We made known, as usual, our situation, and requested quarters for the night. "Certainly," said he, "certainly:"—"you seem very tired and lame; walk in, gentlemen, walk in;" himself at the same time leading the way. A table was soon set for us, with plenty of food, of which we certainly stood in need. When the repast was over, our host and his wife "took their pales and went to milking," as the saying is. While they were out, I remarked that I could almost affirm that these people were Baptists. And I, rejoined my friend, can quite affirm they are Methodists; and to put it out of all dispute, I will inquire as soon as they come in. They returned. My friend inquired—What do you think, my good friend, of Jesus of Nazareth? Our host, after looking a little surprised for a moment, answered—why, Sir, I have the happiness to think of him much as good old John the Baptist did. I believe him to be "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." Not thinking this answer sufficiently definite, my companion again asked—"But to what sect do you belong?" Our host again replied—"to the same sect that St. Paul did; to that sect which is 'every where spoken against.'" Not yet satisfied, my companion again inquired thus—"But what did St. Paul believe? Answer—"If we may take his own word for it, he believed, 'as in Adam all die even so in Christ shall all be made alive.' If this does not satisfy you perhaps our Saviour's declaration may—he says, 'those who obtain the resurrection from the dead, etc., can not die any more, for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection.'"

By this time we were both satisfied that we were receiving the hospitalities of a Universalist! We were astonished, but thought proper to say no more on that subject. RICHLAND.

THE RELIGION OF JESUS.

In tracing the history of the Saviour of mankind, and reflecting upon the purity of his precepts, and the beauty of character, as displayed in the religion of Jesus Christ, we find much that strikes the mind with awe, and fills the soul with love and adoration. Unlike the darkness and superstition of Pagan idolatry and the terrors of modern Partialism, he sought not to appease the wrath of God upon the altar of temporal sacrifices, nor to gain accessions to the ministry of his faith, through the medium of misrepresentation, or the slavish fear of an imaginary hell. But the religion he taught, breathes naught but the inspired spirit of his heavenly Father, the fulfilment of the purposes of his mission of universal redemption and reconciliation to God, and the final emancipation from sin and its consequences. He stooped not to the sordid influence of wealth, nor the petty distinction of a vain ambition; but recognizing mankind to be the children of one common Parent, and linked together by the same kindred ties of earth and heaven, he placed himself on a level with the humblest of his followers, and declared as he lived they should live also.

How kind in his manners, how just his conceptions, how merciful to his enemies, and yet how affecting his discourses. When reviled, he reviled not again; the flame of anger, hatred and revenge, was a stranger to his bosom; upon his manly lips hung the religion of peace on earth and good will to men. With forbearance and Christian resignation, he bore the taunts of the multitude, and braved the storms of persecution, danger, and death; and the accumulated calumny of his wicked and inveterate enemies, so far from stirring him to deeds of cruelty and revenge, only aroused him with a commendable zeal and unwavering faith, to call into active exercise the worthy and ennobling principle of overcoming evil with good, and strengthening him in the promulgation of the religion he came to establish.

He came not to sow the seeds of discord and spiritual warfare among the children of men; but he came as a Father to the fatherless, a pattern to the rich, and a pastor to the poor, benighted, and forlorn. In a word, the object of his mission was to ameliorate the condition of mankind, to save the sinner, and redeem the world. The poor beggar, in wretchedness and rags, was as much an object of his kind care and commisseration, as the stately king seated on his throne, in all the splendor and magnificence of an earthly monarch. Alike to him were the rich and the poor, the bond and the free, the noble and the ignoble. Alike to him the mansion of the monarch and the cottage of the humble. None were so high as not to need his assistance—none so low but he would bend to their necessities. We see him at one time, in all the deep humility of his profession, mingling with publicans and sinners, and comforting his fellow-creatures in the humbler walks of life; while at another, we behold him in all the glory of a God, in the mystery and astonishment of infinite wisdom and power, performing the miracles of raising the dead, healing the sick, opening the eyes of the blind, unstopping the ears of the deaf, and at the word of his command, hushing the fury of the storm, while he walked upon the waters, in attestation of the Divinity of his mission.

A man of sorrow and acquainted with grief, he could sympathise with those that mourned, and pour the balm of consolation into the afflicted bosom of suffering humanity. Possessed of the spirit of free investigation, he lit not the torch of persecution, nor drew the sword of compulsion against those who differed from his faith. His weapon was his word; and with the sword of eternal truth, we see him refuting the philosophy of the wise and the great—putting to naught the long established notions of heathen darkness, and planting in the hearts and affections of his hearers, a true and correct knowledge of the character of God, the Father of all mercies. A martyr to the faith which he preached, he received the spear of the assassin, and in the agony of his expiring breath, prayed for his merciless tormentors, saying, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Well might Rousseau exclaim, "If the life and death of Socrates were those of a sage, the life and death of Jesus Christ were those of a God." How different the religion that is of human origin, which clothes the Almighty with malice, and teaches that

> The land of horror and despair—
> Justice hath built a dismal hell,
> And laid her stores of vengeance there."

And that ere long,

> "Tempests of angry fire will roll,
> To blast the rebel worms,
> And beat upon their naked souls,
> In one eternal storm"

Soul-withering doctrine! Is it the religion of Jesus? Is it the fruit of that heaven-born spirit of innocence and peace, which shone in brilliancy and beauty, and went down in blood on Calvary? Oh, no! It is of human origin—it owes its rise to the dark ages of ignorance and blind superstition, when oppression, cruelty, and tyranny reigned predominant over the wide-spread continent of the world. Alas! what heart-rending doctrines have the inventions of men sought out! But thanks, everlasting thanks, be to the Father of all mercies, and God of all grace, the glorious sun of righteousness has arisen with healing in his wings: the veil that has been spread over all nations, has been rent in twain, and the doctrines that for ages and centuries have pervaded and confounded the human understanding, and cast a shade of gloom, doubt, and despondency over the benighted minds of the sons and daughters of men, are fast receding before the heavenly and benign influence of the glorious doctrine of life and immortality. Yes, the religion of Jesus, standing as it does, untrammelled from the creeds and trappings of men, stands out in bold relief, perfecting the happiness of this life and the hope of the future. The forbearance and forgiveness of Jesus—his charity and benevolence—must forever remain the blessed memento of his love, and be handed down to the latest generation, as a perfect pattern of the sincerity of his hope, and the virtues of his examples.

The frowns of the world and the blasts of persecution, may beat upon it in vain; the scorn of skepticism, with all its boasted philosophy, in vain attempts its overthrow. Based upon the rock of infinite wisdom and goodness, the Gospel is destined to roll on in its mediatorial reign, until sin and transgression shall no more trouble the pure waters of life; death, the last enemy, be destroyed; all enemies made friends, and all hearts melted into love. Then he shall deliver up the kingdom to God, the Father, and God be all in all.—Amen. MARIUS.

REPLY TO BR. COOK.

I trust that all our readers who read Br. T. D. Cook's notice of the Exhibition of the Clinton Liberal Institute, will also read the following reply from Miss Barker.—While they perceive in it a praise-worthy sensitiveness to the parenthetical, and certainly not deeply meant and widely sweeping question of Br. Cook in relation to the two pieces spoken, they will find in that very sensitiveness and candor, an additional pledge of the high regard Miss Barker has ever manifested for her own reputation, and for that of the Institution over which she presides. In regard to the two pieces alluded to, I can fully endorse all that is said in praise of their literary merit,, and yet the general sentiment did not please me—not that they were of immoral tendency—for they were not; but that they were inappropriate for general application. But regarding them as a part of a rich mental feast, where great variety was required, I felt willing that those who relished them might enjoy them. But enough. I am satisfied that Br. Cook's question meant no more—and that our excellent sister replied to it more because she feared that others would misunderstand it, than that she understood it as meaning more than it did. In haste, Clinton, September 22d, 1838.

Mr. GROSH—I believe that the liberty you once gave me to the pages of the Magazine and Advocate, will save me from the charge of presumption, for wishing you to make this letter public.—But I can not so easily avoid the necessity of an apology for making the remarks of the gentleman who so favorably noticed the late exhibition of the C. L. Institute, the subject of a communication. To those friends from abroad, and particularly from Utica, who honored that occasion with their presence, the teachers and friends of the Institute in its immediate vicinity, feel very grateful. To you, Sir, and to the author of the remarks above alluded to; we owe an additional tribute of thanks, for the kind manner in which you have noticed us. Yet I must be allowed to complain of the question in the article written by Mr. C——, respecting the moral tendency of one or two of the pieces spoken at the Ladies' Exhibition. It was my task to select, and assign the pieces to the several speakers. The blame, therefore, if there be any, attaches to me; and so painful have been my apprehensions of the effect of this question, upon those who possess no extenuating information, that I wish to be heard in my own behalf.

"The Soul in Purgatory," is an allegorical tale, portraying vividly a common and reprehensible trait in human nature. It is not more highly wrought, I believe, than fiction and poetry allow. On that occasion, it was considerably abridged, divested of all unnecessary appendages; presenting only the simple and affecting incident and its consequence: and though I would not deny the right of individual taste in relation to it, I can see no reason for the question respecting its moral tendency. I write this with all humility; and with a willingness to be enlightened, for it is possible that the richness of the imagery, and the beauty of the language, together with the pride of feeling that there was talent enough among the young ladies under my charge, to do justice to the effusions of even the master spirit of Bulwer; might have blinded me to some inappropriateness of the piece to the occasion. It is one of that series of tales, so beautiful in themselves, and so beautifully connected, which constitute the sweetest, and purest of all the works of Bulwer—"The Pilgrims of the Rhine." I will read it again.

I can come to the conclusion, that the Dialogue entitled "The Bride," is included under this question of morals, only by supposing that a general application was made of sentiments which were designed to apply to a particular instance alone. A lady about to pledge her faith, to one whose only recommendations are his title and his wealth, is won back by a sister artist, to her earlier vow of spending life with her, in the study of painting; to which art, with all the enthusiasm which obtains under European Institutions, they had been early and passionately devoted. Now, there is nothing strange in such a combination of circumstances. No social institution, however wise in itself, and however much it may promote the happiness of those who enter it; can, from the vicissitudes of human existence, and the freedom of thought and action, exercise a universal control: and to me there is something very like the spirit of Limitarianism, in denying to one, who is able to do it, the privilege of throwing over his or her pathway, the romance of feeling and genius, merely because that pathway is different from the one which we have chosen.

I have been so wearied, at public exhibitions, with common-place, and worn out subjects, that the beautiful dialogue which has fallen under censure, was to me the possession of a gem, and as such, I am confident that it was received, by very many who heard it. I knew that I had to please an audience of sufficient literary taste, to make "a worship of the beautiful," whether they found it glowing beneath the hand of culture, or springing wild and lone, as the desert flower—an audience who could do homage to genius, whether they saw him hovering over the sanctuaries of sacred and time-honored institutions; or soaring in the fields of light and purity, free as the bird of heaven.

I wish to repeat, that I respect the right of private opinion. I do not wonder that people should think differently of the same thing. Literary taste is often as dissimilar in different individuals, as their taste in dress. Then we always associate more or less of our own private feelings, with every thing we hear, and "the accidents of life teach different lessons to different hearts."

I would say, in conclusion, that while I feel grateful to the stranger who interested himself for the school with which I am associated, I protest against the question "what was their moral tendency?" To Mr. C—— this was the natural, perhaps the careless expression of a thought—to me, it brings the fear of being thought capable of introducing upon that stage, either designedly, or ignorantly, pieces of a doubtful moral tendency. This would be to make me a traitress to the Institution whose interests are so watched over, and prayed for, by the wise and good. It would make me unworthy the memory of the hours of improvement and pleasure I have spent within its halls; and unworthy the love and the confidence of the dear girls who look to me for counsel and example. Very respectfully, L. M. BARKER.

LETTER

TO REV. ZECHARIAH EDDY, OF SHERIDEN, CHAUTAUQUE COUNTY, N. Y.

SIR—Having heard that you were soon to leave Sheriden, and had already asked a dismission from the Presbyterian society, I feel it my duty once more, in behalf of the Universalists in this county, to call on you for the names of those individuals, against whose moral characters you circulated certain reports, which it was, and is still, believed were entirely unfounded in truth. The reasonableness of this request, and the necessity of your giving an answer to it, will be perceived by all who know what the charges were, which were preferred.

Many have been the inquiries whether you had made known the result of your deliberations on the subject in question. Although you endeavored to evade the charges, still, you never denied them, but said, you "should deliberate long, before you should give the names" of the persons whose Christian character you assailed. We have waited "long," but you have remained silent.

You, undoubtedly, are desirous that the members of your society should lead virtuous lives.—This is as it should be. Do you believe your Christian neighbor has equally as strong a desire that the people of his charge should maintain good Christian characters? If not, do you possess that charity that thinketh no evil?

Unquestionably, your mind tells you that I am anxious that the members of every Universalist society should be as exemplary in their Christian character, as you can be that yours should. You know, and every minister of the Gospel knows, that there is nothing (but a guilty conscience) that wrings the heart in sorrow, like seeing or hearing of vicious conduct in those who are under his care. What care and anxiety, and what solicitude is there on the part of the minister of Christ, as he watches over the members of his flock, as he endeavors to show them the importance of becoming careful guardians over their thoughts, words and actions! So it is with the kind and faithful father, as he extends his care and watchfulness over his children. He sets before them good examples, and uses all the means in his power to make them just, temperate, virtuous and honest members in society. And what must be his feelings, when he is told by his neighbor, that two of his children have been guilty of stealing! Not knowing which of his children had thus fallen into temptation, he earnestly inquires (how reasonable the request, Br. Eddy!) of his friend, who says he saw them commit theft, which of his sons had been guilty of purloining; assuring his neighbor that he should be very grateful to him for the information, that he might administer disciplinary correction and reclaim them from their waywardness, and restore them to paths of wisdom and virtue. He listens with breathless anxiety to hear their names called, that he may lay upon them the rod of their transgressions, and the stripes for their iniquities, though his loving kindness he will not utterly take from them, nor suffer his faithfulness to fail. The report has gone abroad that two of his children are thieves. But what must be his astonishment, when his neighbor declares that he knows who they are, but that he shall "deliberate a long time" before he will tell! and would not the good sense of community "more than half-suspect" that he had uttered sentiments that were not true, against the innocent?

I think your mind must now be prepared to see the light in which you are received, by those who think their characters have been wilfully misrepresented, and you can not but see that the public opinion is against you in this affair. I envy you not your situation nor your feelings. You have publicly stated that you saw the "leading Universalists of Sheriden, at a tavern, when returning home from an association—that they were cursing and drinking, swearing and carousing, and telling what damned good preaching they had." When called upon by me in a friendly, Christian manner, to give the names of the individuals, that "they might be held up before community as the objects of just censure and exemplary correction," you gravely told us that you should deliberate long first: I shall be happy to see you extricate yourself from the unenviable situation in which you have placed yourself, and none will more readily extend the mantle of charity, when I behold signs of repentance. Yourself, and the members of your society in Sheriden, and the world around you, must see now the only alternative to which you are driven; either to retract what you have said detrimental to the moral character of your neighbors, or prove your assertions by giving their names, or still go on without shewing to the world that you intend to maintain a character of truth and veracity. I am, Sir, yours very faithfully,

SUPPORT AND CONSOLATION IN SICKNESS.

When in the wise providence of our heavenly Father, we are afflicted with sickness and distress—when our strength departs, and our bodies seem about crumbling to the dust—when disease is the constant companion of our pillow by day and by night, and the angel of death stands ready to hurry us away to the dark and silent tomb, how sweet and refreshing at such times, is the religion of Jesus! How it calms our fears, stills the voice of our complaints, hushes the tremulous tones of anxiety and sorrow, and allays our darkest doubts! Truly, religion is the comforter of the afflicted, and the sweet soother of the sorrowful and distressed. And when, in seasons of sickness and affliction, we are unattended and alone, with no kind and affectionate friends to cool our burning and feverish brow, and smooth our pillow of distress and languishing; the holy religion of Christ comes with its heavenly and sanctifying influences,

"Lays the rough path of peevish nature even,
And opens in our hearts a little heaven."

And although for weeks, and months, and even years, perchance, we are compelled to resign ourselves to the couch of sickness and languishing, uncheered by a view of the beauteous prospect which nature has spread out around us, and are unable to share in the pleasures and amusements of the gay and busy multitudes, who throng the theatre of active life, still, if the religion of Jesus be the constant and unfailing companion of our pillow, if the bright beams of the "Sun of Righteousness" enlighten our minds, and the sweet influences of the holy spirit warm and cheer our hearts, we feel that we are not alone though friends may forget, and loved ones desert us.

And when, at last, we shall be called "to pass through the dark valley of the shadow of death"—when "our hearts and our flesh fail," and life's dim taper is burning low and faintly within us, the religion of Jesus will amply sustain us, even in that trying season; we shall be enabled to wrap ourselves up in the broad mantle of universal benevolence, calmly smile at the approach of death and the grave, and ride secure and

"Unhurt, amid the war of elements,
The wreck of matter, and the crash of worlds."

And when, at times, the power of faith is strong, and the hopes which the Gospel inspires are clear and vigorous within us, with what a feeling of pity and commisseration, do we look upon the poor and benighted skeptic, wandering about in the dark labyrinths of doubt and unbelief, "without hope, and without God in the world." With no heaven towards which to steer his frail bark of life, and no hope of a happy and glorious immortality beyond the grave, to buoy him up in seasons of distress and despondency, how dark and cheerless must be his prospect!

Who would willingly and without regret, exchange the glorious and cheering hopes for the future which the Gospel inspires, for dark, chilling, and dreary annihilation! Who would willingly exchange the hope of rising to immortal life, and glory, and never-ending felicity in the future state, for the low and degraded anticipation of becoming "like the brutes that perish," and sinking to nought! Oh!

"There is a hope, and 'tis fadeless and bright,
As the star that gleams through the cloudless night—
No cloud can obscure it—no storm can destroy
Its brilliance and beauty, its rapture and joy—
For it beameth afar in a lovelier clime,
Beyond the commotions and tempests of time.
'Tis the hope of the better and brighter shore—
When the perils and partings of life are o'er—
Where the fountain of gladness will never run dry,
Where the tear shall be wiped from each mourner's eye,
And where the sad blightings of sorrow, at last,
Shall seem like a fancy-formed dream of the past."

THE PROMISES OF GOD.

"Heaven and earth shall pass away: but my words shall not pass away." Mark xiii: 31.

What a consoling and glorious assurance has the Christian in the above paragraph! What a pleasing and happifying reflection, that, though heaven and earth shall pass away, the promises of Christ shall never fail; that his gracious declarations shall be filled. What greater assurance need we ask than this voluntary avowal of our Saviour. It behooves us all, and in a special manner, the sick and afflicted; the melancholy and desponding; the unfortunate and wretched, to examine those "exceeding great and precious promises" proclaimed to us in the Gospel, and which our Saviour has said, shall never pass away; meaning that they shall be fulfilled. "I came into the world to seek and save that which was lost." "All the Father giveth me, shall come to me, and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." "The Father loveth the Son, and hath put all things in his hands; that of all he hath given me, I should lose nothing, but raise it again at the last day." "All flesh shall see the salvation of God." "Every knee shall bow, every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." "God will have all men to be saved and come unto a knowledge of the truth," etc. These are some of the words of Christ, which he declares shall never fail; that all shall come to pass. Having a knowledge, then, of these assuring words of our Redeemer, and also, that, as he liveth, they shall never fail; who can fear or shake at the alarm of death? Who dares to say that these promises shall perish, and lie among forgotten things? No one! On the contrary, they are a never-failing source of consolation in the darkest hours of our earthly pilgrimage. They mitigate the severity of temporary suffering, sweeten the cup of misfortune, alleviate the weariness of adversity, and crown us in the trying agonies of dissolving nature, with happiness and peace. Br. MONTGOMERY—As you have become one of the Corresponding Editors of the Magazine and Advocate, I take the liberty of addressing you in relation to a sentiment you advanced in the Magazine of August 24th. You there state—"Now there is not a single instance in the New Testament, where the phrase 'kingdom of God,' or 'kingdom of heaven,' occurs, that has any other allusion than to the Gospel dispensation." In all this you may be correct, but if so, dear brother, what is the meaning of the declaration of St. Paul, contained in his first letter to the Corinthians, xv: 50?—"Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption."

The apostle, it appears to me, is here speaking of a "kingdom of God" which the children of men will enjoy after they shall have been done with flesh and blood. If you carefully examine this chapter throughout, as you doubtless have done many times, I think you will come to the conclusion that St. Paul is treating of the resurrection of the dead to a 'kingdom of God' which can not fully be enjoyed while confined to flesh and blood, or to a state where mortality is not swallowed up of life.

I do not desire in the least to provoke a controversy with you, by addressing you in this manner, but simply to ascertain the truth.

Yours, fraternally, J. P. ATKINSON.

BIGOTRY AND SUPERSTITION,

WITH THE GOSPEL METHOD OF DESTROYING THEM.

When reading "the Life and Times of Rev. George Whitefield," by Mr. Philip, I was much struck with the spirit of the following extract in reference to some remarks made by Mr. Whitefield, "that the partition wall of bigory and party spirit is broken down" in Wales:—

"Any thing that would lessen the impression of these concluding remarks, would be ill-timed and in bad taste; but still it would be improper, even if it were possible, to forget that this fall of 'the partition wall of bigotry and party spirit,' has, like the fall of popish Babylon, too often been celebrated before the time, by sanguine and Catholic men. It is now nearly a century since Whitefield said that it was fallen. Good man! he thought that the whole wall had surely given way, whenever he found an unexpected breach in it, at which he could enter with the Gospel, even if he was pelted with the broken fragments. So other good men thought and said, during the novelty of Bible and missionary societies.—Then, not only was the partition wall declared to be fallen, but bigotry was registered in the bills of mortality, and said to be buried forever. And yet, even now that there is a far nobler spirit of reformation gone forth in the church, than ever Whitefield saw, or than the first friends of our great societies anticipated, the wall is higher than ever, and has, of late, had a coping of broken glass and rusty spikes laid upon it. There is, indeed, a sense, in which, like Babylon, it is somewhat fallen; but the great and final 'fall thereof' is yet to come in the case of both. Neither will fall, however, like the walls of Jericho, at one crash, nor by one crisis; although both will be overthrown by one process—by bearing around them the ark of the covenant, with the sound of its own trumpets."

The person who examines the religious communities of America and probes all their feelings and cherished influences, will have no reason to conclude that the middle wall of bigotry and party spirit is broken down.—For, though the wall is somewhat lessened in height and thickness, and is not guarded by the fearful watch-towers of the inquisition, nor are its night fires made of faggots to burn heretics, yet, it is not, like the temple of Jerusalem, thrown down so that not one stone lies upon another. The harsh spirit and jealous hardness existing between various sects—the opposition which an individual meets, who is compelled to adopt a faith contrary to that of the church to which he has hitherto attached himself—the attempts which are frequently made to destroy the business of an individual, who settles in a place with an unpopular sentiment—the constant attempts to prevent people from hearing doctrines diverse from their own, and the misrepresentations of those doctrines in order to render the attempts more successful—the slander which weaker sects are compelled to bear, however honest and sincere they may be in the belief and promulgation of their faith—all prove that though the beast is deprived of its most venomous stings, yet its spirit exists and its evil disposition operates. And its spirit and disposition will continue to operate, until persecution, in every form and shape, shall die, and its grave shall be guarded by that Christian charity which recognizes the entire freedom of mind in searching after truth.

But though the wall of superstition and bigotry is not levelled with the dust of oblivion, yet the time must and will come, when its proud power shall be palsied, and like Sampson, it shall be shorn of its strength. As sure as the Lord liveth, the period is approaching, when no more fogs and miasmas shall arise from the swamps of persecution; when its gloom shall no longer darken the advancement of Christianity; when mind shall be no more prostrated by its sickening influence; and when its sluggish waters shall be dried up, and the moral soil shall bloom with truth, virtue and that love which ever exhibits the spirit of the good Samaritan.

This object, however, can be accomplished only by the principles and spirit of Christianity. Superstition and persecution can never be conquered by severity and harshness. Flame will not put out flame—evil will not subdue evil. Good will overcome evil—liberality will destroy illiberality—kindness will change enmity into love. Therefore, in order to prostrate the wall of persecution, the trumpets of Christian principle must every where be heard, proclaiming the glorious truth, that in order to love God, Christians must love his children; a fact, which is the perfect antipode of persecution in any of its forms. No sword of unkindness must be used, no fire of revenge must be hurled. Error must be met with truth, war with peace, animosity with goodness, reproaches with blessings, and curses with prayers. Let these powers be universally exhibited in the Christian church, and practiced by all professors, and the wall will fall like the walls of Jericho, and no one shall build it again "forever."

No partial system of religion can effect this object.—For, if any considerable number of people continue to believe that our "Father in heaven" will build up an endless wall of distinction between his children in another world, on one side of which is endless joy, and on the other endless wo, there will always be enough on earth, who will imitate him, who will build up walls between themselves and what they call heresy, and thus perpetuate persecution and bigotry in the Christian church.

Therefore, brethren and sisters of the Abrahamic faith, this work, under God, remains with us. We believe that God loves all. Let us practice this faith fully in all its spirit, and persecution will ultimately, though gradually, retire from the earth. Not only let us ever be mild, but when conversing on religious subjects, instead of everlastingly picking the opinions of other people to pieces, let us "be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear." And when a foe stands before us, however bitter, angry and virulent he may be, let us overcome his evil with our good, by loving our enemies, blessing them that curse us, and praying for those who despitefully use and persecute us. A constant exhibition of these principles, will surely prostrate the wall of bigotry and party spirit, so that all will know the fulness of the love of Christ. Oh, believers in the truth, pray that the grace of God may enable you to defend the doctrine better, to grow in its spirit more heartily, and to practice its precepts more earnestly!

"THE LAKE OF FIRE."

REVELATION XX: 12-15.

"And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works. And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them: and they were judged every man according to their works. And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death. And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire."

We are now prepared fully to enter on the consideration of the judgment spoken of in the text, in connexion with the "second death," "the lake of fire," etc. This we shall do by comparing the prophecies of the Old Testament in reference to such subjects, with what we believe to be their fulfilment, as here re-predicted.

1. Daniel describes precisely such a judgment as is named in our text, and confines its fulfilment to the beginning of the Christian dispensation—when the mediatorial kingdom was given to Jesus. "I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit,..... .....thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set and the books were opened.....I saw in the night visions, and behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him, and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages should serve him," etc. Dan. vii: 9-14. Here the same language is used as in our context—the throne is set, the judgment established, the books are opened, and innumerable multitudes are gathered before God and Jesus. And all this was to be when the kingdom was given to Jesus; not when, (as declared 1 Cor. xv: 24,) "Jesus shall deliver up the kingdom to God, the Father"—or, at the resurrection to immortality. Further proof that this judgment took place at the establishment of the Christian dispensation, will be found by carefully comparing John v: 28, 29, with Dan. xii; 1, 2—where it is declared that "every one that shall be found written in the book," (i. e. "the book of life," named in our text,) shall be delivered, and the rest condemned. And all this was to take place when "Michael, the great prince" (i. e. Christ) should stand up for the children of Zion; or, as the same verse has it, when "there shall be a time of trouble, such as there never was since there was a nation, even to that same time." Do you ask when this time was? Jesus informs us expressly, by comparing Matt. xxiv: 16-21 with xxiv: 31.

But we are not yet done with this corroborative testimony of the Old and New Testaments. Read carefully, Dan. xii: 4-12 and compare it with Christ's quotation and application of this very prophecy, in Matt. xxiv: 15, 16, and you must, I think, be convinced that the judgment commenced with the destruction of Jerusalem.

2. What, then, are we to understand by "the lake of fire"? I know that it has long been supposed to mean a pit in the eternal state, filled with fire and brimstone—though lately the fire and brimstone are discarded by most of our opposers, and hell declared to be a place where conscience, only, is the tormentor! But still it is argued that the lake of fire is emblematic of a place of endless misery, because it is declared, Rev. xx: 10, that the devil "was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night, forever and ever." I answer, that even Cruden admits that opposers of the Gospel—the persecuting Jews, are called the devil—that he was punished where there was day and night, periods of time that do not exist in the eternal state; and that the phrase "forever and ever" is used to denote temporal punishment, in a parallel passage in Isaiah xxxiv: 8-10. "And the streams thereof shall be turned into pitch, and the dust thereof into brimstone, and the land thereof shall become burning pitch. It shall not be quenched night nor day; the smoke thereof shall go up for ever; from generation to generation it shall lie waste; none shall pass through it forever and ever. But the cormorant and the bittern shall possess it; the owl also, and the raven shall dwell in it," etc. Here, then, speaking in the figurative language of the prophet and the revelator, is "a lake of fire and brimstone" whose smoke ascendeth up forever, and which none shall pass through forever and ever; and yet cormorants, bitterns, owls and ravens dwell in it; and which even men now dwell in!

The lake of fire and brimstone, then, simply means a land made desolate by war and famine, and the inhabitants of which are reduced to beggary and bondage, and driven forth to exile, and continual heaviness, and anguish, and sorrow of heart—and such was—such is, the land of Judea and its ill-fated, miserable children, our Hebrew brethren yet in unbelief! Remember, that "the lake of fire," and "the second death," are used as synonymous terms—consequently, thatwhen I come to show what is meant by the second death, the proof here adduced, must correspond therewith.

If you wish to see fire—intense fire used as an emblem of severe national judgments—even the destruction of the Jewish people, and their dispersion among the Heathen—turn to Ezekiel xxii: 19-22, where Jerusalem is declared to be God's furnace, in which he will melt the people in the fire of his wrath, as silver is melted in the midst of the furnace.

As the plain where Sodom and Gomorrah stood, continued to burn until A. D. 130 to 150—having burned nearly 2000 years—it is very probable that the Revelator referred to it by the phrase "lake of fire," as well as to the language we have quoted from Isaiah. Some have supposed the phrase to mean what is called "the general conflagration of the earth"—but this would be an ocean rather than a lake of fire. Besides this notion of a general conflagration at the end of time, has as little Scripture to stand on, as the common notion of a general judgment day in eternity—that is to say, none at all. Both are Heathen notions, and have been foisted into pure Christianity during the declension and apostacy of the church, to the corruption of its doctrines, the perversion of the sacred records, the injury of Christian morals, and the disgust of its rational, and the terror of its timid friends.

Next week I will attend to the meaning of the phrase, "the second death."

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS....NO. X.

"As the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion." Ps. cxxxiii: 3.

The important thought to which this passage gives rise, is, why is the dew of Hermon so particularly referred to? Was it different from any other dew? It is a well known fact, that dews fall very copiously in Palestine, and answer partly in the room of rain. When Maundrell was at mount Hermon, he says, that "with this dew, even in dry weather, their tents were as wet as if it had rained the whole night." To what a beautiful idea this leads us! to think that the Lord, when all nature is asleep, and man is wrapped in forgetful helplessness, and the skies impart no rain, causes the copious dews to fall in order to refresh and invigorate the abundance of the earth, and to keep vegetation from perishing, is a most affecting thought, and one that makes us vividly remember what the beloved apostle said, "God is love;" for his rich dews, as well as his rain and fertilizing, glorious sun, fall on the evil and unthankful, on the just and unjust.

Having shown the fact in regard to the dews of Hermon, let me now refer to the use made of it by the Psalmist, and if we do not admit that its use is beautiful, and the subject it illustrates most worthy of consideration, then I am mistaken. "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!—It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, Aaron's beard; that went down to the skirts of his garments; as the dew of Hermon and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion: for there the Lord commanded the blessing, even life for evermore." Ps. cxxxiii. How important! Not only is the unity of brethren delightfully comparable to the rich dews of Hermon, and as refreshing to the soul as those dews are to nature, but the Lord commands his blessing where it exists, even spiritual life. Who does not know this to be true? The history of the world is a comment upon it. You may examine man, from the nation to the individual, from the king to the peasant; and wherever you find quarrelling and contention, you will not discover the blessing of the Lord, but you will find a fruitful place for all manner of vice. But not so where love and peace dwell. There the smile of the Lord is. How refreshing is the scene of a number of brethren and sisters, who kindly advise each other in the path of life, and are free from slander; who joyfully meet on the day of worship to praise the Lord of all blessing; who sit down in good feeling to the sacramental table, in remembrance of the love of Christ, recalling all his devotedness to the cause of human improvement, and his heavenly character, that they may catch a spark of his divine benevolence, and learn to be good to all around them. There the blessing of the Lord is poured out—there all the Christian graces are cultivated, and every good work is practiced.

"How blest the sacred tie that binds
In union sweet, according minds!
How swift the heavenly course they run,
Whose hearts, whose faith, whose hopes are one.
Their streaming eyes together flow
For human guilt and mortal wo;
Their ardent prayers together rise,
Like mingling flames in sacrifice.
Their hearts together seek the place
Where God reveals his smiling face;
How high, how strong their raptures swell,
There's none but kindred souls can tell.
Nor shall the gloomy flame expire
When nature droops her sickening fire;
Then shall they meet in realms above,
A heaven of joy, because of love."

NOTE.

I find that the readers of the Advocate do not understand the reason why I withhold the title Rev. from, and attach Esq. to, the names of A. Campbell and S. E. Shepard, The reason simply is, they refuse to have the title Rev. joined to their names.

THE RECORD.

CONVENTIONS.—The South Carolina Convention of Universalists met August 3d, in Newberry district—Br. A. Fuller, Moderator; and A. R. Able, Clerk. Appointed A. Feaster, Fairfield; J. Williams, Anderson, and D. Cook, Charleston, Standing Committee for the year—A. Fuller to deliver the next occasional sermon—and a large committee, (of which Br. A. Fuller, Double Branches, Pickens district, is Chairman,) to ascertain what sections desire circuit preaching, and the sums that can be raised to support it; returns to be made to the Chairman, as above address. Br. Mullikin was ordained, sermon by Br. Fuller. Sermons were also delivered by Brs. Andrews, Linch and Mullikin. Circular by Br. Andrews.

Adjourned to meet at Huntsville meeting-house in Laurens district, on the Friday preceding the first Sunday in August, 1839—for a session of three days.

The Vermont Convention met in Randolph, evening of August 25th. Br. J. E. Palmer, Moderator, Brs. W. S. Ballou and T. Barron, Clerks. Appointed Brs. Browning, Sampson, H. F. Ballou, and W. S. Ballou, Standing Committee on fellowship and ordination; Brs. Haven, W. Skinner, S. D. Walbridge, Jr., H. F. Ballou, and Sampson, Committee of discipline for the year; Br. H. F. Ballou to preach the next occasional sermon, and Br. Sampson, substitute; and Br. W. S. Ballou, to prepare the Minutes and Circular. The Committee of last year, reported ordination of Br. T. Barron. Br. Browning introduced a resolution, pledging efforts to abolish slavery, which not being sustained, Br. E. Ballou presented one, declaring the subject not properly within the jurisdiction of the Convention—that slavery, whether black or white, is opposed to the principles and spirit of the Gospel, but that it is inexpedient to pass resolutions "for or against abolition societies, or to agitate the subject of Southern slavery at all in our Councils, or any other political subject whatsoever"—which was adopted. Some alterations were made in the Constitution, and a vote of thanks passed for Br. W. Skinner's occasional sermon. Sermons were preached by Brs. Skinner, W. S. Ballou, Sanford, Haven, E. Ballou, Sampson, and R. Streeter. Twenty-five ministering brethren, and nine lay delegates from four Associations. Adjourned to meet in Bethel, on the evening preceding the fourth Wednesday in August, 1839.

The Connecticut Convention met in Middletown, August 29th. Br. J. Clark, Moderator, and Br. F. Hitchcock, Clerk. Appointed Br. Case to preach the next occasional sermon; Brs. Case, Bulkeley and Stickney, Committee on fellowship and ordination for the year—Brs. A. Cooke, (Middletown), J. W. Crawford, (New-London), and E. Denslow, (Hartford), Committee of discipline for the year; and the Clerk to prepare the Minutes, etc. Recommended the establishment of Universalist Sunday and other schools; instructed the delegates to the U. S. Convention to urge upon that body the necessity of respect to the acts of discipline of the State Conventions; recommended to each Association to take measures to secure a full statistical report of itself to the State Convention; and voted thanks to Br. Moore for his occasional sermon. Seven ministering and seventeen lay delegates were present, also three visiting ministers. Sermons were preached by Brs. Everett, T. J. Sawyer, Williamson, Moore, Case, and Hitchcock.—Adjourned to meet in Hartford.

N. B. Each of the above Conventions chose delegates to the U. S. Convention.

ASSOCIATIONS.—The Pittsburg Association met in Elizabethtown, Va., August 4th. Br. D. R. Biddlecom, Chairman, Br. E. R. Crocker, Clerk. Brs. Crocker, Davis, and W. Baldwin, Committee on fellowship and ordination. Brs. Cox, J. Riggs and D. Terrel, Committee of discipline; S. A. Davis, Standing Clerk. Br. Crocker to designate the place of next meeting. The next Quarterly Conference to be held in Steubenville, Ohio, on the last Saturday and following Sunday in October. Appointed delegates to the Ohio State Convention. Sermons were preached by Brs. Biddlecom, Davis, and Chappel, assisted by Brs. Cox and Crocker.—Adjourned to meet on the first Saturday and following Sunday in August, 1839.

The Murray Association met in Ohio City, August 25th. Br. R. Farley, Moderator; Br. H. P. Sage, Clerk. Br. Sage Standing Clerk, vice Br. Whitney, resigned. Brs. J. Sage, E. Mallory and A. A. Coe, Committee of discipline. Brs. Dinsmore, Sage and E. Stearns, Committee on fellowship and ordination for the year. Br. Dinsmore to preach the next occasional sermon, and Br. Tenny, substitute. Standing Clerk to prepare the Minutes, etc. Granted fellowship to the first Universalist society in Sharon, Medina county, and a certificate to Br. R. Farley as a regularly ordained minister in our denomination. Resolutions were passed recognizing ordination when regularly conferred by other Christian denominations—recommending the observance of the eucharist at each session of the Association—the publication of withdrawals of fellowship—the delegates to report the numerical strength, Gospel privileges, and state of Sunday schools in their societies—and pledging their efforts to "establish permanently the Universalist Institute at Ohio City, by inducing our friends generally to patronize the school, and aid in its funds." Delegates were appointed to the Ohio State Convention.—Five sermons were preached. Six preachers (Brs. Whitney, Dinsmore, Farley, Hoag, Sage and Hull,) were present. Lay delegation not named. Adjourned to meet in Huntington, Lorain county, on the second Wednesday and following Thursday in February, 1839.

The Kennebec Association met in Wayne village, Me., August 30th. C. C. Burr, Moderator; J. T. Gilman, Clerk; W. A. Drew, Gilman, and Mandell, Standing Committee on fellowship and discipline; Drew to appoint the time and place for next session, and Clerk to prepare the Minutes. Delegates were appointed to the State Convention, and a resolution to the memory of S. A. Sneathen, deceased, was passed. The first society in Carthage was received into fellowship. Adjourned without day.

The Rockingham Association met in South Hampton, N. H., August 29th. M. Ballou, Moderator, and J. Shrigley, Clerk. Br. Shrigley to deliver the next occasional sermon. The Clerk to prepare the Minutes.—Appointed delegates to the State Convention, and received the first society in Hampstead, N. H., into fellowship. Sermons were preached by Brs. M. and H. Ballou, Bacon, Thompson and T. Whittemore, and Conference meetings held on Wednesday evening and Thursday morning. Five preachers from New-Hampshire—sixteen from Massachusetts, and one from Vermont, were present, besides fourteen lay delegates. Adjourned to meet in Hampstead, N. H, on the last Wednesday (and following day) in August, 1839.

The York, Cumberland and Oxford Association met in Portland, Me., evening of September 4th. Br. J. C. Churchill, Moderator, and Br. G. K. Shaw, Clerk.—Brs. Tenney, Stevens and Churchill, Committee on fellowship and discipline. Br. Burr and others, to confer with the Trustees of Westbrook Seminary, and take measures to get it into successful operation. G. K. Shaw, to appoint time and place for next meeting.—Clerk to prepare Minutes, etc. Resolutions were passed in favor of temperance by temperate means, and of thanks to the First Unitarian Parish for the use of their house—the Portland friends for their hospitality—and to the officers of the session. "The Universalist societies of Bridgton, Fryeburg and Dixfield" [Query—of Fryeburg and of Dixfield—i. e. two societies or three?] were received into fellowship. A resolution in favor of a Theological Seminary was rejected by a nearly unanimous vote. Six sermons were preached. Thirteen preachers, and forty-seven lay delegates from twenty societies, were present. [Well done!] Adjourned without day.

NEW PREACHERS.—Br. Thomas says in the Union, that Br. James Gallacher, of Philadelphia, has commenced preaching with excellent prospects of usefulness in the good work. Ivory Chamberlain of Exeter, N. H., is a new name enumerated among the preachers present at the Rockingham Association. Brs. G. W. Gage and J. S. Kibbe, late students in the Clinton Liberal Institute, both young men of good talents and character, have commenced preaching the word of truth.

INSTALLATIONS.—Br. Wm. Fishbough was installed pastor of the society in Southold, Long Island, on September 26th. Br. E. G. Brooks, in East Cambridge, Mass., September 16th—sermon by Br. O. A. Skinner. Br. G. Messinger, in Springfield, Ohio, July 26th—sermon by Br. Soder, assisted by Brs. Emmit, West and Strong. Brs. Emmit and West preached in the afternoon and evening of the same day.

REMOVALS.—Br. N. Doolittle has removed from North Norwich to Norwich village, where he wishes to be addressed in future. Br. N. Brown, late of Henrietta, wishes in future to be addressed at Salina, Onondaga county. Br. D. D. Smith, of Portland, Me., has agreed to remove to Gloucester, Mass., to become assistant pastor with the venerable father Jones. Br. C. C. Burr, of Hallowell, Me., is to supply his place in Portland.—Br. S. C. Bulkeley, of Danbury, Conn., has received an invitation to settle with the society in Newmarket, N. H.

NEW MEETING-HOUSES.—The frame of a new meeting-house was raised in Holliston, Mass., August 9th. Size, 40 by 50 feet. Br. J. Skinner, pastor of the society.—Another was dedicated in Springfield, Ohio, July 25th. Sermon by Br. Messinger. The corner stones of two new houses, were laid in Boston, August 14th and 16th. The houses are for the first and fifth societies—the house of the former having been torn down. A meeting-house, to be called the "Murray Chapel," is to be erected soon, about 40 miles from Macon, Georgia. There is need for, and ability to build more in our land.

A church of 33 members was recognized in Waltham, Mass., September 13th. Sermon by Br. O. A. Skinner—eucharist administered by Br. S. Streeter.

A new society has been organized in New-York city, and worship for the present in Apollo Hall, under the pastoral care of Br. Whittaker. As the old society, formerly worshipping under the pastoral care of Mr. Mitchell, is extinct, this forms the third (not the fourth, as some of our periodicals state,) in that city.

Br. Elmore Williams, of Cincinnati, Ohio, offers a donation of twenty dollars towards the erection of each Universalist meeting-house that may be built within twenty miles of that city.

The A. Campbell who attacked Br. Manford, as stated in this paper a few weeks since, is not Alexander Campbell who is now discussing with Br. Skinner; but another man of the same name and faith. Br. Gurley says that Mr. Skinner's opponent has not so great a reputation west of the mountains, as we at the east seem to suppose. The west says, it is not with us, and the east says, we have it not! A. THE FLOWER AND THE INFANT.

I stood beside the turf green sod,
Where bloom'd a beauteous rose,
An infant slept beneath the sod,
In death's profound repose.

The flower was fair, surpassing fair—
Fit emblem of the child,
Affection's hand had plac'd it there,
And nature on it smil'd.

Methinks the flow'r was water'd well
By fond affection's tear,
And long will faithful mem'ry tell
How friendship linger'd there.

Bloom on sweet flow'r, and grace the spot
Where innocence reclines;
The babe, tho' dead, is not forgot,
It blooms in happier climes. LA MOTTE.

COMPETENCY OF TESTIMONY.

Messrs. EDITORS.—I herewith send you an extract upon this subject from the decision of Chancellor Dessaussure, in the case of ELIZABETH FERNANDIS et al. vs. WM. HENDERSON, in which Charles Jones, a Universalist, was a witness, and objected to on the grounds of denying the doctrine of future rewards and punishments. All of South Carolina. S. J. M.

"The question of the competency of this person to be a witness, has been fully and indeed ingeniously argued, and I am now to decide upon it. It is one of great importance to this citizen and to others who think like him, as well as to the community at large. For if he and they are excluded from giving evidence in courts of justice, they would be a proscribed and degraded class; many of whose rights would be prostrated. They could not prove their books of account in court as merchants; they could not support prosecutions for injuries, and violences committed on their person out of sight of other witnesses. Women entertaining these opinions might be exposed to lawless violations in private without protection—murders might be committed on other persons with impunity in the presence of this excluded and degraded caste; and above all, the exclusion of these persons from being witnesses, might be the commencement of a system of exclusions and distinctions of classes among the citizens, entirely at variance with our liberal institutions and our republican government. These were the bane of the ancient republics, as well as of the modern republics of Italy, and engendered those hatreds and civil feuds which ruined them all. They deeply injured the Swiss republics. These evils ought to be avoided if possible.

The object of testimony, is the attainment of truth.—It is the apprehension of obtaining falsehood instead of truth which has induced human tribunals to require the highest sanction which can be obtained. An appeal to the God of truth, in the manner deemed the most sacred and obligatory on his conscience, by the person offered as a witness, has been universally held to be the highest sanction. Jews and Gentiles, Europeans and Asiatics, ancients and moderns have resorted to and relied on this as the test of truth—the highest discovered by human wisdom.

In the case before us, the person offered as a witness believes in a supreme Being, a God who is the ruler of the universe and who is the avenger of falsehood. But in his creed that vengeance is poured out on the foresworn witness in this life and not in another state of existence. He believes the impious wretch can neither escape detection from the eye of Omniscience nor punishment from Omnipotence. It does appear to me that this is a sufficient sanction to guarantee the attainment of truth from a witness. It is said by very learned men that the Mosaic dispensation did not look beyond rewards and punishments in this life, and even in our Saviour's time, the Sadducees did not believe in a future state.—Yet oaths were required abundantly under that system as well as under all the heathen systems. There is yet another sanction drawn from human laws. Every witness knows that he gives evidence under penalties provided by human laws to punish falsehood in testimony.

What has made a great impression on my mind is, that the objection is of vast extent, the limits of which I can not perceive. It might exclude all those from being witnesses who do not believe in the eternity of punishments. It may exclude Roman Catholics who believe that punishments in another world may be avoided altogether by absolution, or diminished by masses and prayers. In short, I know not where the objection would stop in its operation, and it would be more mischievous in this country than in any other, because the unbounded liberty of conscience enjoyed by our citizens leads to many aberrations from the standard of belief which others think correct. The business of the Court is not with opinions.

There was another ground on which it is my duty to express an opinion. It was contended for the defendant that the witness was entitled to be sworn because the constitution of this State guaranteed liberty of conscience which would be violated by excluding citizens from being witnesses on account of their religious opinions. The 1st section of the 8th Article of the Constitution is that relied on. That section provides that the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship without discrimination or preference, shall forever hereafter be allowed within this State to all mankind, provided that the liberty thereby declared shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace and safety of the State. On the argument of the case, it was contended by the counsel who opposed the admission of Mr. Jones as a competent witness, that the inquiry into his religious opinions did not contravene this article of the Constitution; that he might still enjoy his religious profession and worship notwithstanding such exclusion, and that the exclusion would merely operate on his civil and not on his religious rights. I have considered this subject with attention, and am not satisfied with this argument. If a man's religious opinions are made a ground to exclude him from the enjoyment of civil rights, then he does not enjoy the freedom of his religious profession and worship. His exclusion from being a witness in Courts of Justice, is a serious inquiry to him; it is also degrading to him, and others who think with him. If men may be excluded for their religious opinions from being witnesses, they may be excluded from being Jurors or Judges, and the Legislature might enact a law excluding such persons from holding any other office, or serving in the Legislature, or becoming teachers of schools or professors of Colleges.

In my opinion this would be in the very teeth of the Constitution, and would violate the spirit of our institutions. I do not know in what that state of things would differ from the galling restraints of the Irish Roman Catholics, which have so long kept that beautiful country and that high spirited people in a state of degradation and misery, of discontent and rebellion. It would seem to me to be a mockery to say to men, you may enjoy the freedom of your religious profession and worship; but if you differ from us in certain dogmas and points of belief, you shall be disqualified and deprived of the rights of a citizen to which you would be entitled but for those differences of religious opinion. The proviso in the 1st section of the Constitution, states the sole limitation to the freedom of profession and worship. The restriction is upon acts and practices and not upon opinion. Now the belief in this case of Mr. Jones, who is objected to as a witness, that there will not be rewards and punishments in another state of existence for deeds done in this, is neither an act nor a practice—it is merely an opinion, a religious profession. He does believe in the punishment of evil deeds, but it is in this world, under the superintending providence of the omniscient God, who can never be deceived as to the import of human actions, or their motives. This I think gives a sufficient tie upon his conscience. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that on principle as well as on the provisions of the Constitution, Mr. Jones is a competent witness."

"From this decree there was an appeal, and the following decision made therein.

"The Court concur in opinion with the Chancellor in this case, and the decree is therefore affirmed.

ABRAHAM NOTT,
DAVID JOHNSON."

MARRIAGES.

In South Livonia, on the 10th ult., by Rev. O. Roberts, Rev. JACOB CHASE, pastor of the Universalist society in North Bloomfield, to Miss ALMIRA COE, daughter of John C. Coe.

In Perrinton, on the 18th ult., by Rev. S. Miles, Mr. LEWIS M. TERILL, to MIS. MABILL M. CURTIS, all of Perrinton.

In Norwich, on the 20th ult., by Rev. N. Doolittle, MR. OLNEY WINSOR, to Miss POLLY MONROE.

In Bainbridge, same day, by the same, MR. THOMAS STOCKWELL, to Miss ANN PARSONS.

DEATHS.

In Geneseo, on the 15th ult., GEORGE, son of Samuel and Anna Swift, aged 10 months. O. R.

In Green, August 26th, of consumption, Miss ROXANNA CRANDALL, aged 32 years.

Miss Crandall possessed a cultivated mind, improved and refined by education. Esteemed and beloved while living, she died lamented by parents, brothers, sisters, and a numerous circle of friends. Long will the remembrance of her virtues remain engraven upon the hearts of the living.

When the hope of recovery was yielded to the fatality of disease, she expressed the utmost calmness and resignation to the divine will. In the possession of that faith which is immovably founded upon the rock of ages, death appeared to her less a king of terrors than an angel of deliverance to conduct her from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the children of God. A few days previous to her death, she gave directions relative to her funeral, and requested the writer to perform the services. She spake with perfect composure of the time of her departure, believing that death temporal, would be the beginning of life eternal. She died in peace.

May the consolations of the same precious faith, prove a solace to the afflicted and bereaved family. N. D.

In New-Berlin, on the 18th ult., Mr. JOB HILL, aged 44 years. Mr. Hill was a highly respectable and intelligent citizen. In early life he united with the Freewill Baptist church, but afterwards became a believer in the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all men. He exemplified the principles of his doctrine by a well ordered life. His loss is deplored by an extensive circle of relatives and friends. May the consolations of the Gospel abundantly bless and comfort all that mourn. N. D.

In Hamburg, June 4th, Mrs. NANCY SLOCUM, aged 68 years. Funeral services by Br. J. Lewis, of Boston, N. Y.

In Hume, July 17th, WM. J. BUTLER, aged 18 years and 6 months.

In Randolph, July 21st, JAMES DANIELS, aged 49 years. He was killed instantly, by a blow upon the head from the lever of a windlass.

In Pike, August 8th, JONATHAN WILLARD, in his 61st year. Funeral services of the last three, by Br. J. Babcock, Hume.

In Champion, Jefferson county, July 16th, HARRIET, daughter of Mr. Richard Chase, aged 6 years. So fades the tender plant, but it shall bloom again in unfading glory.

In Denmark, Lewis county, July 20th, Miss HARRIET HAMMOND, daughter of Br. Benjamin Hammond, in the 20th year of her age. The bereaved parents, fond brothers, and tender sisters, relatives, friends and neighbors, evinced by their tears on the funeral occasion, the strength of their affections for the deceased, but like the mown grass she is withered, yet unlike the fallen grass and faded flower, she shall rise to fall—to fade no more. Funeral discourses on the above occasions by J. F.

In Boston, Erie county, August 28th, DAVID FARNSWORTH, aged 38 years. Funeral discourse by Elder Fuller, Close Communion Baptist, of Eden.—Br. Farnsworth died a Universalist. This remark is made here, solely because it is reported that he renounced Universalism just before his death, which report, I am authorized to say, is totally false. From respect to the feelings of his aged parents, he consented that a Partialist might be invited to preach the funeral discourse.

May the parents, and all the connexions, especially the widow of the deceased, be comforted with that consolation which the preacher proffered not, even the comforting and sustaining power of that faith which is "the substance of things hoped for." J. LEWIS.

ELOQUENCE OF SYMPATHY.

Delivered at the Annual Exhibition of the Clinton Liberal Institute, August 29, 1838.

BY J. M. ELWOOD.

Sympathy, the solace of affliction, and the inexhaustible fountain of consolation! Mysterious, godlike and inscrutable power, whose magic ray is the mellow light that gently falls upon the night-wave of sorrow—the common ligament of sensibility—the talisman of mercy—the burning spark lighted up in the soul, that speaks the dignity of man and declares his emanation from the uncreated Spring of love! Sympathy, the oratory of nature—the unimpassioned fervor of the soul—its simple note is eloquence—its strains are the inspiration of immortality its chorus is the swelling symphony that tunes the harps of angels—and its echo is the voice of God! The common treasure of the suffering—'tis as exhaustless as infinity, as universal as man. Its influence is uncircumscribed by civilization and all refinement. Wherever affliction's plaintive tone is heard—wherever degraded man repines the luckless victim of capricious fortune, there flow its healing waters.—Whether the gelid iceberg frowns amid the sterner realities of nature, or torrid sands present a more tolerable aspect—whether civilization holds its genial sway, or degradation's tottered garb bespeaks the ferocity of barbarism, its eloquence is heard—its healing balm dispensed. But 'tis not the artful decoration of human effort, whose overcareful polish is the key-stone to that affectation which renders it impotent and powerless. The effusions of declamation—the studied arrangement of sentences—and the euphony of words, are pageantry that adorns only to burden. 'Tis not like genius, which rolls its silvery waters in one narrow channel; but, like some mighty river, which overflows its banks, diffusing verdure and fertility around. The spontaneous production of nature—like the wild-flower, it is no exotic; it sprung as free and bloomed as beautiful in the unpolished soul of the Virginia native,* as in the cultivation and refinement of a Howard.

But its eloquence is no less effectual than general. There is something in its appeal that forbids rejection—a magic in its numbers, that is overwhelming and resistless—a music more captivating and inspiring than the mystic tones of the Eolian lyre—a manner with which the polished periods of Cicero and the fulminations of Demosthenes can not compare. The wayward and wicked son, whose career was the emblem of Pandemonium, has sunk in penitence and risen in reformation by the simple, yet native and unaffected eloquence of a mother's tears; and even the bare recollection of parental anguish, when the maternal tongue was silent in death, has been the monitor that curbed the riotous outbreakings of his inclination, and the impetus that urged his footsteps to the highest summit of renown.

The culprit stands upon the scaffold. The relentless sword of human justice thirsts impatient for his blood. The eloquence of kindred feeling moves the trembling hearts that vibrate upon a kindred chord, and the turpitude of the crime is lost in commisseration of the victim's sufferings, and in the arrogance and presumption that dares exercise the prerogative of Heaven.

Misfortune's chill blast strikes upon the gay flower of innocence and hope, which has been reared and cultured with all the excessive fondness and overweening indulgence of parental desire. It withers the faded garland of ardent expectation and the blasted chord of intense and burning love. What, then, consoles the mourning bosom? When the earth falls upon the coffined relics, and the echo rising from the sepulchral cavern, sounds the requiem of earthly comfort, what then is the acarna whose vivid brightness illuminates the dismal recesses of the desoluted soul? 'Tis sympathy, memory setting on the soul-cheering communion of the past, and blending with the glowing visions in the vista of hope. 'Tis the soft whisperings emanating from the philanthropic soul of friendship, that break upon the ear of the disconsolate in accents of melody, and roll back the tide of accumulated wo. Friendship, the diamond pearl of life, with all its justly celebrated charms, is but the eloquence of sympathy; for without it, friendship is but a splendid name—a sun whose brightest beams are destitute of warmth—a wealth whose richest treasures are as worthless as the miser's hoard—a consolator in whose purest spring of solace is infused the sediments of despair.

Go—ask the self-willed exile from his native home, as he turns his feet towards the theatre of youth, where "fancy, fluttered on her wildest wing," why he yearns to revisit that home which a long and uninterrupted absence has so completely changed, that scarcely a solitary vestage remains by which to recognize its locality, and he will tell you, that sympathy, with the echoes of its infant eloquence, murmurs with irresistible persuasion, "come, greet thy kindred and thy country"—and that the sympathetic bond which linked kindred hearts in the incipiency of his years, has been rendered potent by the cementing wand of time. Yes,

> "Time but the impression stronger makes,
> As streams their channels deeper wear."

Forgiveness, the vestal deity of virtue—the golden amulet of friendship—the sanctuary of innocence—the ægis of life—is but the eloquence of sympathy. "Forgive them," was the simple strain that issued from the expiring, throe-rent soul on Calvary's brow; and I covet not that sensibility which perceives in it no eloquence, and finds in it no heaven. I seek not that godless perversity which can pronounce it but the ebullition of enthusiasm, or the chicanery of imposture. It has an eloquence that defies competition—an effect that paralyzes effort—and a duration that speaks the divinity of its author, and mocks the might of time to weaken, or eternity to destroy.

But, hush! the inarticulate farewell trembles on the quivering lip. How eloquent the emotions, how thrilling and unutterable the sensations of anxiety and dread, that struggle in the soul, as the heartfelt adieu—the pledge of parting friendship, is exchanged! In it there is an influence beyond the reach of language to express—a spirit that nerves the mind for the hour of peril—an eloquence speaking in the silent anguish that springs the tear—which causes sophistry to blush at the consciousness of its impotence, and from which the most determined obstinacy shrinks like the rose-bud of kindling anticipation from the forbidding touch of adversity Yet all revolve upon the golden axis, sympathy, whose shrine is decorated with the votive offerings of love and pleasure.—Without this invaluable boon, how dreary—how cheerless would be existence! Not a solitary ray would dart athwart the gloomy waste of life, to beacon the pathway of the pilgrim—no refreshing shower of gladness would pour its renovations into the human breast. The gilded drapery that adorns the couch of hope, would be but the sable hangings of bereavement's cell, and man would be but the hapless plaything of sorrow, and the unpitied victim of despair—

> "The wearer of a mad-man's garb,
> For whom e'en misery might weep!"

THE CHOICE OF MOSES.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS."

We are told in the Epistle to the Hebrews, that Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter—that he chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy sinful pleasures for a time. This wise, this patriotic, this self-sacrificing choice, may be meditated upon profitably, if we could thereby catch a little of the same virtuous resolution. During the first forty years of his life, Moses had been treated by the daughter of Pharaoh as her own son, and it is conjecture not altogether without probability, that he was designed ultimately to succeed to the crown. It is pretty certain, however, that he had received an education suitable to the grandson of a monarch—that he had cultivated all the learning of that age and country—and that his prospects of worldly advancement were of the brightest kind. But Moses also knew something of the peculiar character and destinies of his native people. He knew, probably, the promises which God made to Abraham. These promises, too, he seems to have believed despite the forbidding condition in which he found the descendents of that just man. A belief of these promises—sympathy for an oppressed and injured race—and love for his countrymen daily working in his soul, would destroy his love and relish for the luxuries, the gaieties, and the splendors with which he was surrounded. The iron bondage of his countrymen, would render pleasure ungrateful to his feelings. Conscience lent her aid in corroboration of the purposes to which these feelings prompted, and his situation, rank, and influence, seemed to mark him out as the deliverer of this chosen people. All these considerations, perhaps more, induced Moses cheerfully to resign the court of Egypt, and all his flattering prospects there, to follow in the path where duty led.

It may be observed that this was done not in the rashness and precipitancy of youth, but in the cool, deliberate prudence of maturer years. The merit of Moses is greater because his choice was made when he was "come to years." Nor was this choice made when Moses may be supposed to have been satiated with ambition and pleasure.—It was at the very time when worldly grandeur and aggrandizement have the greatest potency. Contemplate, then, this man of heroic virtue, in manhood's and ambition's prime, casting wealth and magnificence away from him, trampling the dazzling vision of a crown in the dust, and deliberately casting in his lot with an enslaved people. This was a sacrifice which patriotism, duty, conscience, can seldom enforce.

It is quite probable that his companions at the court, who knew this choice of Moses, would set him down as infatuated, as deprived of common sense—as a fool. But his estimates were judicious, though few can follow them. At his age, he must have often felt that all the gratifications placed within his reach, were only vanity and vexation. If he had not experienced, he could imagine the dignity and consolation of laboring and suffering in a noble and good cause. Those, however, who could not elevate themselves to such views, would look upon him, in making common cause with the despised and oppressed Hebrews, as contemptible, and would shower upon him reproach. This is generally harder to bear than mere suffering or deprivations. To one, however, who, like Moses, has counted well the cost ere he makes his choice, scorn, and persecution, and reproach, will only confirm him in the sense of the dignity and superior excellence of his choice. It will remind him how few are capable of making or appreciating such a choice. Moses, we find, accounted these reproaches greater riches than the treasures of Egypt.

If we would earnestly endeavor to take enlarged views of the consequences of our objects of choice, we too, like Moses, might make a hero's choice, overcome the love of the world, and rise above it. We halt long between two opinions—we endeavor to serve two masters—and thus our time is spent ingloriously and unprofitably. Let us make a choice of whom we will serve, God or Mammon, and having deliberately made our choice, let us not turn back. There is a choice before us like that of Moses; if we act like him, we may be made eminent instruments of good like him also.

THE INFLUENCE OF NATURE.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

How soothing are the influences of nature's wild melodies! The thousand varying and mingling sounds that rise in the still solitudes of the woodland, like harp-cords strung by invisible hands—how they shed the sweet incense of peace upon the weary heart, as the gentle dews of heaven, that distil from night's holy urn upon the flowers that have drooped beneath the scorching beams of noon. Life has many sorrows, but mankind are prone to add to the amount, by allowing the mind to be depressed by imaginary ones, or exaggerate the weight of existing evils. How many allow the most trivial incident to discompose their peace and render their society anything but pleasing, merely for the want of a little reflection! They fret and repine all day, and retire weary to rest, without having truly enjoyed a single moment, when the fault rests with themselves alone. But what if the affairs of time go a little awry—shall we be so foolish as to forego the possession of our own mind, merely because some circumstances do not exactly coincide with our wishes? Have patience; all may be for the best. The mists that gather gloomily on the mountain's brow, and veil with darkness the vast horizon, may distil in needed rains, refreshing the sun-dried plains, and painting with fresher green the kindly lap of earth. But though stern reason may show us the folly of yielding to petty vexations, how are we to free ourselves from the irritable sensations which ever attend them? Is there no remedy? Go, frail, repining mortal, and worship in nature's holy temple. Listen for a moment to the melodies that swell along the vale, where the purling rill goes dancing onward, through shade and sunshine, to its home in the fathomless deep! Let the cooling breeze fan away the phantoms of care that hover around the heart, and bid the soul go forth on the rich strains of music that thrill along the leafy dells, where the sweet warblers of the sky make vocal the whispering groves with their morning and evening carols. Surely these beauteous scenes were intended to gladden the heart, and lead it joyously along the sometimes rugged path of life! And shall we forego the sweet exercises of devotion, so necessary to our peace, when the high, blue dome of heaven spreads out the shadowy curtains of majestic grandeur over the scene, and nature's own choristers tune their matins at morn, and join in the soul-thrilling vespers of eve? Oh, no! Let the soul be kept free from passion and strife, that it may enjoy the blessed influences of nature's scenes, which shall teach it to rise, as on eagle's wings, above the trials and sorrows of a passing world, and rest its hopes upon that future which is revealed to us in the Gospel, and confirmed in every page of the wide-spread volume before us. Let us ponder upon the manifold wonders of nature, and admire the power, the wisdom and goodness of Him who rules the vast concourse of spheres that blaze in the lofty arch of heaven; and as the soul lifts itself up in admiration to the eternal, unchangeable Author of all, we shall forget the vexations of life, and return with renewed strength to the performance of the duties that surround us.

POPULAR ABSURDITIES ABOUT THE DEVIL.

BY REV. S. W. FULLER.

1. Many people believe the devil was once an angel of the highest rank in glory; sharing liberally of the privileges and joys of heaven in the presence of God.

2. They think he sinned so outrageously and egregiously, that he was cast out of heaven, and doomed to unremitting, endless misery—to pain without cessation and without end.

3. From that time forth, they hold, that he was, and is, and will be wholly disposed and devoted to the service of evil—that every faculty of his being is bent on mischief—that he detests all righteousness and delights in all sin continually. Now if the devil finds delight in doing evil, and in nothing else, and if he is always doing evil, why is he not always delighted? When I am delighted I generally feel pretty well; and hence, if the devil is always delighted, he must always feel pretty well, or—we are not much alike!

4. When all human souls are finally disposed of, many believe that an innumerable multitude of them will be sent to the devil's dominions in hell, and that the devil will be employed in tormenting them day and night, without intermission and without end. In this employment, they believe he will take superlative delight. Now the number of souls in his charge, the untiring call for his services, and the inexhaustible run of business, will secure eternal delight to a being who finds delight in this way and in no other, as is the popular opinion respecting the devil. Thus popular opinions respecting the devil and his employment, involve the revolting absurdity of the devil's endless delight at man's expense, though he, himself, is believed to have been the primary cause of man's sin, fall, and doom to endless wo! Thus, while his victim is subjected to endless pain, he, himself, is rewarded with endless delight!

CORRECTION CORRECTED

Br. GROSH—In the Magazine of September 14, you use the following language in relation to an article of mine, which appeared in the Expositor. "Br. M. H. S. errs in stating the various readings [of the Bible] at 30,000—they amount nearer to 130,000." M. H. S. made no remark in respect to the various readings which now exist. I simply said, that in the beginning of the last century, the number found was nearly forty thousand [not thirty]. Is it true that at that time the number discovered was 130,000? If not, who errs, M. H. S. or A. B. G.?

You farther say, "His [M. H. S.'s] eulogism on the common version, is rather greater than facts will warrant."

You are probably aware that the eulogism was given in the words of one of the best scholars; and you know, also, that many of the best authorities have expressed the same opinion.

You have placed me before your readers as having made statements in relation to the sacred Volume, that facts will not warrant. This is no doubt your opinion. But would not candor dictate that you should say to your readers, that when I said the "translation of the Bible is an illustrious monument of the age, the nation, and the language," that remark is sustained by the testimony of the best authorities on this subject? I think so. Authorities do not all agree in relation to the same subject, and students must follow those which seem to have the most truth on their side. And when Br. A. B. G. offers an opinion, and Professors of Biblical criticism offer another and a different one on the same subject, I hope I commit no offence if I choose my authorities, following what I regard as the best light, even though in thus doing, I differ from my respected brother. A. B. G.

M. H. S.

REPLY.

Br. M. H. S. is correct in regard to the number of the various readings—I had not kept the period he names at the beginning of the section, in mind, while reading the latter part thereof. In regard to his eulogium—though it is stated in the words of another, and though many others have stated it besides—the part I objected to is not quoted above.—It is, "It is, properly speaking, less a translation than an original; having most of the merit of the former as to style, and all the merit of the latter as to thought. It is the noblest, best, and most finished classic of the English tongue." Now, it matters not who is offended—certainly I am not—that Br. M. H. S. believes all this, and by quoting it, makes it a declaration of his own sentiments; for he has a right to believe not only this, but any other dictum uttered by Professors of Biblical criticism; but he must really excuse me if I say, in my own blunt way, that "his eulogium on the common version, is rather greater than facts (not Professors of Biblical criticism.) will warrant." Whatever the translation of the Bible may be to the age and men who produced it, it is certain that it could be improved upon in style and correctness of thought in this day. Its originality has been pointed out, and is not contended for above; so we will drop that.

Br. M. H. S. may rest assured that I never take offence at those who differ no further from me than I do from them!

WITHDRAWAL.

Portsmouth, Va., July 27, 1838.

To the Editor of the "Trumpet"—Sir:—Not recollecting with any degree of certainty the name of the Standing Clerk of the General Convention, I take the liberty of asking you to make known to him and to the Universalist public generally, that the fellowship granted me by the Southern Association as a Universalist minister, is hereby returned, cancelled, dissolved. It has been my determination for the last two or three years to retire from the denomination at the earliest moment that I could do so with justice to myself, and the cause in which I have been engaged. That time has now arrived—and I embrace this opportunity of stating some few of the reasons which have influenced me in coming to this determination.

[Mr. Fisk here goes on to state his reasons for this step. He pursues, to a great length, the subject of corporations, banks, banking, etc., etc., but these he well knows are subjects we do not discuss in the "Trumpet." After stating his reasons why he felt himself called upon to oppose the banking institutions of the land, he proceeds to say,]

In acting as I have done from conscientious motives, with a single eye to the good of my country and mankind in general, I have been grieved to find that my course has been disapproved by a portion of my ministering brethren; I have therefore deemed it advisable for some time past that the fellowship existing between us should be dissolved. I therefore beg leave, very respectfully, to withdraw from the Universalist denomination; and that no future "imprudence" on my part may prove injurious to the body to which I have belonged, I shall hereafter in my intercourse with the world, assume a different name from that of Universalist.

I can not forbear in closing to express my deep sense of obligation to the brethren of the denomination generally, for their long continued kindness to me under all the various circumstances in which I have been placed. The few exceptions to this are freely forgiven. Hoping that peace, prosperity and union, may continue to bless the believers in God's impartial grace; I subscribe myself with deep respect, THEOPHILUS FISK.

The following communication has been on hand a few weeks—we had the will but not the ability to insert it sooner. If those who want an article inserted at an early day, would get it copied in a plain hand, properly prepared for the press, they would do much toward securing their wished-for object. Having many articles on hand, and very little leisure to bestow on any, we are apt to select those that look as if they would cost least time and labor; especially when the compositor is waiting for the copy, and several other items of business are waiting for the EDITOR!

THE UNIVERSALIST INSTITUTE OF OHIO CITY.

To the Universalists of the southern part of the State of Ohio, and to the friends of this Institution, generally, we wish to say a few words.

Circumstances make it inconvenient for the General Agent to attend to its business concerns—this is a matter of deep regret to all interested; for it is to the persevering energy and industry of this worthy man and zealous friend to the cause of universal emancipation, that we owe in a great measure the existence of this Institution. However, we have the consolation of knowing that he will still continue to act as far as he can, and to aid and assist us all in his power. The writer has been appointed Acting Agent for the present—and as many, if not most of its friends, as yet have but a very partial knowledge of what we are trying to do, and of the state of its affairs, the circumstances attending it thus far, and its future prospects—and thus have not taken the subject into much consideration, I have deemed it advisable to present this article, with the desire and hope that our brethren and friends will spare an anxious thought for this infant literary Institution, for we do yet hope to see it flourish until its wholesome influence shall be experienced throughout this region of country.

The annexed Constitution will explain the principles on which the Institution is to be conducted.

In consequence of the sectarian character assumed by literary institutions in general, and the efforts commonly made in them to subject pupils to adopt the principles of some particular sect, the Universalist society of Ohio City, in the exercise of their civil and religious rights, do hereby duly organize and establish an Institution of learning in Ohio City, and adopt the following

CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1. This Institution shall be known by the name of "the Universalist Institute of Ohio City.

ART. 2. Nine Trustees shall be appointed by the society, six of whom shall be members of the society—the whole to be elected in the following manner—three for the term of three years; three for the term of two years, and three for the term of one year. The first meeting of this board shall be on the 30th of May, 1838; and they shall meet annually thereafter on the first of May. It shall be their duty to elect a Treasurer and Clerk; to fill any vacancy that may occur by the removal, sickness, or death of either of the incumbents; to appoint an executive committee from their number, not exceeding three in number, to manage the concerns of the Institution, in conformity with the will of the board; and to examine the accounts of the Treasurer and make a report thereon, once in every year, for the information of all concerned.

ART. 3. The board of Trustees shall meet annually on the first Wednesday in September, for the examination of the school, and the transaction of any other business appertaining to their office.

ART. 4. The Trustees shall have power to employ a teacher or teachers, to take charge of the Institution, and to expel any student for improper conduct.

ART. 5. This Institution shall be conducted on the most extended principles of liberality, and students shall in no case be compelled by any of the officers or teachers to attend the meetings of any particular denomination, or be required to abandon study for the purpose of attending to any religious exercise.

ART. 6. As soon as the funds shall warrant it, it shall be the duty of the Trustees to provide a library for the use of the school, which shall be accessible and free of expense to all the students.

ART. 7. It shall be the duty of the Trustees, as soon as may be practicable, to provide such apparatus as may be wanted for the various purposes of the Institution.

ART. 8. The board of Trustees shall have power to appoint an agent or agents, for the purpose of travelling into various parts of the country to aid the funds of the Institution, to solicit public patronage, and to manage its concerns generally.

ART. 9. The members of this society and all other persons who are willing to adopt this Constitution and contribute to the funds five dollars, shall be entitled to the privilege of voting in all matters pertaining to the Institution.

ART. 10. The Trustees shall retain the full exercise of all the powers vested in them, until their term of service expires; and whenever the funds of the Institution become sufficient, it shall be their duty to erect another building on the same lot for the purpose of a separate department.

ART. 11. The foregoing articles of this Constitution shall be subject to amendments as circumstances may require, provided such alterations are made by two-thirds of the board.

Under this Constitution, at the first election, Richard Lord, James S. Clarke, and Wm. F. Dennis, were elected for three years; Haynes Johnson, James Dodge, and Bostwick O'Conner, for two years; and Philo Rawley, James Hartney, and Asher M. Coe, for one year.

I will now state the circumstances, wants, resources, and the prospects as they now appear, that is, if the friends generally should feel and manifest the same disposition as those on whom we have called, in furnishing means and bestowing their patronage. In the first place, a lot of land, valued at from two to three thousand dollars, has been given to the Universalists for this purpose, by those truly liberal-hearted and philanthropic men, Richard Lord, of Ohio City, and James S. Clarke, of Cleveland, with three hundred and fifty dollars, each, towards the erection of the present building. With this beginning, a very few persevering and untiring friends have exerted themselves to the utmost, and have so far succeeded as to have the school opened in one room. But that has been but temporarily furnished for the present quarter. We are now preparing to have it furnished completely for the next term, and as the number of students may increase, to have all the rooms completed and furnished with the necessary apparatus—and to continue our exertions, until our Institution shall be inferior to no one in the country, in point of respectability and usefulness.

Its location is thought by some to be one of the most pleasant in the world. It is situated in a very pleasant and retired part of the City, nearly the same distance from the central part of the two (Ohio and Cleveland) cities. The building is three stories high, surmounted with a tower to the height of sixty five feet, and one hundred and fifty feet above the waters of lake Erie, affording a fine view of the two cities, the harbor, and the lake. It will accommodate, when completed, one hundred and fifty or two hundred students. I have been thus particular in its description, for the sake of the friends at a distance.

And now as to our resources.—Brethren, this Institution belongs to the Universalist public, and to it we look for help; yes, and we look, too, with confidence, for, since we have commenced travelling on this business, and called on our friends, our before despounding spirits have been raised up, and our hearts encouraged to persevere, and we have been led to exclaim, may it ever be our happy lot, while here we remain, to be in communion with such a people. And now, brethren, let us have a little of the spirit of western enterprise in this matter. Our friends in this vicinity are willing to do, and to keep doing; but they do require your aid and assistance in this enterprise. Let us have your patronage. Send your sons and your daughters, and, you that are able and willing—for we do not ask it of any others—send in what you can to aid in its completion and improvement. Do not wait for us to call on you, for you can save us much labor by this means. I would also remark to those who have already subscribed but have not paid, please to send the amount due as soon as convenient, for now is the time we want means to do with, very much. Direct to the Treasurer or Agent of the Universalist Institute of Ohio City.

The Principal of this Institution, the Rev. Alvan Dinsmore, is known to possess ample ability and long experience in this business.

The Fall term will commence on the twenty-fourth day of September. The expences to the students will be as light as at any other Institution in the country. WM. F. DENNIS.

ENJOY THE TRUTH.

The skeptic may behold the glorious light of the sun sink beneath the expanse of the western waters; they may admire the rich colors that mingle in the beautiful rays of the retiring orb of day, and rejoice as the twilight hour approaches, when all nature is about to be hushed in repose, and yet possess none of those soul-cheering aspirations, which gently move the heart of the true Christian in pure and spiritual worship; and which illumines the path of life with gladness, and shortens the distance between man and his Maker. How glorious the hope confirmed to man, by the Holy Scriptures! How all-perfect the being who gave us the laws and precepts of our lives! But still greater, and more abundant, are the daily testimonies, to the human family, of that God who careth for the present and eternal welfare of his children. Does any one think he is cast off? Is he bereft of reason? Does he think he is hated of God? When temporal blessings are shed in profusion around, let him remember, that the stillness of evening is for man's enjoyments; that the night is for the restoration of the natural powers, and that he himself enjoys it to the fullest extent; or, if not, that his hand only has separated between him and his Maker, and his sins only have shut him from his God. That he is still the same, unchanged and unchanging, both now and forever; that although he is merciful to the children of men, yet he is just; though he keeps forgiveness for thousands, it shall by no means clear the guilty, and that every one shall be recompensed according to his works, and not otherwise.—And let us all without distinction, endeavor to establish the perfection and righteousness of God in our own hearts, and be ready to exclaim with the great apostle of the Gentiles, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments and his ways past finding out!" N. M. T.

EXTRACT.

"When, in the clear light of reason, I look upon creation, on the star-spangled firmament, and the glory of God's works, I should as soon doubt my own existence, as the perfect wisdom and goodness of the Author of my being. All religion, which does not strengthen our confidence in this, must be a dreary illusion. Horrible dreams, dating their origin from the associations of childhood, and the rant of wild and visionary ministers, may sometimes trespass upon our thoughts. But every rational mind must finally settle to repose in that glorious persuasion which instantly irradiates the moral universe with perennial sunshine. 'The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice!' In this or any other world, in our present or any other forms of conscious being, we may advance upon the unexplored scenes, with a full confidence that we can never travel beyond the beneficence and equity of the infinite mind."

1 TIM. VI: 3-21.

The doctrines and the teachers, which are so severely represented and denounced in the first verses of this paragraph, are such as differed from the injunctions contained in the first two verses of the chapter. What are these? They relate to the conduct of slaves. In expounding the advice of Paul to slaves, we have determined to avoid all appearance of participating in the agitation on this subject which prevails at the present day.—Instead of encouraging slaves to disobedience, the Gospel makes them more faithful and conscientious.—That the apostle had the Judaizers in his eye here, (verse 3,) is evident from Titus i: 10. "There are many unruly and foolish talkers and deceivers, especially they of the circumcision: Whose mouths must be stopt, who subvert whole families, teaching things which they ought not, for the sake of sordid gain." It seems the Judaizers had no view in teaching, but to draw money from their disciples. And the money which they got, they spent in the gratification of their lusts. Hence the apostle calls "their belly their God;" Phil. iii: 19. We doubt not that the lovers of truth, more than of party, the candid, the impartial, the uncommitted, will readily admit that Dr. Macknight's comment coincides with, and fairly represents, the opinions of this chief apostle.*

The conduct of those Jewish teachers, which Paul condemned, was by him ascribed to the influence of the all, and the every where-prevailing love of money. Upon this subject—this source of all evil, as much as of that one upon which he had been animadverting, Paul addresses a few words of expostulation to his son Timothy. O! that we could persuade ourselves that we were less devoted to mammon, and more devoted to God, at every retrospect of our past lives. O! that we could find in ourselves at such seasons, less and less conformity to the fashions of the world in this respect. O! that we might find a consciousness—a soul-satisfying consciousness—that our affections were less divided between earth and heaven—that we were practically influenced by the advice of Paul in verse 11 and 12. Then might we hope soon to know what it is to be a devoted, single-eyed Christian; then might we trust soon to be prepared for the business and the joys of heaven. Brethren, should we not be employing some means to forward this desirable end? Various means will suggest themselves to various minds, if they are really in earnest to serve God more, and mammon less. Meanwhile, we would submit the following proposal as applicable to all of us, in all circumstances. Let us set apart hours of serious thoughtfulness to review our aims and pursuits, and the tenor of our lives, and in the court of conscience, and as if in the presence of the supreme Majesty, let us answer to ourselves the question—are we setting our esteem and desires upon what is really most worthy, or do we know that we are giving our hearts to a lesser, and neglecting a greater, good? Are we pursuing those things which we know it to be our duty as well as our interest to pursue, or are we neglecting such in the pursuit of enjoyments for which our heart condemns us? Such questions let us often ask, and every other means of weaning ourselves from earth, let us eagerly employ.

P. P.

* We have omitted here several extracts quoted from Dr. Macknight, not only because we have no faith in them; but also to avoid discussing the subject with our respected correspondent. A. B. G.

MATT. V: 4.

"Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted."

This text is of incalculable importance to those in affliction, who are oppressed by the storms of adversity, and weighed down by the irreparable loss of relatives and friends. It holds out to them an instructive lesson, which, if rightly adjudged, will out-balance all the minor difficulties and evils which beset us in this mundane sphere. Its real nature and essence is calculated to display the goodness of God amid all the varieties of his dispensations; to enforce the idea that he is well worthy of our confidence and affection; that he is "the one altogether lovely," being in and of himself, perfect love. These words are peculiarly adapted to the mourner, designed by the author (Christ) to keep in view the loving kindness of our heavenly Father, at times, in which their souls were rent by affliction, when they would be inclined to distrust this care and affection for them. It is an empnatic illustration of the design of our Saviour, who, in all his precepts, endeavored to imbue the minds of his disciples with the utility of casting themselves upon the arm of God, of putting their whole trust in him, and of living in submission to his mysterious will, that they might be "partakers of his holiness" and "drink of the river of the water of life" which flows from his throne. Nothing can exceed the intrinsic excellence of these words, and their value is greatly enhanced when we consider the source from which they came, being from him who hath said, "my counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." They are the oil and balm of consolation. They will heal the broken heart—assuage the mourner's grief—dry the orphan's tears—and render the bleeding bosom tranquil. Then let us "weep with those that weep," and return thanks to the "Giver of every good and perfect gift," for comforting us in the dismal season of our afflictions, and showering down blessings upon us when our spirits are wounded, and we have "hung our harps upon the willows." He likes the incense of a grateful heart—the devotedness of the contrite soul.

GENERAL CONVENTION.

We have no doubt that our friends and patrons all over the United States, will feel a strong desire to receive an early account of the meeting of the General Convention in Boston, last week.—Our paper of last Saturday went to press too early to leave it in our power to make a record of the proceedings in that number. It is with an extraordinary gratification that we now take up our pen for the performance of our duty. This meeting of the Convention, for several reasons, has been one of the most remarkable, ever held by Universalists in the United States, or any other part of the world. The unprecedented number of preachers present;—the gathering of the eminent and true friends of our cause from various parts of New-England, and some even more distant, the fathers and mothers of our Israel, and the firm and vigorous brethren and sisters of our common faith; the immense and continually increasing congregations that attended upon the public services of the occasion;—the exceeding number of communicants at the celebration of the Lord's Supper;—the tone and character of the public services;—these all conspired to give to the meeting an interest and inspiration that hallowed the soul, and lifted up the heart in devout gratitude to God; and that marked the whole occasion as one standing out by itself, going beyond, in each and every respect, any meeting we have ever attended, or probably ever shall be permitted to attend upon the earth. We never expect, taking all the spiritual circumstances into consideration, to see another such a jubilee until we meet the general assembly and church of the first born which are written in Heaven.

On Tuesday afternoon, a large number of the brethren and sisters who had arrived in the city, went in company to Mount Auburn, to visit the tomb of John Murray. A deep solemnity took possession of the soul, mingled with gratitude to God for the great blessings he had conferred on our land through the instrumentality of his eminent and departed servant. What could be more appropriate, than a religious service under such circumstances? A hymn was sung, to the tune called "Grosh," in the "Songs of Zion," after which a prayer was offered by Br. W. S. Balch, and a brief address was made by Br. A. C. Thomas, of Philadelphia. Many spectators, who were spending the afternoon in this interesting retreat, gave solemn attention to the service.

On Tuesday evening public sevice was held in the Universalist church in School-street, when a deeply argumentative and interesting discourse was preached from John vi: 38, 39, by Dr. T. Clowes, Principal of the Literary Institution, at Clinton, N. Y. Dr. Clowes, formerly an Episcopalian clergyman, has recently avowed his belief in the final happiness of all mankind, a circumstance which added much interest to the exercises of the evening. Dr. Clowes had spent the previous Sabbath in Charlestown, where he preached through the day, much to the gratification of the people. A meeting was held at Roxbury, this evening. Sermon by Br. W. Whittaker.

The delegates constituting the Convention proper, assembled in the Supreme Court room of the Old Court House, on Wednesday morning, at 8 o'clock. Hon. Asa T. Newhall, of the Massachusetts delegation, was elected Moderator, and Br. W. S. Balch, was elected Clerk. We are not able here to go fully into a statement of the business which was transacted by the Convention—our attention being so much occupied by other calls.—But a full and official report will soon be published.

On Wednesday, at half past ten, public service was again held at the church in School-st. when the occasional sermon was delivered by Br. A. C. Thomas, of Philadelphia, from Heb. viii: 6.—"But now hath he obtained a more excellent ministry." We make no further remark in regard to this sermon, than to say that it equalled the expectations of all who listened to it, so far as we are able to judge. Our readers will soon have an opportunity of perusing it in our columns—which we have no doubt they will do with equal happiness and profit. The audience of this morning was overwhelming.

On the afternoon of this day, a sermon was preached by Br. Russel Streeter, of Woodstock, Vt., from Matt. v: 45; and another in the evening by Br. John Moore, of Lebanon, N. H., which we did not hear, as we were necessarily absent. On this evening public service was held at East Cambridge, where Br. C. C. Burr preached, at Charlestown, where Br. C. F. Le Fevre preached, and at South Boston, where Br. S. W. Fuller preached. Notwithstanding the multiplicity of the services this evening, the congregation at School-street continued greatly crowded. After the sermon by Br. Moore, a Conference meeting was holden, during which several of the brethren addressed the congregation.

On Thursday morning at 8 o'clock, the annual meeting of the United States' Universalist Historical society was holden in the Court Room. The officers were elected, the annual report of the Secretary was read—and reports were received from several of the corresponding secretaries. A collection was taken at the close of the service this morning, when upwards of fifty dollars were contributed to aid the funds of the Society for the purchase of books. The sermon this morning was delivered by Br. Wm. A. Drew, of Augusta, Me., from Nehemiah vi: 3—subject—Universalists are doing a GREAT WORK, and should not leave it to engage in other matters of a secondary importance.

There was a very deep and general expectation in regard to the services of the afternoon of Thursday; first, because it was known that Br. Stephen R. Smith, of Albany, N. Y., who had not preached in the city for many years, would deliver the discourse; and second, because this was the time set apart for the celebration of the Lord's Supper. The house, which at all the meetings had been filled to inconvenience, so that seats had to be placed in all the aisles, now became crowded to great inconvenience, large numbers being obliged to stand in the aisles, and vacancies of the house.—

In fact, from the beginning, the pulpit stairs on each side, the area in front of the pulpit, and all the space around was occupied. Br. Smith selected for his text the words of the Saviour, recorded John xii: 32. "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth will draw all men unto me." The audience listened with great attention and delight. At the close of the service, the communion season commenced. Father Ballou of Boston, and Father Beede of Duxbury, presided at the table, assisted by other brethren in breaking the bread. The deacons of the Boston churches served the communicants. It was a deeply solemn occasion. Never before, for fifteen hundred years, have so many professed believers in the great salvation, sat down together, at the table of their Lord. There must have been between seven and eight hundred, and perhaps there were more, who received the symbols of the broken body and shed blood of the Lord Jesus. Indeed, so many were there, that the aisles and pulpit stairs, and the area round about the pulpit, were necessarily occupied. We never saw such a season before, and probably shall never see it again on the earth. The aged fathers at the table were deeply moved by such a solemn scene—indeed, there was but one feeling throughout this vast body of Christians.

On Thursday evening sermons were preached at Charlestown, by Br. Asher Moore, and at East Cambridge, by Br. Le Fevre. But the congregation in School-st. was not diminished—in fact, at this service it was still more crowded than at any previous one. Every accessible part of the house was occupied. The pews were filled to great inconvenience—the pulpit was full—the pulpit stairs, the area in front, all the aisles were densely crowded, hundreds of persons standing up. The outer entry was full, and people were pressing in at the doors as far as possible, and climbing upon the gallery stairs, to look in over the heads of the more fortunate ones, who by coming earlier had obtained entrance. The audience below was a dense, unbroken crowd of human beings, the aisles and pews being alike indistinguishable among the living mass. Such was the lower part of the house. The gallery was equally crowded—pews, aisles, singing-gallery, window seats, every square foot of space was occupied. It was a sublime spectacle to stand in the pulpit and survey this throng. But to the services. A sermon was preached by Br. I. D. Williamson, of Poughkeepsie. N. Y., from Matt. xi: 5. "The poor have the Gospel preached to them." For beauty and strength of conception, for potency of argument, and for fervid pathos in delivery, we have seldom heard this discourse surpassed. If it were possible, it carried us still higher on the wings of faith and joy than we had been before. But the service did not close with the sermon. It was hard to part—no one wished to leave the place. Addresses were made by several of the brethren, among whom we recollect Brs. A. L. Balch, L. C. Browne, Samuel Brimblecom, A. C. Thomas, John H. Willis, Dr. Timo. Clowes, Hosea Ballou, Sebastian Streeter, Darius Forbes, Sylvanus Cobb, Sydney Turner, Stephen R. Smith, Thomas Whittemore, Lucius R. Paige, etc.

There were several circumstances which rendered this meeting one of peculiar interest. Dr. Clowes, a recent convert from the Episcopal church, and Br. Sydney Turner, a recent convert from the self-styled orthodox community of Me., were present, and made addresses that touched our hearts. The audience were informed also (a fact of which many of them were ignorant) that the very spot on which John Murray stood when he was stoned in the pulpit, was not fifty feet from the house in which we were assembled. We felt that we stood on hallowed ground;—we thanked God that he had sent ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-THREE preachers of universal grace, to be present on this anniversary, and to stand up together in the immediate neighborhood of the place in which Murray came near losing his life, for declaring the unsearchable riches of Christ. It still further added to the interest of the occasion, that our venerable father in the faith, Silas Winchester, of Brewer, Me., the brother of Elhanan Winchester was present, and the audience had an opportunity to see this relic of that family. Taken altogether, this service was one of the most exhilirating, glorious, and heavenly, that we ever attended, or ever shall attend. For three hours and a half this immense assembly remained on the sacred spot, without manifesting the least disposition to retire—in fact it seemed hard for them to leave even after the benediction was pronounced.

Such was the session of the General Convention for the year 1838, an occasion that will long be remembered by the Universalists of Boston, and, as we think, by all the visiters who were present with us. We never saw before such a gathering of Universalists; and the event justified the expectations which we stated in our columns two or three weeks ago, that there would undoubtedly be the largest assembly of Universalist clergymen, and of the eminent and true friends of our cause, that New-England has ever seen. So it has been, and we thank God for it. We call upon our souls, and all that is within us, to bless and praise his holy name.

The Convention adjourned to meet in Portland, Me., on the Tuesday evening preceding the third Wednesday in September, 1839. Our Portland friends must expect a very large meeting.

We can not finally close this article without uttering one word in behalf of the Universalists of Boston and vicinity; that word is GRATITUDE.—We do most sincerely thank those, both clergymen and laymen, who took pains to visit us on this occasion from different parts of the United States. Their kind and cheering services and congratulations will long be remembered. May God, in his rich mercy, reward them all.

UTICA, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1838.

THE FLOURISHING TREE.

There once fell a seed on a shore whose soil was barren, rocky and forbidding. But that seed was hardy, and ready to throw out its shoots to catch the slightest fertilizing moisture to aid its expansion. In a short time it had so resisted the inhospitality of the barren shore, and so sent out its power, that it became a vast tree, whose trunk, arms and whose leaves formed a refreshing shadow in a weary land, and whose flowers shed an odor abroad where no such beauties had ever before been manifested. But that shore grew more barren, that soil more unfriendly—the pelting storms beat upon the tree, the worms gnawed at its root, the winds raged against it, and it fell. It fell not, however, without a witness. Its seeds found a shelter and were safely buried in the earth. Dormant did they sleep for many a weary year; when, in the overturn of the soil, the sun and rain fell upon them; plant after plant appeared, and the desert once more smiled. But there was one plant more vigorous than the rest—like its progenitor, it flung out its arms to the sun, until its broad shadows kept the gushing spring cool, inviting the traveller to its protection. And year after year, its leaves have fell and so enriched the soil, that its roots are firm—the winds must rage in vain, the storms must howl ineffectually and the worms of decay be overcome. And in future time, we have promise that it will continue to flourish, until it shall overshadow the whole earth, and its glory be known from sea to sea and from shore to shore.

That inhospitable clime was the Jewish-wicked and the Gentile-pagan world, where all was barren of truth and righteousness. The seed which fell upon it was the seed which our Saviour took from the garden of heaven for the benefit of man. In spite of the barren soil, however, this seed took root and flourished, until Christianity became a mighty tree, whose shadows refreshed the weary hearts of multitudes and whose flowers of truth beamed brightly on the benighted soul. But in process of time, the storms of pagan persecution raged against it, the winds of error hurled themselves upon it, and the worms of dissension and ignorance gnawed at its root, until, in the dark ages, pure Christianity fell. But its seeds perished not, though they were dormant, until the sun and rain of the reformation overturned the soil of darkness, and the seeds of truth were brought to light. Shoot after shoot sprung up. But one more vigorous than others was transplanted by the hands of a faithful follower to this clime, where its energies were watched by John Murray, whose voice was heard proclaiming the riches of salvation and the "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." It was placed in a congenial soil. It became firmly rooted in the hearts of multitudes, and its shades called many from the burning heats of error to the glorious influences of truth. And its effect has indeed been noble. It has acted upon community like leaven in its appropriate office. Its diffusing principles have produced a great effect even among those who opposed them; because the whole mass of professors are walking toward the restitution step by step; unwillingly it is true, but not the less surely. Its branches are making still broader reaches over our country, the abundant foliage of its truth is casting still greater shadows of protection over its children, and its fruit is eagerly sought after as that "perfect love which casteth all fear" from the soul and elevates us with divine knowledge.

The broad principle of the restitution, the divinity of its doctrine, the secret of its power, is, to overcome evil with good, and finally close up the reign of sin and error and establish unmingled felicity and truth in all minds. To this crowning feature in the government of the Deity, the world is hastening. Already have many sturdy thorns and thistles been cleared from the pathways of eternal truth. Infant destruction has found its grave. Election and reprobation are only waiting to be buried. The powers of ceaseless wo are quailing before more ennobling views of God and his government, as the mists of the morning flee before the fires of the sun.—And revenge, as a governing principle, is waning gradually from among men. It is now believed that those infant buds which are nipped from the parent stock, are sipped only to bloom in heaven. It is now believed that no person was expressly created for destruction. It is now believed by multitudes that the fears which arise from endless wo are not the best motives in calling out the affection of the heart. It is on all hands being seen that kindness is the proper method of subduing an enemy and better means of family and school government are being put in requisition than the rod and the whip. The greatest portions of society view capital executions as legal murder, demoralizing in their tendency, certainly without benefit, and wholly useless so far as the reformation of a community or an individual is concerned. In fact, the whole civilized world is coming up to the glorious truth, that evil should be overcome with good, and that all government should aim at the production of the greatest happiness. And so far as men come up to these principles, so far they rest beneath the shadows of the restitution, which will finally subdue the world to its influence.

Oh, how this tree has grown. Who can look back and behold John Murray, standing on the shores of America about sixty years since; lone and desolate; against his own will and desires, compelled to lift up his voice in defence of the truth—who can behold him stemming every kind of opposition; at one time stoned; at another cruelly slandered; at another a base attempt made to illegalize all the marriages he had celebrated, to the breaking up of scores of families had it succeeded; at another most rudely condemned and villified—who can behold the progress of truth since his day, the field white unto harvest, heralds of the cross rapidly multiplying, converts increasing like drops of morning dew, the faith more respected, the doctrine better understood, churches rising in many of the vallies and on many of the hill-tops of our country, youth seizing it as the guide of their lives, and sometimes whole societies embracing it—what member of Zion can hear of these facts without being glad, and rejoicing at the triumphs of the judgments of the Lord? Will they not call out the praise of our minds, manifested in good works and love to all mankind? As the harpstring will respond to the touch of the finger, so should our souls thrill with the good news of the advancement of the cause of holiness.

"THE SECOND DEATH."

REVELATION XX: 12–15.

"And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life; and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works. And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them: and they were judged every man according to their works. And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death. And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire."

I am sensible that this dragging along series of articles on the same subject, from week to week, is not the most pleasant to our readers; nor is it the most advantageous to a writer who wishes to be carefully read, and to have his arguments compared with each other—their bearings and dependence seen, and their consistency, and united force appreciated. But I had no other choice. The whole subject is so interwoven with popular errors in theology—with the common interpretation of so many passages of Scripture, and, in its true meaning and bearings, is so harmoniously connected with the entire teachings of the Bible on justice, judgment, and the establishment of Christianity, that I must either treat it in numbers, or not at all—or I must give a very imperfect explanation of the passages commented upon. And although I have endeavored to make each number as complete within itself as possible, and to connect the succeeding with the preceding by a brief synopsis of the previous number, yet it is desirable that the reader should reperuse all that has gone before, that he may properly and fully understand what here follows.

The subject of this number, is "the second death." What is it? I have proved that it is synonymous with "the lake of fire," and shown that "the lake of fire" signifies the temporal punishment and desolation of a nation or people. But I wish, in this number to examine into the meaning of "the second death," as if I had not already settled the meaning of its equivalent phrase, "the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone."

The term "death" is so variously applied in the Scriptures, that the numerical term used in our text leads us to suppose, that not any kind of death, but some particular kind of death, is there alluded to, and that there is a preceding death, of precisely the same kind, to which this one is second in order. The word "death" means natural death—it means moral death, or a state of sin and unbelief, and it means a national death, or exile and bondage from a native land—it is also applied to a severe state of sorrow, persecution, distress and suffering. The first in order of all these different deaths, is, generally, a moral death—a death in sin and transgression. After that, comes a second kind of death, i. e. natural death. But this death is extremely different from, and unlike, the first death—consequently, we look for some other moral or natural evil to which the phrase can with propriety be applied.

For the same reason, we reject the common opinion—viz., that the first death is the separation of the soul from the body—i. e natural death; and that the second death is the exclusion of both soul and body from the presence of God forever, after the resurrection to immortality.—Now this latter death, comparing it with the first, would be life, however miserable—for the first death would be an extinction of the powers of life—a state of insensibility. There being, therefore, no analogy between the two, we can not call endless misery the second death to natural death.

Besides—if Partialism is true, the second death may be the doom of all, in every age and dispensation, who are finally lost. But the second death is never threatened in the Mosaic law, as a thing to which the ancient Israelites were subject—it is never named in the prophets, as a thing to which the later Jews were subject before Christ—it is, in fact, never even called by that name, till in the close of the apostolic age, and then, only those of that age and generation are named as being in danger of it. Now, how shall we account for these facts, if all mankind, in every age, have been, and yet are liable to suffer it? These, and other reasons that might be named, lead us to look for another explanation of the phrase. And admitting our views as to the date and general object of this book, (and I do not see how they can well be denied,) I think we can find a good solution of the difficulty—one at least probably correct.

The first passage in which the phrase "second death" occurs, is Rev. ii: 8-11—"Unto the angel of the church in Smyrna write," etc. After naming the persecutions it was to endure from the Jews, the revelator adds—"He that hath an ear let him hear what the spirit saith to the churches; he that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death." Here we learn that those of this church of believers, who were not overcome of the devil, (i. e. the persecuting Jews who cast them into prison,) but who endured these trials of their faith triumphantly, would not be hurt of the second death. We infer, also, that those who were overcome—who apostatized in these trials of their faith, might be so hurt.

The second passage in which the phrase is found, is in Rev. xx: 6—"Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power; but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years." Dr Clarke says—"I am satisfied that this period should not be taken literally. It may signify that there shall be a long and undisturbed state of Christianity." Again, he says—"as to the term 'thousand years,' it is a mystic number among the Jews." Thus the days of the Messiah are called a thousand years, though they were but thirty-three. Its being called the first resurrection, proves that it is not the general, or last resurrection—consequently is not at the end of time, or in the immortal state—while the whole context shows that it was on the earth—before wars are done away—and consequently not even in the supposed millennium.

The third place in which the second death is named, is in our text.

The fourth place in which it is named, is in Rev. xxi: 8—"But the fearful, and unbelieving, etc., and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death."

These are all the places in which the phrase occurs—but there is another in which a plain allusion is made to it—Jude, 12th verse—"These are spots in your feasts of charity, when they feast with you, feeding themselves without fear; clouds they are without water, carried about of winds; trees whose fruit withereth, without fruit, twice dead, plucked up by the roots," etc. From this passage it would appear that apostacy, or relapse into sin and unbelief, is called a second death—inasmuch as sin and unbelief is a first death—a moral or spiritual death. I am free to confess however, that although apostacy of the early Christians is embraced in the meaning of the second death, it is not all that is meant by that phrase. I shall therefore proceed to show that, strictly speaking, the second death was most probably the second destruction, dispersion and captivity of the Jewish nation, as the inevitable result of a general moral death of the Jewish people.

The first death, to which the second perfectly corresponds, was precisely similar in its procuring cause, nature and results. The government of the Jews was a religious government—a theocracy, in which Jehovah was the supreme King and Ruler. In the first temple he was especially present, between the cherubim—the land of Judea, even, is called the presence of the Lord and the Holy Land, because there he manifested himself especially to his chosen people. Their decline from this holy and obedient condition, by moral death, resulted in their conquest by Nebuchadnezzar—the destruction of their temple—their dispersion, and the captivity in Babylon. This fate is spoken of as a national death, succeeding a moral death. Their lawgiver had prophesied—"And they that are left of you, shall pine away in their iniquity in their enemies' lands," etc. Levit. xxvi: 39. Ezekiel declares—"Therefore, oh, son of man, speak unto the house of Israel, thus speak ye, saying—if our transgressions and our sins be upon us, and we pine away in them, how should we then live? Say unto them, as I live saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; turn ye, turn ye, from your evil ways, for why will ye die, oh, house of Israel?" We are sometimes asked, if these men were already dead in trespasses and sins, must not this death resulting from it, be a death in eternity? I answer, no—this moral death of the people resulted in a national death—a death to all their civil and religious privileges—a death to their national existence. Under the figure of Aholah and Aholibah, Samaria and Jerusalem are adjudged guilty of spiritual adultery against God, a crime punished with death. See Ezekiel, chap. 23d. In fact, the book of this prophet is full of instances, in which this captivity in Babylon is represented as a grievous death—a death of the Jewish nation. But Ezekiel xxxvii: 3-14, is a most remarkable passage in proof of this position. "And he said unto me, son of man, can these bones live? and I answered, O Lord God, thou knowest. Again he said unto me, prophesy upon these bones, and say unto them. O ye dry bones, hear the word of the Lord. Thus saith the Lord God unto these bones; behold, I will cause breath to enter into you, and ye shall live: and I will lay sinews upon you, and will bring up flesh upon you, and cover you with skin, and put breath in you, and ye shall live; and ye shall know that I am the Lord. So I prophesied as I was commanded: and as I prophesied, there was a noise, and behold a shaking, and the bones came together, bone to his bone. And when I beheld, lo, the sinews and the flesh came up upon them, and the skin covered them above: but there was no breath in them. Then said he unto me, prophesy unto the wind, prophesy, son of man, and say to the wind, thus saith the Lord God; come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live. So I prophesied as he commanded me, and the breath came into them, and they lived, and stood up upon their feet, an exceeding great army. Then he said unto me, son of man, these bones are the whole house of Israel: behold, they say, our bones are dried, and our hope is lost; we are cut off for our parts. Therefore prophesy and say unto them, thus saith the Lord God; behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel. And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves. And shall put my spirit in you, and ye shall live, and I shall place you in your own land:—then shall ye know that I the Lord have spoken it, and performed it, saith the Lord." This prophecy was literally fulfilled. Cyrus returned the Jews from their first death—rebuilt their temple—and they again lived as a nation, with God as their King, and his government as theirs.

Are we not justified, then, in supposing that the second national destruction of this wonderful people—itself so wonderful an event in God's economy—is meant by the second death? Certain it is that it was such a lake of fire and brimstone as Isaiah describes, and which is declared to be the second death, as I have already shown—and certain it is, that the apostate Hebrew Christians, every where, were hurt of this second death, while the Christians were relieved and saved from all injury from it.

Time would fail me were I to give you an outline of the terrible sufferings that fell on the Jewish nation, in this second destruction of their city, temple, and nation—indeed, on the Jews every where in the world, and on all apostatizing Christians of that nation—woes so great that our Saviour declared they never had been and never would be equalled—woes which rest on that unhappy people even at this day, and which will continue to abide on them, more or less, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. That was truly a lake of fire whose smoke (as Isaiah said of the ancient judgment on Idumea) ascended up day and night, for ever and ever.—Then the thrones were placed—then the judgment was set—then the Son of man came in the glory of his Father with his chosen messengers, to execute judgment—then the books of the law and the prophets were opened, and the book of life, or the Gospel, was also opened, and the people were judged, every one according to their works. Then the punishments predicted on the Jews, from Moses down to Jesus, were fulfilled and inflicted.

If you would see what these punishments are, read Lev. xxvi: 14-40; Deut. xviii: 15-20; Jer. 7th and 19th chapters—or Isa. lxvi: 24; Dan. 12th chap. and Malachi 4th chap. But in vain will you search the laws of Moses, by which, only, the Jews were judged, of course, for the penalty of endless misery. If you would see the New Testament prophecies respecting this day of judgment—this lake of fire and brimstone—see Matt. 24th and 25th chapters, and the parallel passages, in all of which Jesus declares that he would come to judgment in that generation—before his disciples could have gone over all the cities of Israel—before all who then heard him had tasted of death—and that then he would sit on the throne of his glory and separate the nations one from another, and judge every man according to his works. The wicked Jews were to depart, with apostatizing Hebrew Christians, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels—into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and false prophet were to be cast, and were there to be tormented with the devil, day and night, for ever and ever—the smoke of their torment should ascend up (as Isaiah declared would that of the temporal punishment of the land of Idumea) day and night, for ever and ever. And this, we verily believe was the second death—a death yet endured by the Jewish nation.

By the sea giving up the dead, I understand the Gentile lands giving up the Jews to bondage, and slavery, and death. By death and hell giving up the dead, may be meant, that the torpid state in which the nations then were to truth and righteousness, was then dissolved—or, in the words of Isaiah, the Jews have said, "We have made a covenant with death, and with hell are we at agreement; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, it shall not come unto us"—but Jesus came to judgment, and in the words of Jehovah, their covenant with death was disannulled, and their agreement with hell did not stand—when the overflowing scourge passed through, they were trodden down by it. In the language of John v: 25-30, compared with Daniel xii: 1-4, the dead in the dust of the earth, sleeping in their graves, heard the voice of Jesus and came forth—some passed from the death of unbelief, to everlasting life by faith in Jesus, and the rest to everlasting shame and reproach. By fixing the fulfillment of our text to this period of time, we reconcile it with the declarations of the Revelator, made no less than eight times, in the beginning and the close of this book—that the time was at hand, that Jesus would come quickly, and that the things revealed were shortly to come to pass.

But will they be finally lost? Will they be excluded from the final salvation—from the resurrection to immortal holiness and life? I answer in the words of Paul to the Romans xi: 11, 12, 15, 25-36. "I say then, have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: but rather through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy. Now, if the all of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness? For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead? For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, (lest ye should be wise in your own conceits,) that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, there shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob. For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins. As concerning the Gospel, they are enemies for your sakes; but as touching the election, they are beloved for their father's sakes. For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance. For as ye in times past have not believed God, yet have now obtained mercy through their unbelief; even so have these also now not believed, that through your mercy they also may obtain mercy. For God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all. O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God, how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor. Or who hath first given unto him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things; to whom be glory for ever. Amen."

One consideration more, and I will close. 1 Cor. xv: 26—"The last enemy that shall be destroyed, is death." Omit the supplied words printed in italic, and it reads as in the original, "The last enemy, death, shall be destroyed." The last enemy is death—death shall be destroyed. There is no possibility of any death—of ANY ENEMY existing after this period. Dr. Clarke well remarks on this passage—"Death shall be destroyed; shall be counter-worked, subverted and finally overturned. But death can not be destroyed by there being simply no further death"—i. e. no continuance of dying—"death can only be destroyed and annihilated by a general resurrection: if there be no general resurrection, it is most evident that death will still retain his empire." "Therefore, (says the Dr.,) the fact that death shall be destroyed, assures the fact that there shall be a general resurrection, and this is a proof, also, that, after the resurrection, there shall be no more death." How could Dr. C., after this clear exposition of the verse, contend for the endless duration of a second death? And what becomes of the "eternal death" so frequently named by our opposing brethren, but never named in the Bible?

In conclusion—I have proved that the judgment spoken of in the context, took place when the thrones were set, and the books were opened, and the dominion was given to the Son of man—as Daniel declares, viz.—at the establishment of the Gospel dispensation, and the cessation of the law dispensation. Then those who were found written in the book of life, as declared by Daniel, were delivered, by Michael the great Prince—i. e. Christ. Then those asleep in their graves—in the dust of the earth—were awaked, and the unbelieving and apostate Jews came forth to the resurrection of damnation, and were cast into the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone—a phrase emblematical of the total desolation of a nation by famine, sword and pestilence, as Idumea was anciently desolated, and as Judea was desolated A. D. 97, and onward. The sea—representing the Gentile nations—gave up the dead or unbelieving Jews;—the earth—representing the land of Judea, gave them up—their covenant with death and their agreement with hell were disannulled, and the overflowing scourge of the second death—i. e. the second desolation of their country, the second destruction of their city and temple, the second abolition of their civil and religious privileges as a nation, the second driving of them into grievous bondage and oppression, until men refused to buy them in the markets even as slaves—all this trod them under foot, and overwhelmed them. And, lastly, I have proven that the Jews were only cast off, that through their fall we Gentiles might be saved, and that through the mercy extended to us Gentiles, the Jews shall be afterwards gathered in again, and so all Israel be saved.—Then will all that die in Adam have been made alive in Christ—then will death, all death, be destroyed, and eternal life be enjoyed by all—and then will Jesus deliver up his kingdom to God the Father, and God be all in all—all that will be in all. Of course, there will, then, be no more death—nor any room for sin and its consequences in any being in the universe of God; for God will be all in all. AMEN. A. B. G.

THE RECORD.

ASSOCIATIONS.—The Penobscot Association met in Garland, Me., August 22d and 23d. Hon. S. French, Moderator, and Brs. B. Bursely and E. W. Coffin, Clerks. Brs. Hodsdon, G. Smith and J. Flanders, Committee on fellowship and discipline, and Br. Hodsdon to prepare the minutes. Br. Horace J. Bradbury was recommended to the Committee of the State Convention for a letter of fellowship. Delegates were appointed to the State Convention. The Universalist societies in Newport, Sangerville, Levant and Guilford [query—three or four?] were received into fellowship; and a resolution in favor of church organization, Sunday schools, and Conference meetings, was passed. Eleven ministers were present, and sermons were preached by Brs. Rand, Gardner, Averill, Forbes and Hodsdon. It is probable that this Association adjourned to meet some time at some place, but we have no account of such a proceeding in the minutes!

The Washington Association met in Watertown, Ohio, August 25th. Br. L. L. Sadler, Moderator, and Br. J. S. Hollister, Clerk. Considerable discussion was had on the subject of a Constitution, and the subject was finally laid over till next session. Brs. Jolly, W. Woodford and B. Stedman, were appointed committee of discipline, and the case of Br. T. J. Crowe recommended to their investigation and action. Appointed delegates to the Ohio Convention. Granted fellowship to the society in Rome, Athens county. Eight sermons were preached by Brs. Cox, Davis, Strong, Jolly, Biddlecom, and Sadler. The Circular speaks of the meetings as large and good; and in reference to the debates on the Constitution, warns "our friends to beware of the bed of Procurstes," and advises them to be "governed by measures, and not by men" [Principles are better than either as a rule for action.] Adjourned to meet in Belpre, on the Saturday preceding the last Sunday in August, 1839.

The Cheshire county Association met at Marlboro', N. H., on the 5th and 6th of September. Br. E. Glover, Moderator, and J. V. Wilson, Clerk. Brs. Woodhouse, Bailey and Wilson, a Committee on Conferences; Br. Woodhouse, Committee on correspondence; and Brs. Wilson, Woodhouse and Barber, a Committee to consider the propriety of celebrating the Eucharist, during their Association sessions. Ten brethren were appointed to attend the State Convention; and the societies in Nelson and Stoddard were received into fellowship.—Appointed Br. C. Woodhouse to deliver the next occasional sermon. The following resolutions evince the commendable zeal of our Cheshire brethren, and the prosperity of Zion among them.

Resolved, That the heart-cheering reports given by our brethren, of the great and growing prosperity of our cause in this Association, call upon believers in the faith delivered to the saints, to "thank God and take courage."

Resolved, That we request all persons who wish to hear our doctrine preached in those towns where there is no stated preaching of our faith, to make this known to some ministering brother; and the preachers in this Association will consider it their duty, when practicable, to attend such requests.

Twenty-one lay delegates, and thirteen ministering brethren were present, and six discourses preached to full congregations. A vote of thanks to the Moderator, and also to Br. Barber for his occasional sermon, with a request for its publication.

Adjourned to meet in Stoddard on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in September 1839.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES:

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. HICKS, at Russia—Br. C. B. BROWN, at Mexico—Br. BARRAY, in Cortlandville—Br. EDDY, in Clockville—Br. HAYWARD, in this city, and lecture in Mason's school-house, New-Hartford, in the evening—Br. M. B. SMITH, at Burlington Flats, and lecture at West Burlington in the evening—Br. BIDDLECOM, at Floyd Corners.

The second Conference of the Otsego Association will take place at Burlington Flats, on the 24th and 25th inst. It may be expected that Br. Hayward will be ordained on that occasion. O. WHISTON, Clerk

POETRY

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ON THE SUDDEN DEATH OF A YOUNG LADY.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

In the pride of her beauty she sank to the tomb,
Ere time's blighting mildew had wasted her bloom—
Ere the rose-tint gave place to the sad tinge of grief,
Like the cankerworm's stain on the delicate leaf.

When the leaves, rudely swept by the eddying gale,
Sink mournfully down to their rest in the vale;
When the flow'rets we cherish'd in ruin lie low,
And the rills are responding to accents of wo;

When gathering mists by the swelling breeze driven,
With their wide-spreading folds veil the concave of heaven,
And Summer's glad bowers are deserted and lone,
And the shrill winter-minstrel is waking his moan;

How sadd'ning and drear, how mysteriously chill,
The sensations that on the lone heart-strings will thrill,
When wild desolation broods over the tomb
Where nature is shrouded in death's cheerless gloom.

But when Spring's blushing daughters are gemming the vale,
And flinging their incense abroad on the gale,
And the forest trees wave their rich garlands of green,
Like vestal-nymphs thronging the courts of their queen.

How fearful the rush of life's eddying stream,
As the black thunder-cloud shades the morning's young beam,
And the tempest-king peals the dread clarion of war,
And the strong-pinioned whirlwind comes sweeping afar.

While the warblers no more their wild melodies trill,
And flocks seek the leaf-curtained bowers of the hill,
When ruin's fierce demon sweeps over the plain,
And the lightning's red coursers attend in his train.

Thus, when in the winter of life, a friend goes
To the halls of decay—the dull realms of repose—
How sad o'er the spirit the grief-billows roar,
And we mourn for the love that can cheer us no more!

But when youth, in the pride of its beauty and bloom,
Is array'd in the white spectral robes of the tomb,
When death's chilling wreath has encircled the brow
That so lately has throbb'd with the soul's burning glow.

When the radiance that speaks in the love-telling eye
Fades away, like the rainbow's soft light from the sky,
And oblivion's pall o'er the lov'd one is spread,
Then the bruis'd spirit yearns to lie low with the dead.

And the shadows that brood round the place of their sleep,
O'er the heart's mirror'd tablet like phantoms will sweep;
Sad phantoms of joy in the days that are past,
Hopes blighted—and visions too radiant to last.

But the aged and youth shall yet live on that shore,
Where the clouds never lower, nor the storm-billows roar;
Where the freed spirit hovers o'er crystalline streams,
And rejoices forever in love's golden beams.

There the silver-toned lyres of the rapt seraphim
Join the cherubic choir in eternity's hymn,
While the ranks of redeem'd ones those bowers that throng,
Repeat the glad numbers—the chorus prolong.

ACTIVE VIRTUE.

I was standing on the pier that runs out into the East river, on one cold wintry day, and seeing the ice float rapidly down with the current. I was a mere lad at the time, and derived considerable amusement from the spectacle before me. As the sun drew near the horizon I was about turning to go away, when I heard a shout—a cry for help on the river. I looked and saw a small boat wedged between two cakes of ice, and hurried down the river with fearful rapidity. The occupant of the boat was standing up, and stretching forth his hands for aid. A crowd soon collected around me, attracted by the exclamations of the suffering man, who was evidently in imminent danger. The spectators earnestly sympathized with his perilous condition, but no movement was made to relieve him. Several ran here and there, and then came back to talk and speculate upon the matter.

"It is a shame that a man should be carried out to sea and so near night too," said an honest cartman.

"Yes," replied the merchant whom he addressed, "it is altogether too bad. Is there nobody here who knows how to use a boat?"

"Do you think he will fetch up on Staten Island, or Governor's Island?" asked a short bustling man.

"Somebody ought to go and save him!" cried another.

"I wonder if he has a family. What a loss 'twill be to them if he gets drowned!" said the merchant.

"A great loss!" echoed three or four voices. "I really can't help feeling sorry for him," said a new comer.

"There is no doubt that he is very much to be pitied," said another.

"Well, all I can say is, that I wish he may land somewhere in safety—I wonder which way the wind is."

"What time does the tide turn?" asked the first spokesman.

"Why don't somebody go to save him?" said a colored woman, addressing the merchant.

"I don't know," returned he. "It is very singular that nobody starts. I never heard of such a thing. For my part, I don't go on the water now-a-days. I was fond of it when I was a boy. I had a little pleasure skiff in which,——,

The speaker was interrupted by the sudden and somewhat rude approach of a couple of sailors, who rushed to a sloop lying at the wharf, and began to prepare the boat to be dropped from her stern.

"Come here," cried one of them. "What are you all looking at? Lay hold of these falls and help us with the boat."

A number of men sprang on board of the sloop, now that somebody was found to take the lead, and busied themselves in good earnest, in lowering the boat.

Before the keel touched the water, the two sailors were in the boat. They put out the oars, and rowed towards the sufferer, who had by this time floated to a considerable distance from the pier. After much exertion they succeeded in reaching the ice, and the man was taken, half dead with cold and fright, into the boat. The sailors pulled off their jackets and put them on him, and then shaped the course of their boat for the nearest wharf. They landed the man in safety, and by proper stimulants, he was restored to his usual soundness of body.

I have often thought upon this little circumstance since I have mingled with my fellow-creatures more freely; and have feared that where sympathy and pity do not spur to action, they are not very powerfully felt. Those good feelings and desires which lead us to act for the benefit of our fellow-creatures, are genuine; and one kind deed is worth more than many good natured words. A person may shed tears over an affecting romance, and imagine himself a very kind hearted individual, but if he is, at the same time, unwilling to deny himself the least gratification for the good of others, his kindness is too superficial to deserve praise or self-felicitation. The man who makes no profession of piety or good will to men, but who exerts himself on every proper occasion for their benefit, gives greater evidence of being a true Christian, than he who lauds Christianity, in the abstract, to the skies.

DON'T BE A TALKER.

One half of the mischief in this world is done from talking. And one half the difficulty we get into as we go along through life is the result of saying what we might as well not have said. There's much wisdom in the old maxim, "keep your mouth shut and your ears open," there is, depend upon it.

I do not know any body, in any situation or profession in life, to whom this advice is not applicable. It is sometimes said that lawyers live by talking; that talking is their trade, and so on; but the fact is, lawyers are as apt to talk too much as any body, and to suffer as much by it. To spin out a long argument, they necessarily fall into the habit of dealing more in fancy than in facts, saying things about parties and witnesses, that do no good but much harm, and their reputation for candor will generally diminish in the same proportion as that for loquacity increases. To hear some men at the bar, you would suppose that if they were held up by the feet, the words would run out of their mouths by mere force of gravity for a week at a time, without troubling their brains at all.

A preacher may talk too much. One of the best sermons in the world was the sermon on the mount. You may read it as reported in fifteen minutes. And though its style and power are inapproachable, its brevity might well be often imitated.

Our legislators talk too much. And nine-tenths of all the speech-making in Congress and the Legislature, is the mere sounding brass and tinkling cymbal of vanity and egotism. Your really sensible men, such as Benjamin Franklin and Roger Sherman, never got up unless they had something to say, and always sat down as soon as they had said it.

Our politicians talk too much. It is really refreshing and as uncommon as refreshing, to hear a sensible man talk sensibly on this topic for fifteen minutes. But if one listens to the street cant of the day, the whole science seems to be twisted into a Chinese puzzle that nobody can find the beginning or end of.

Some young people have a notion that they can talk each other into matrimony. It is a mistake: in such a delicate matter as this, the tongue had better be contented with playing a subordinate part. The eye can tell a better story, the language of action will make a better impression, the love that grows up in silent sunshine, which congenial hearts reflect upon each other, is the healthiest and most enuring. The matter will always sink deeper than the language of affection. But this is a matter which the people are so bent upon managing their own way, that I doubt whether my advice will be worth the ink and paper.

MARRIAGES.

In Upper Lisle, September 2d, by Rev. A. G. Clark, Mr. Amos F. Taft, to Miss Louisa Taft, both of Triangle.

On the 13th ult., by the same, Mr. Calvin Taylor, to Miss Harriet Covey, both of Upper Lisle.

Also, on the 20th, by the same, Mr. John Allen Spaulding, of Cady, Mich., to Miss Eliza Adaline Smith, of Upper Lisle.

In Leyden, September 6th, by Rev. J. A. Aspinwall, Mr. Benjamin Higby, to Miss Lucinda Jenks, both of Leyden.

Also, in same place, September 26th, by the same, Mr. Hannibal H. Kimball, merchant of Columbus, Ohio, to Miss Adaline Talcott, of Leyden.

DEATHS.

In Boonville, August 22d, of scarlet fever, Jane Adaline, daughter of Reuben and Pamelia Peake, aged about 4 years. Funeral services on the 23d, sermon by the writer. J. A. A.

In the town of Little Falls, on the 19th ult., Mrs. Almira Golden, consort of Mr. John Golden, in the 37th year of her age. She had been for many years a firm believer in the final holiness and happiness of all mankind, and in the hour of death her faith remained unaltered. She died like a Christian, in the full assurance of another and a better state of existence hereafter. She left a large and respectable circle of relatives and friends to lament her loss; and among them, five children.—While contemplating upon this dispensation from the hand of God, we are led to adopt the language of David, "Clouds and darkness are round about him;" but when we contemplate whence it came, we adopt his language still farther, and say, "righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne," and with this view of the case, we feel as did our departed sister, "not our wills, but thine be done." The funeral services were performed by the writer. H. Belding.

In Burlington, Otsego county, on the 16th ult., Mrs. Dorothy Button, wife of Mr. Elijah Button, aged 50 years.

Sister Button was, for many years, a firm and unwavering believer in the doctrine of God's impartial grace, and adorned her profession by a well-ordered life and conversation. She was an affectionate wife, a tender mother, and was highly esteemed in the society where she lived. By the holy influence of her faith, she was able to bear a distressing and protracted illness, with Christian patience and fortitude. Within a few hours of her death, with a mind perfectly clear and composed, she informed the writer that her trust in the unchanging goodness of her God, and the hope of a world's salvation, were her only support in that trying hour. Her funeral was attended on the 18th. Sermon by the writer, from Proverbs xiv: 32. I. Hayward.

Union please copy.

In Williamsville, on the 14th ult., of consumption, Mr. Leander Yale, son of A. Yale, Esq., aged 20 years.

It is but a just tribute of respect to his memory to say, that he was an amiable, intelligent, and interesting young man; esteemed by all who knew him. May that grace of God which is sufficient for them, be realized in its plenitude, by the afflicted parents and friends. Funeral on the 16th. Sermon by J. A. A.

UNIVERSALISM:
WHAT IT IS NOT, AND WHAT IT IS.

A Discourse delivered in Richmond, Va., and now published by Request.

BY REV. E. H. CHAPIN.

"And Nathaniel said unto him, Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth? Philip saith unto him, Come and see." JOHN i: 46.

I will not dwell, my hearers, upon the circumstances of the text. You will all, probably, perceive its applicability to my present subject. It is my intention, at this time, to show, in some respects, what Universalism is not, and what it is.—But before I enter upon the main topics of the discourse, permit me to state some of the motives which induce me to urge them upon your attention.

The present is eminently an era of inquiry and discussion, and perhaps nothing more forcibly exhibits the spirit of the age, than the springing up of new and divers sects and associations in morals and religion. Although there may be much bigotry, narrowness, and sectarism in all these, yet the fact of their establishment, shews that there is abroad a general desire for information, which must be highly cheering to him who has philosophically traced the history of the world, and who looks with an interested eye and a sympathizing heart upon humanity in its many phases. Now, as all truth is calculated, primarily, to benefit mankind, he, at a time like this especially, who holds what he deems to be truth, or a system of truths, of which many are ignorant or misinformed, is bound, in duty, to publish it to the world. For if it indeed be true, good will result from its promulgation, to others; if it be error, it is thus left, freely and publicly, to combat with reason.

Upon this suggestion, the advocates of Universalism have acted. Believing that they hold a system of truths—one that is of vital interest to man, inasmuch as it has reference to that which is "his being's end and aim," his happiness—they have endeavored, by all just means within their power, to exhibit that system clearly to the public. Yet, strange as it may seem, after much time and toil, this doctrine is comparatively but little known. Probably there are but few, who take any interest at all in the subject of religion, who have not an idea of Universalism. But the great and prevalent difficulty is, that this idea is generally a wrong one, and the prejudices which exist against it, are such as to cause from many, the surprised inquiry, "Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" Could we examine "the springs of human action," it would, perhaps, be more amusing than otherwise, to discover the thoughts which arise in the bosom of one laboring under this prejudice, upon beholding a Universalist. However charitable such individual may be, there is one now before him claiming to be a Christian, who requires the utmost stretch of that greatest of the virtues in his possession, to be comprehended among the disciples of Jesus. At least, "it is wonderful that one can hold to such an absurdity!"—"can be deceived by such a palpable error!" Now, we do not wonder at these feelings, when we consider how they are accumulated, and the actual views which the individual has of the system in question. They are derived from those who are opposed to the doctrine; from oral or written misrepresentations; from those who, we are willing to believe, are no worse than ignorant of it. Hence, they look through a wrong medium, and the object is distorted to their vision.

The Universalist wishes to remove this prejudice, and enlighten this ignorance. He wishes to have his tenets clearly exhibited to the world. He wishes to enjoy the privileges of the age, and to have them treated according to the dictates of "religious liberty, free inquiry, and the principles of" Protestantism. If he is in error, he wishes to have that error exposed. Now, while his doctrine is misapprehended, those who would do this are not able, for they reason from irrelevant premises. They may fasten on a position, and attack and overthrow it, and suppose their object accomplished thereby, when, in fact, their whole argument has been superfluous, and they have been combating a position which no Universalist holds, and, for all that they have done, he may be left with his wrong opinion, clinging to delusion still. But, on the other hand, if he possesses the truth, he certainly wishes it made known to all, for he believes that all truth, as I have said, is beneficial. He wishes his brethren to partake of his knowledge, and rejoice with him in the tidings of the great salvation. He does not think that if all are finally to be saved, he who is acquainted with less truth, is as well off as he who is acquainted with more. If the truth maketh free, he wishes, as far as he is able, to break every fetter. Thus, whether he is right or wrong in his opinions, it is for his own interest, and for the interest of community, to have them faithfully set forth, impartially canvassed, and publicly tested by reason and the Scriptures.

But it needs not that I should enlarge upon these things. The candid and reflecting of all denominations, and of every belief, will, I hope, perceive the reasonableness of what I have said. They are motives which induce to the frequent exhibition of Universalism by its advocates. They prompt me at this time, to a representation of it. If they are reasons sufficiently strong to urge its adherents in other parts of our country to do thus, they are especially so here, where the doctrine is comparatively recent and but little known.

Of course, the ideas which I may advance, will be trite to every well-informed Universalist. But to others they may be new, and it is for the edification of others that I now speak. I would say, also, that I state what Universalism is not, and what it is, as speaking for myself. I may present views in which some who are members of the denomination, will not coincide. But I think that all Universalists will assent to the general correctness of my exposition. But let it be remembered that I speak, and not the denomination, and that the errors which may be in this statement, I alone am responsible for.

I now proceed to the business of the discourse. The first three negations may, perhaps, to some, seem superfluous, for they are denials that Universalism is Infidelity. But it has been so called, and as I wish a fair exhibition to be made of what it is not, and what it is, I deny this charge with other things.

[We have here omitted, for the sake of brevity, giving the first three propositions in detail. The author continues the argument, by showing, 1st., that "Universalism is not Atheism," but that it teaches that there is one infinite, perfect, self-existent God; 2d., that it "is not Skepticism," but that it "is a doctrine which teaches that there is a life beyond the grave; and, 3d., that it "is not Deism." After having presented the contrast to the last proposition, by showing that Universalists regard the Scriptures as the word of God, he continues as follows:—]

But I proceed to say, fourthly, that Universalism is not a doctrine which instructs its followers to make light of sin. For it is one which teaches that sin is the chiefest of knownevils. In all the vast universe, we see nothing so dark, so desolating as this. It is the great element of hell, and where it exists, heaven can not be. Its triumphs are deeper than those of time, and more terrible than death. It has swept over the moral world, more glorious than the physical, and blighted the beautiful and desecrated the holy. It has scattered abroad and afar, the seeds of envy, war, lust, intemperance, murder, and all abomination and iniquity. It has drawn man aside from innocence and rectitude, and he has gone forth from the joy of Eden, with a bowed head and a burning heart; and, worse than all, it has spread a veil athwart his moral vision, and alienated him from his Maker. No! we do not think lightly of this. We do not view him as guiltless, who listens to its counsels, and yields to its dictates. In lands where the Bible has never shone—where the Christian missionary has never spoken—we do not view him as guiltless; for he has within him the eternal voice of conscience, uttering with an authority not to be mistaken, and calling him to duty with an impulse which he knows is right. But much more do we think him guilty, who acts contrary to the written code, and sins against the recorded precepts of infinite Love. He has the Law, proclaimed amid the trumpet-blasts and the thunderings of Sinai; and he has the Gospel, gently ushered in with songs of peace and good-will to men. He beholds, also, the enormity of this principle of sin, in the perils, the persecutions, the deaths, through which the great and the good have passed in their endeavors to remove it. He views in it the sufferings of apostles and the blood of martyrs. And, more vividly than in all else, he discovers it in the history of Jesus—in his teachings, his toils, and his prayers—wandering without where to lay his head—sweating, as it were, great drops of blood in Gethsemane—mocked, buffeted, scourged, spit upon—bleeding and dying upon the cross! He knows that all this was on account of sin—and even if he could be blind to these things, he can not shut his eyes upon the gloom and the mildew which it leaves where it has moved—upon the poison which it infuses into the very fountains of action, and the ruin which it brings upon that noblest of manifest existences, the immortal soul! We say, then, that sin is the greatest of known evils, and that he who obeys it in spite of conscience, revelation, knowledge, and, more than all, that Love which is ever blessing him and doing him good, is guilty—deeply, darkly guilty!

Again: Universalism is not a doctrine which teaches that the sinner may pass unchanged to heaven and happiness; for it is a doctrine which teaches repentance. Repentance we believe to be, not merely contrition and sorrow for sin, but reformation. A change of mind or of purpose, that exhibits itself by the actions of a life which shineth brighter and brighter, even unto the perfect day. We believe that it is a gradual work. Judging by "fruits," we can not think that wrong dispositions are eradicated in a moment, or that the fountain of corrupt and evil thoughts is instantaneously purified. This life is thronged with temptations; and he who would pursue the path of righteousness, must be continually prepared with that armor which is described by the apostle—(Ephesians vi: 13–18.) And even then, in his warfare, he will meet with defeats and wounds, and will learn that "the pilgrim's progress" is a gradual and must be a vigilant one. Such is the course of repentance or reformation. But there is a time when he who is sunken in sin and estranged from good, pauses in his career, reflects, turns, and begins to journey in the right path. There is a time when the prodigal awakes to a sense of his situation, finds himself "in a far country," and arises to go to his Father. And this is the commencement of repentance. How this penitent thought is produced, we pretend not to say. God's spirit speaks and works in unnumbered ways. That good resolution may be induced by various and opposite circumstances, in different individuals. By something which comes as suddenly and as unexpectedly as the lightning-flash from the noonday heaven, or by a course of events which are calculated to produce serious and fixed reflection.—We do not think that it is the effect of any one mode of operation. Every thing around us—all that is in the physical, the intellectual and moral worlds—all that is in the providence of God—is calling with deep, although it may be silent eloquence, to repentance. And when man pauses, when he reflects, he will hear that call, audibly and unceasingly, inviting, urging him to turn and live. Innumerable are the circumstances which are calculated to fasten reflection upon the mind, and, in turn, they may be agents in effecting this result. But hear us still further upon this point. The good resolution, the momentary impulse, the feeling of a day, or a month, is not "the new birth," the radical "change of heart." Repentance, we have said, is reformation, and these are but the commencement of repentance. There must be a fixed and unwavering resolution, a steadfast and upward journeying in the way of righteousness, ere we can be said to be born from above, and to have within us the active and growing principle of religion. There may, nay, there doubtlessly will be an occasional defection from right and from duty—a turning back upon the path; but within the bosom of the repentant man, will always exist the pure intent, the great and good purpose, which means to do right, and which struggles with, and rises from, temptation and sin, and presses forward again with redoubled diligence.

These are our views of repentance and "the change of heart," and these we would ever most earnestly teach.—"Without holiness no man shall see the Lord," is a fundamental article of our belief. As sure as man is a sinner, and all men are, so sure is it that the deeper he plunges in inquity, the farther is he from the kingdom of heaven. So sure as he is rushing on in "the broad way," so sure is it that he must enter "the strait and narrow path," ere he can be happy. "Without holiness," we repeat, he can not "see the Lord;" we add, without repentance he can not be holy. We hold that the moral death, which closes the eye and the ear of the soul to the teachings of God's Spirit and of reason—which checks the impulses of good, and withers the better feelings, and thus shuts out the glory and the loveliness of religion, is worse, far worse, than the mere dissolution of the physical frame. And we cry aloud to him who is madly pressing toward this, "Turn ye! turn ye! for why will ye die?"

Once more: Universalism is not a doctrine which teaches that man shall be saved from punishment. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die," is another fundamental article of our faith. We believe that full, adequate retribution will be poured out upon every one that doeth evil.

In regard to the extent and duration of punishment, there is a difference of opinion among us, as there is on other points among other sects, who yet maintain the same general view. Some hold that sin and its consequences extend not beyond the resurrection state—others, that the effects of sin, at least, are felt in another existence, and that, therefore, misery is produced to those upon whom they operate. The last is the opinion of your speaker. But it is sufficient for the present occasion to say, that all Universalists believe in complete punishment for sin, and, therefore, Universalism is not a doctrine which teaches that man may do evil with impunity; but it is a doctrine which teaches that all mankind will finally be saved from SIN and consequent misery. This is an important sentence in our discourse, for it is a position of which our opponents seem not generally aware. Be it remembered, that we do not enter the arena of discussion to argue against punishment—against future punishment; but against the ENDLESS DURATION OF SIN AND MISERY. We do not believe that evil is ultimate in the government of God. We believe that there will be a period when the last enemy shall be destroyed—when man shall bow in moral subjection to his Maker, and worship him "in the beauty of holiness." Be it in this world or in the next, where and while sin exists, misery will exist also. And this is a proper place in which to present our views of punishment.

We do not believe, then, that punishment is vindictive, but that it is corrective—emendatory. We believe that God inflicts chastisement on the children of men, with the same design that a wise and good father has in punishing his offspring. We look upon it as a means and not an end; and as we believe that good is an end which the Deity intends, we believe that it will be accomplished; and when it is accomplished, the means to that end being no longer required, will cease to exist. Punishment being a consequence of sin, whenever sin acts, that will follow until sin is no more. As man prefers pleasure to pain, a recurrence of pain will naturally lead him to shun that which is painful; and as punishment is painful, and inevitably follows sin, which is, therefore, the great cause of this pain, we reasonably suppose he that will eventually forsake sin, and therefore this means, (punishment, which has convinced him of the pain that follows transgression,) having produced reformation and its intended result, will be no longer required. This is a brief exposition of our views of punishment.

We teach, moreover, that there is no real pleasure in sin, and that in the practice and pursuit of religion alone is happiness. We teach that hell and heaven, in whatever existence they may be, consist not so much in location as in certain states of the mind—that the sin-polluted one amid the bliss of Paradise, has not escaped hell; and that the good man in the depths of Tartarus, is consoled with heaven. "For the kingdom of heaven is within" [or among] us, and mistaken man is striving to avoid outward and material burnings, "when, in truth, he carries within him the hell which he should chiefly dread."—(Channing.) I repeat the idea which I have before presented, that the individual in whose bosom rankle sin and its effects, be he in this world or in the next, can not be happy, for he is not holy—he can not be holy until he repents.

Now, we do not teach that Jesus came to save the world from punishment—from hell; but to destroy SIN, that great and desolating evil of which I have spoken—to restore man to HOLINESS, to happiness, to God—to save him from his INIQUITY! This, we believe, he will finally accomplish in regard to the whole human family. We believe that he will reign, until the ultimate result, UNIVERSAL GOOD, is reached—until sin is destroyed, moral death abolished, and the great harvest of souls gathered into the garner of the Lord. The final salvation of all from SIN—the ultimate restoration of all to HOLINESS, and consequent happiness, is what we teach.

Thus have I endeavored to shew, in some respects, what Universalism is not, and what it is. Permit me now to review what has been said, and to offer some remarks. We find, then, in the first place, that the charge against Universalism, that it is Infidelity, is without foundation. A plain statement of our belief confutes this. Whether we hold heresy or error, is a question to be discussed, and which we are willing to discuss with our brethren. In regard to the charge of Infidelity, we can conceive of one idea from which it may have originated. And it is, that because we hold certain principles in moral philosophy which Infidels hold or have held, therefore we are Infidels. The correctness of this reasoning we by no means admit—nor can such a position be established, until it is shown that he who agrees with another in one or more respects, must therefore agree with him in all. Now, the Infidel found these principles consistent with reason, and accepted them; he believed that the Bible taught contrary to these, and he rejected it. We, also, found these principles consistent with reason, and accepted them; we believe, moreover, that we find them corroborated by the Bible, and therefore the one strengthens the authority of the other, and proves them to be of the same origin. We agree with the Infidel insomuch as we consider them consistent with reason; we disagree with him insomuch as we believe the Bible and its teachings to be of Divine authority, and that these things are corroborated there. Is there any other sect that, in this light, is not chargeable with Infidelity, if we are? We reject the opinions, we reject the creeds of others, as being to us infallible interpreters of the teachings of Scripture, and what we ask is, to enjoy the same privilege which those who formed these opinions and framed these creeds possessed—that of reading and thinking for ourselves. To the Bible we cling—by the Bible we will be tested—the Bible alone, unaccompanied with any formulary of faith, or any set of tenets, which any sect or any man has established.
